DROUGHT AFFECTS CEREAL PRODUCTION--The 1980 goals for the commercial crop harvest, which is now taking place throughout the land, will not be met because of the drought which has seriously affected six provinces in the country--Inhambane, Gaza, Maputo, Sofala, Manica and Tete; the first two being the most seriously hurt. According to information from the Ministry of Domestic Trade, the agricultural production sector hurt most by the drought is the family-farm sector. There, too, according to the same source, most of the cereals are produced. Agricultural production in the drought-stricken zones has dropped about 50 percent. This means that currently there are no surpluses for marketing from the family farms since the serious drought situation eliminated the scarce food and financial reserves of the peasants. It should be stressed that some areas of the provinces of Niassa and Zambezia were also affected by this natural disaster, although not so seriously. The marketing goal for peanuts (11,300 tons), the main crop cultivated at this stage in Nampula, will not be achieved during this harvest. Weather conditions reduced production to 50 percent of the estimated goal. At the height of the harvest, heavy rainfall destroyed great quantities of the product. On the other hand, the outlook for harvesting oleaginous products (sesame and sunflower seeds), whose harvests are in progress, is somewhat encouraging. About 15,000 tons of surplus sunflower seeds is expected to be marketed. [Excerpts] [Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 2 Oct 80 p 1] 9479

POLITICAL, IDEOLOGICAL MEETINGS--Meetings of the FRELIMO Party's Departments of Ideological Work [DTIP's] are currently being held in various provinces of the country to analyze the political and ideological situation in the respective provinces. The work conducted by the DTIP's from the district to the provincial levels will be studied at the meetings. The information came yesterday from Jorge Rebelo, Central Committee secretary for ideological policy of the FRELIMO Party. Rebelo presided at the opening session of the DTIP provincial meeting in Beira. The Sixth Ideological Work Meeting at the Sofala Province level will analyze the work developed by all sectors in that department from the district to the province levels, as well as the plan of activities to be launched in the coming months in the area of ideological work. Also attending the opening session was Mariano Matshinhe, member of the Permanent Political Committee of the FRELIMO Party Central Committee, minister of the interior and resident minister in Sofala. Addressing the session, Matsinhe said the meeting fell within the implementation of the decisions of the Seventh Session of the Party Central Committee and the sixth session of the Party Provincial Committee in Sofala. The meeting was also attended by the secretaries of the party district committees for ideological work, officials of the sectors of the provincial DTIP, members of the mass democratic organizations and other invited guests. UPGRADING OF IMHAMBANE PORT--The work of laying the beaconage for the port of Inhambane, in progress since early September, is almost concluded. The tugboat "Lucheringo," which has assisted in the installation of the signal system for the port, will be returning to Maputo this week. Special attention will also be given to reactivating local stevedoring activity, to guarantee handling of the flow of cargo at the port after its rehabilitation. If all the operations involved in the revitalization of the port are concluded on schedule, it is expected that coastal shipping will be resumed within this year. The channel marking for the port of Inhambane, which was preceded by a hydrographic and topographical survey of the respective channel, is part of a broad operation to upgrade navigation throughout the length of the nation's seacoast. Similar operations to this end will be conducted at various coastal ports, which, like Inhambane, are now idle. No ships have put in at Inhambane since the late 1950's. The revitalization of coastal shipping is of particular importance to the nation's social and economic life; in addition to being less costly in terms of freight charges, maritime shipping affords greater cargo capacity than highway transport. Since our country has an extensive seacoast, it is important to use it to advantage in our transportation as well. [Excerpts] [Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 2 Oct 80 p 2] 6362

FRG RED CROSS ASSISTANCE--Following a visit to the major drought areas in Inhambane Province, a Red Cross delegation from the FRG returned to the Mozambican capital today. The delegation is in our country to discuss with government officials the machinery for assistance from that international institution to the victims of this natural disaster. Gerhard Dohms, leader of the FRG Red Cross delegation, announced during a press conference last Friday that the Red Cross will soon send Maputo a donation of 2,000 tons of grain for the victims of the natural disaster in Mozambique. He added that following the visit to Inhambane a report will be drafted describing the situation there. This week, the FRG Red Cross delegation will hold discussions with our government officials. The National Commission on Natural Disasters will report on the damages the drought has caused and is causing in other provinces, and a determination will be made as to the type of grain to be sent to our country. According to Dohms, the West German Red Cross delegation is here as a result of the visit by the FRG's minister for economic cooperation last July, when he offered to send the Mozambican Government 2,000 tons of wheat or an equal amount of corn to assist the people's affected by the drought. Once the meeting with the Mozambican government officials are concluded, the Red Cross delegation should return to the FRG this week, so the donation can be shipped to our country as quickly as possible. USSR SOLIDARITY COMMITTEE MESSAGE--The Soviet Committee of Afro-Asian Solidarity has sent the FRELIMO Party Central Committee a congratulatory message marking 25 September, Day of the FPLM [Armed Forces for the Popular Liberation of Mozambique] and Day of the Mozambican Revolution. Following is the text of the message: "In the name of Soviet public opinion, the Presidium of the Soviet Committee of Afro-Asian Solidarity sends cordial greetings to the FRELIMO Party Central Committee on the occasion of Mozambique Armed Forces Day, 25 September. It was 16 years ago that the heroic people of Mozambique, led by FRELIMO, took up arms in the struggle for liberty and independence, against the Portuguese colonists, a struggle which ended in victory, with the proclamation of the country's independence. We wish the Mozambican people happiness, prosperity and success in the process of building the new society based on scientific socialism. Long live friendship and solidarity between the Soviet and Mozambican peoples! Fraternal greetings." [Text] [Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 1 Oct 80 p 1] 6362

PUBLIC DISTURBANCES INVESTIGATED--Nearly a half hour before the beginning of the evening show, some workers of the Montalto Cinema in Chimoio were arrested under suspicion of being involved in a disturbance which culminated with the cancellation of two consecutive scheduled moving picture showings. Defense and Security forces, which at that time learned of the incident, quickly contained an attempt to sow panic among the spectators present. As a result of that incident, there were injured people who were taken to the provincial hospital, while a group of regulars of the Mozambican Armed Forces (FPLM), in a counter-action, managed to arrest some implicated persons for investigation. It is to be recalled that the provincial government of Manica in one of its sessions recently took specific measures to discipline that moving picture establishment, which now leads us to believe that the faults still prevailing in its operation will be corrected. INTERPROVINCIAL COURSE ENDS--After nearly 45-days duration, the 11th Course of Political-Ideological Training ended yesterday morning at Beira. The course had been held at the Inhamizua Interprovincial Center. The course ending yesterday was participated in by personnel from the provinces of Tete, Manica and Sofala. Courses in the history of Mozambique and FRELIMO and Basic Theories of Marxism-Leninism were taught. The closing session was chaired by the provincial secretary for ideological work of the FRELIMO Party, who in her speech announced the holding of another political-ideological training course shortly. She also emphasized the disciplined and enthusiastic behavior of the participants in the course. She then spoke of the need for putting the knowledge obtained into creative practice for the benefit of the people and workers of their provincial homes. FRG MAGAZINE INTERVIEWS SWAPO'S NUJOMA

DW041310 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 3 Nov 80 p 37

[Interview with SWAPO Chief Sam Nujoma, by unidentified reporter--date and place not given]

[Text] SPEIGEL: Mr Nujoma, why are you only coming now to the Federal Republic, seeing that Foreign Minister Genscher has invited you so often? Are you afraid to irritate your East Berlin friends?

Nujoma: We have had many differences with the Federal Republic and your ruling parties. It was mainly due to the fact tha Bonn refused to support the UN resolutions demanding an end to the mandate over Namibia. We asked at that time that the Windhoek consulate be closed.

SPIEGEL: It was closed 3 years ago.

Nujoma: But there is still an honorary consul there. We also asked the Federal Republic to terminate agreements with South Africa through which millions of marks have been channelled to German apartheid schools in Namibia.

SPIEGEL: But you know yourself that racial segregation was eliminated long ago in German schools. Africans are accepted.

Nujoma: The schools are still also expensive that African parents cannot afford them. That is also a form of racial segregation. We will see to it that after independence everybody will be able to attend any school.

SPIEGEL: Did you discuss in Bonn the problem of West German uranium imports from Namibia?

Nujoma: We have asked Mr Genscher for German participation in sanctions against South Africa. The German trade unions are asked to do the same.

SPIEGEL: Sanctions were never successful. Just take Rhodesia.

Nujoma: I think that there were quite different considerations behind the Bonn rejection. South Africa is after all an outpost of capitalist Western Europe. If a country such as the Federal Republic took part in an embargo, South Africa would feel it.

SPIEGEL: So Bonn does not want to take part in a boycott?

Nujoma: I cannot speak on behalf of Bonn.

SPIEGEL: What did Mr Genscher say?

Nujoma: Ask him yourself. Mr Genscher just said that the Federal Republic will closely cooperate with UN states in this matter.

SPIEGEL: So far you have received most of your support from the East Bloc and particularly from East Berlin. Your adversary, Andreas Shipanga, the leader of the so-called democratic SWAPO, has called you a puppet of the East Germans. What do you say to that?

Nujoma: The GDR has always supported us. Our relations are good on principle with countries that are friendly to us.

SPEIGEL: And Bonn was not friendly to you?

Nujoma: No, the Federal Republic supports Pretoria, it supplies war material to South Africa, it gives know-how and electronic equipment to the South African racists.

SPIEGEL: East Bloc countries even supply arms to South Africa. Many African countries have close trade contacts with South Africa.

Nujoma: I know nothing about that. Whom do you mean?

SPIEGEL: You can look it up in all trade statistics. Some two dozen African states are involved, among them Angola, Mozambique, Zimbabwe and Tanzania.

Nujoma: Angola is not correct; I know it because I live there.

SPIEGEL: What will happen to the 30,000 Germans living in Namibia? Should they leave the country, as demanded by Sean McBride, the former UN commissioner for Namibia?

Nujoma: I believe that you have interpreted Mr McBride incorrectly. We must first liberate Namibia and then strengthen our power and unity. So far only the old hatred lives that has been planted by the racist regime. The regime stays afloat only through fear, manipulation and blackmail. But the whites will naturally lose their privileges.

SPIEGEL: Does it mean that the Germans will lose their property?

Nujoma: We will rob nobody of his personal possessions.

SPIEGEL: Not rob, but maybe socialize?

Nujoma: Yes, but we will not take away anything from anybody personally.

SPIEGEL: Socialization is usually connected with taking away.

Nujoma: Naturally we must take into consideration what the people need to make a living. It is difficult to nationalize a vegetable stored. But there are other kinds of property...

SPIEGEL: The farms, for example...

Nujoma: The mining industry. We will procure interests.

SPIEGEL: Nobody doubts that SWAPO has a good chance to come out the winner in free elections. But assuming you did not achieve the necessary majority for a government, would you then be prepared to cooperate with other political forces? With Andreas Shipanga's "Democratic" SWAPO wing, for example?

Nujoma: Shipanga has no backing at all in Namibia. I cannot form a coalition with an individual person.

SPIEGEL: Will you tolerate the white leader Dirk Mudge, at least in the opposition?

Nujoma: Mudge is not a Namibian.

SPIEGEL: And the white Namibians...

Nujoma: Them, yes. But Mudge and the Boer elements should go to South Africa. They have suppressed and exploited our people.

SPIEGEL: Will you tolerate the other parties? Or do you want to have a one-party state such as Angola or Mozambique?

Nujoma: All depends on the decision of the Namibian people. If the people want to have a one-party state, they will get it.

SPIEGEL: And if SWAPO does not win--will you then accept the decision of the people?

Nujoma: We will win. No doubt about that.

VOTERS CAUTIONED TO FACE FACTS

Windhoek DIE REPUBLIKEIN in German 29 Sep 80 p 8

[Article by Eberhardt Hofmann: "The Voter Should Be Wary of Illusions"]

[Text] In view of the impending elections by the white population, between 11 and 13 November, and the constant nationwide ideological propaganda spread by the parties, there is a danger that many voters will lose the perspective for the urgent Namibia questions. In fact, the National Party has offered no proof over the past 5 years that it is capable of giving clear guidelines. It has fallen back on its traditional strategy of disregarding unpleasant problems and, instead of frank discussions of real possibilities, appealing to the fears of white voters.

All efforts by the NP toward the voters are in direct contradiction to the irrefutable realities: the NP offers the whites guarantees and wants to enforce these with the threats that unless they are met "the whites" would leave the country. The NP cannot back up these guarantees which it offers so freely because neither the South African government nor the moderate black and colored population will offer help in the defense of such "entrenched rights."

The question remains for which "whites" the NP is offering these guarantees. Are they the NP party members who have already made up their minds and packed their bags? The NP will know best who they are and for them the threat that the "whites" are leaving the country unless they can hang on to the apron strings of "mother NP" might be valid.

The team of candidates of the Republican Party offers the clear and positive chance to get personalities involved in public life who not only have deep roots in the country but through their proven positive attitudes toward the country will be in a position to take decisive action in circumstances that often change over night.

Positive cooperation and the willingness to work together in principle on the national level--these are the cornerstones of a national Namibia policy. The RP leader deserves credit for the fact that he sends his candidates, from Bertie Botha to Anna Frank, to the real political front lines, to Ovambo and Caoco Land, far away from the cocktail circuit, where lack of education, terror, ignorance, confusion and the danger of land mines are dominating factors. These are the realities of our country.

RP candidates are sharpening their views of the total situation. Those who expect less from their political representatives are living in a dream world. Up north in Ovambo the candidates learn what real value there is in the miserable election campaign themes of the NP--in its pedantic policies (which on paper are not different, anyhow, from the programs of the RP), in trying to sell the old fear of a "black manace" and they get to know for the first time the value of a representative national government based on the principle: one person--one vote.

Up there in Ovambo, RP candidates learn to forget about any self-pity that they might still have had on the basis of their association with "the whites." That kind of self-pity is expressed in complaints such as those made recently by Abraham Hermanus du Plessis before whites in Otjiwarongo: "If you vote for the RP and if you are satisfied with a government based on the principle "one person--one vote," then you must realize what you are doing to the whites in Southwest Africa." Du Plessis sees only the whites and, should his outdated party in fact gain the majority, he would like to see the entire national legal process rolled back to that weak hour in March 1977.

His candidate for Otjiwarongo, Piet Roux, another veteran of the apartheid era, expressed clearly and with unequivocal force what the NP intends to do: "Through the elections of the whites you can force a stick into the spokes of the wheels of progress, and you can show the world for once and all who speaks in the name of the whites of Southwest Africa." These words were quoted verbatim by his newspaper.

In fact, the development of SWA/Namibia would again be thrown back if the obstacles set up by the NP could steer the course of the whites far off and into political insignificance.

However, the problems concerning SWA/Namibia are much more serious than the narrowminded and cosmetic election campaign themes of the NP. The five Western powers and the UN have reacted with growing impatience to the negative attitude of South Africa toward the most recent and generally well received Waldheim letter suggesting steps for compliance with a solution plan for Namibia according to UN resolution 435 which, by the way, was also accepted by a disturbed NP. South Africa can retaliate only through sanctions threatened in clever diplomatic maneuvers. These diplomatic maneuvers, however, are becoming more and more translucent, and every time it is becoming more difficult for the Western powers to avert boycott measures against South Africa. South Africa can gain time in Namibia only if changes take place here that are domstically important and also make an impression abroad. A political retreat, in accordance with empty policies, would completely destroy South Africa's credibility in the Namibia question.

The political parties involved in the elections of the whites must realize that the time of South African presence in Manibia is limited not only because in principle agreement has been reached on compliance with internationally supervised elections but also because South African circles on all levels are being asking increasingly if an expensive guerilla war at SWA/Namibia's northern border, which is so hard to guard, makes any sense in the long range, if a simple numerical accounting reveals how much more easily South Africa's interests can be defended at the Oranje River.

After the elections in Zimbabwe and the victory of the Patriotic Front, SWAPO has gained more sympathy abroad, and this organization is increasingly considered as a "iberation movement" and less as a terrorist organization. "After Mugabe, Nujoma does not look so terrible any more," a well informed expert on U.S. policy said recently. SWAPO is counting on and working with increasing material and moral support, of which it can be sure after the Africanization of Zimbabwe.

It is a tragic development that the NP does not accept these facts. The Republican Party offers another chance to elect representatives who retain a view of the total situation, and as Southwest Africans in the widest sense work inside a political infrastructure where the voices of the whites do not complain from the sidelines and are not judged by skin color, but rather where the right to speak out is determined by cooperation and effort. Those who want to remain relevant must also remain open to the problems of the total situation because only after the November elections will the work begin in earnest.

COMMENTARY ON REUNION'S STATUS, COLONIZATION

Saint Denis TEMOIGNAGES in French 2 Oct 80 p 1

[Editorial: "To Him Alone," passages in slantlines printed in boldface]

[Text] Once again (and this is not the last time) the question of the future of Reunion returns to the forefront of the news and to the center of discussion, whether it be within Reunion itself on the occasion of the arrival within our country of the first secretary of the French Socialist Party or whether it be abroad on the occasion of the publication of a survey of our island in the periodical LE MAURICIEN.

Just a few years ago, simply bringing up the possibility of changing the status of Reunion provoked shouts and insults from the worst reactionaries against the partisans of autonomy. Some of them even went so far as to publish genuine threats of death against the communist leaders in their press. Today, due to the strength of the progressive movement and its increasing credibility, the possibility of change has become a very important subject of discussion within all political currents.

Thus, even the "Journal de l'Ile de la Reunion" was led to write in its issue of Tuesday, 30 September with regard to the report appearing in LE MAURICIEN: "It is interesting to learn the responses furnished...by our politicians."

To be sure, it is interesting! The inhabitants of Reunion wish to learn the solutions of /all/ the parties for the future of Reunion and they have the /right/ to know them! This is one of the primary conditions for a free and democratic choice. However, these conditions do not exist at the present time, particularly at FR3. It is therefore essential that, at the Barachois station, reporting becomes free, honest, pluralist and favors democratic debate with regard to the future of the nation.

Based on the above, a strong idea is, in our opinion, the nucleus of this debate, namely: /"There exists a people of Reunion."/ Consequently, it is this people and it alone which holds the sovereign power to decide its future and to select the status to be given to its country.

Therefore, no one, whether he belongs to the right or the left wing, whether he is an inhabitant of Reunion or a foreigner, is authorized to set the limits of sovereignty of the people of Reunion other than the people of Reunion themselves.

This is what international law calls the right to selfdetermination of all peoples. This right is imprescriptible (it has no time limit and cannot be annulled) and inalienable (it cannot be mortgaged or limited by any one).

As long as politicians and political parties do not recognize this fact, they will be (as Louis Francius has said with regard to FR3) "off the beam."

As long as politicians and political parties do not subject themselves to these principles of sovereignty, their behavior will reflect admitted colonialism or will smell of colonialism.

The history of Reunion and the growth of its population, the type of colonization to which it has been subjected for three centuries as well as its economic, social and cultural situation are specific and comparable to no others. The result is that a specific solution is necessary to decolonize and to develop the country. This solution is exactly what Elie Hoarau has dealt with in LE MAURICIEN in the name of our party and which we have printed on pages 4 and 5 of this issue.

However, this specific solution must not hide the basic fact, namely, that it is up to the people of Reunion alone to decide and to freely choose what it wants. At the time that these questions are on the agenda, it is a good idea to bring this point up so that the lesson be learned at FR3 as well as elsewhere.

OFFICIAL COMMENTS ON NEED FOR AUTONOMY

Saint-Denis TEMOIGNAGES in French 2 Oct 80 pp 4-5

[Interview with Elie Hoarau, secretary of the Central Committee of the Reunion Communist Party and county councillor of Saint-Pierre by Jean-Clement Cangy: "Autonomy Is the Only Just Path," date and place not given]

[Text] On last Tuesday 16 September, our colleague LE MAURICIEN published a report dealing with Reunion. The subject of the report is in itself significant with respect to questions that are being asked in our sister island (as is also the case in the neighboring islands) with regard to our country, namely "What is the future of Reunion?" which indeed is the title of the article written by Jean-Clement Cangy.

Mr Cangy points out that "international public opinion has concerned itself with the Reunion question" and he notes in particular that "this question is still being considered by the Organization of African Unity, which lends its unconditional support to the principle of selfdetermination of Reunion."

In fact, the question of the future of our nation and of its status is being asked more and more openly and with a greater degree of insistence within Reunion itself as well as abroad.

In this great debate, the positions that have been developed during the last 21 years by the Reunion Communist Party are making headway and appear to be increasingly credible, fair and realistic. This point is also confirmed by the series of interviews published by LE MAURICIEN in its report. Our comrade Elie Hoarau, secretary of the Central Committee of the Reunion Communist Party and county councillor of Saint-Pierre was the one who answered the questions posed by Mr Cangy on behalf of our party. His answers are clear, stirring and reassuring to all the inhabitants of Reunion.

Their ideals are even more illuminating when compared to the responses furnished by Jean-Paul Virapoulle and Auguste Legros who presented the points of view of the right wing in this report. Both of these individuals are tangled up in their contradictions of "ignored colonist" and "deluxe receivers of public welfare" in the service of a policy which maintains Reunion in a state of dependence and underdevelopment.

The complete text of this interview by Elie Hoarau in LE MAURICIEN is presented below.

CANGY: The Reunion Communist Party, which was a partisan of the cause of departmentalization back in 1946, again brought up the subject of this status in order to ask for democratic and popular autonomy under the auspices of the French republic. How do you explain this move that was made by the Reunion Communist Party?

HOARAU: First of all, I would like to make a little historical correction. In 1946, there existed no Reunion Communist Party since the latter did not come into being until 1959. From the beginning, this party denounced the colonial situation which prevailed in the island that had been established in 1946 as an "overseas French department." Thus, from its very beginning, the Reunion Communist Party opted for a new status for Reunion, namely, autonomy.

Having made this slight historical correction, I would like to say that it is true that after World War II (1939-1945), the communists, who became reorganized into the Reunion federation of the French Communist Party, fought for departmentalization. The communist leaders of that time, who had been involved in union struggles in which they played the most radical role, assumed the class struggle in Reunion in a most exemplary fashion. The 1945 victory in France and the immense hope that was generated by the new social victories exerted a great influence on these communist leaders who saw in "departmentalization" the solution to the workers' claims for which they had fought tooth and nail.

Nevertheless, for reasons which depend on history, on the assimilating nature of colonization and on the origin of these leaders, it should be pointed out that these leaders placed a higher priority on social freedom than political freedom. It was necessary to wait for the creation of the Reunion Communist Party in 1959 for this priority to be reversed since it was then realized that true social freedom could only be acquired by political liberation of the country from the colonial yoke.

CANGY: According to the Reunion Communist Party, will Reunion always be a colony?

HOARAU: Absolutely. The inhabitants of Reunion cannot make any fundamental decision concerning their country. Their entire economy is based on foreign needs. Finally, their entity is constantly ridiculed, denied or folklorized for political requirements, for depersonalization or for the demands of capitalist tourism.

CANGY: Then, you are saying that only democratic and popular autonomy would put an end to the colonial situation of Reunion. Can you tell us exactly what this means?

HOARAU: First of all, there is a political significance: "Reunion for the inhabitants of Reunion." This means that Reunion belongs to the men and women who inhabit this country, who love it and desire its advance and the desire of its people to decide, i.e., to decide on the destiny of Reunion and of the control of the affairs of the nation.

Then, there is an economic, social and cultural significance. This means the implementation of the dynamics of development in all areas, which requires a consistent anti-imperialist orientation.

CANGY: The Reunion Communist Party is being reproached for a certain amount of ambiguity with respect to the problem of French troops in Reunion. If Reunion were to become autonomous tomorrow, would you demand the eventual departure of these troops?

HOARAU: This problem goes beyond the borders of our island. At the present time in our region, an anti-imperialist struggle requires that the Indian Ocean be converted to a peaceful zone. Among other things, this assumes the disappearance of bases, the existence of free commercial traffic in the Indian Ocean, the diminution (up to complete disappearance) of fleets of warships, the prohibition of stockpiling of nuclear weapons, etc.

As for the military shock troops of the French Army which are massively based here, their presence forms a part of the imperialist disposition of troops in the region. The Reunion Communist Party has not waited for the granting of autonomy of Reunion to denounce this situation and to demand their departure. Everybody knows this, especially our Mauritian friends.

Consequently, the position of the Reunion Communist Party does not suffer from any ambiguity. The only ones who see any ambiguity in its position are those who wish to see it at any price.

CANGY: On the day after the fifth Convention of the Reunion Communist Party, what are the prospects for your party in Reunion?

HOARAU: We believe that events are moving very fast throughout the world and in our region particularly. Great changes are going to take place and we believe that our country cannot remain isolated from these changes. At any rate, our party will do everything in its power to remain in the mainstream of these changes. For this purpose, our fifth convention has defined a fundamental objective, namely, to strengthen our party in every aspect in order to become firmly and permanently entrenched among the masses of the people.

CANGY: In electoral terms, the Reunion Communist Party has never progressed beyond the level of 40 percent of the votes cast. Nevertheless, you seem to be quite confident that, if the people of Reunion were to be permitted the opportunity of achieving selfdetermination, they would select to adopt the status of autonomy.

HOARAU: I would like you to know that the elections held in Reunion have been thoroughly rigged.

First of all, there exists censorship against the Reunion Communist Party. This party, which is the largest one on the island, and its representatives have never enjoyed the right to appear on government radio and television (FR3) to defend their arguments although they are regularly attacked on these media by the right wing and its representatives. This systematic censorship totally perverts democratic expression.

Furthermore, government welfare assistance is widespread in Reunion (more than 300,000 out of a total population of 500,000 inhabitants receive aid from the government). This welfare is used by the right wing as a real political weapon, as genuine blackmail for the elimination of welfare. You know that when people have only these payments as source of income to live on, blackmail is very effective. This is a terrible weapon which is held by the right wing at the time that elections are held.

There also exists the tactic of emigration. By forcing more than 6,000 youths, belonging to the mass of the population, to leave for France every year, the authorities are pursuing an obvious political objective, namely, to completely drain our electorate. By the end of 5 years, 30,000 potential voters have been eliminated. That is a considerable number!

Finally, electoral fraud itself is used during elections (falsified voter lists, repeat voting, violence, etc.).

Therefore, when you add up the effect of all these methods that are employed by the right wing to the detriment of the Reunion Communist Party, you wonder how it is possible for our party to receive so many votes and how it is possible that it is the leading party of the island.

To tell the truth, we are convinced that, if elections were to be held under normal conditions, the Reunion Communist Party alone would obtain an absolute majority of all the votes cast.

Nevertheless, our objective is not to obtain 50 percent of the votes in the elections. We want to gather the men and women of Reunion into a front which represents the vast majority of voters so that they themselves may lead their country.

CANGY: When Reunion eventually becomes autonomous, what will your priorities be?

HOARAU: The type of autonomous government that we recommend for Reunion will be democratic in operation and popular in composition.

The organizations to be employed will consist essentially of a legislative assembly, an executive branch and an agency that will cooperate with these two.

With regard to the economic area, we have expressed the principles which are to guide the actions of officials in order to prevent any possible return to colonial domination, to put an end to doing business only with France, to put an end to France's monopoly, to have the autonomous government participate in the activities of various sectors of the economy (participation which could amount to total control of certain sectors), to obtain agrarian reforms, diversification of agriculture, industrialization, a cultural policy responding to the needs of the masses, etc.

The urgency existing at the time of implementation of this program will determine the extent of the measures to be taken.

Finally, we insist that the French Government maintain and distribute the aid granted to Reunion. At the present time, this aid, which takes the form of transfer of public funds, amounts to approximately 6 to 7 billion new francs. Its maintenance and distribution constitute important elements with respect to realization of economic development of the island.

With regard to this point, we enjoy the support of the left wing in France, particularly that of the French Communist Party.

We demand the maintenance of aid for two reasons. First of all, as reparations for colonization of our country from the very beginning; secondly, as aid from the former mother country for development of our nation. At the moment that the "north-south dialogue" is on the agenda, the "have" nations find themselves with their backs to the wall. The underdeveloped countries are going to demand more than just words and promises.

CANGY: When we speak of decolonization of colonial territories, we think of independence. Is the Reunion Communist Party afraid of independence?

HOARAU: When we speak about decolonization, we think of a hard battle which will involve the greatest number of people in our country. Decolonization will be obtained by them and for them.

Consequently, it is desirable to involve as many people as possible in the struggle. To do this, it will be necessary to combine slogans and credible objectives which will correspond to their basic aspirations and will be capable of leading them into the fray.

If, due to rightist opportunism or to some other reason, we yield to an easy way out or to impatience, we cut off the mass of people from the struggle, which only serves to furnish colonialism with an additional breathing spell.

True decolonization means involvement of an entire mass of people in a long and difficult combat based on an anticolonial plan that has been prepared from a concrete analysis of a concrete situation.

The situation on Reunion Island is not the same as in any other colony. It is a very special one. It is only necessary to come here to become aware of this fact. Not to take into account this special character and to attempt to mechanically apply to Reunion the analyses and methods which did the job in other countries is to scorn scientific analysis of a situation. This does not mean that one must not consider the experience of other nations. It is on the basis of all such statistics that we have determined our slogan. We believe that we are in the best position to do so and I must say that, in view of the results that we have obtained in all of our battles, history shows that we are right. There are no other explanations for the successes that the Reunion Communist Party has achieved among the masses of people. From this moment on, it fears nothing, least of all colonialism.

CANGY: Some countries in this region seem to want to push you along the path to independence and generally say that Reunion is destined to independence by history.

HOARAU: We now offer the arguments and the program which, in our opinion, correspond best to the fundamental aspirations of the masses of people of Reunion. We also say that the solution that we recommend is a just and reasonable one. As for saying that history destines Reunion to achievement of independence, we say that history will record the evolution which will be that of our country and of our region. What will be the change in the situation? What will be the status of our islands within a given number of years when the region will have been entirely transformed and when South Africa will have been liberated from the regime of racist oppression that it now knows? We don't know. Will Reunion be independent? Will it belong to a large federation of islands located in this region? Who can know this? Who can assert this? We do not know whether Reunion is destined to achieve independence. Maybe yes, maybe no. It is up to the people of Reunion to decide. It is obvious that the situation in the region will depend on the decision that is made by the people of Reunion.

CANGY: Therefore, the Reunion Communist Party does not close the door to independence, does it?

HOARAU: The Reunion Communist Party does not close the door to any choice that the people of Reunion will make at a given time or place.

CANGY: Some individuals seem to think that your present slogan is only a stage in the process of decolonization of Reunion.

HOARUA: Everything is a stage for something else. History reflects a series of successive stages.

Furthermore, let us analyze the following problem. Our adversaries attack us, saying: "You are not sincere. Your autonomy program is an enormous piece of hypocrisy. You propose it because you know that the people are afraid of independence. However, you hide independence behind autonomy and this is an intellectual and political swindle." They tell us "Confess that you are for independence." Or else the opponents carry on a bit of propaganda and say "Autonomy really means independence." Now, the question which is asked, namely, whether our autonomy program is a step towards independence, is a question which is politically dangerous.

If we answer "no," we appear to be the worst idiots in history since it would be said that the Reunion Communist Party in 1980 is in the process of freezing a given position for centuries or forever. One would wonder where we obtained the right to say that this is the definitive and final solution.

On the other hand, if we answer "yes, this is a step on the road to independence," our opponents would say "You see now! This is a hypocritical view which has been unmasked!"

As viewed by the Reunion Communist Party, autonomy is a stage in the development of Reunion whose limits we cannot establish. We have no idea as to the length of time that this stage will last.

REDISTRIBUTION OF POWER, PRESIDENTIAL COUNCIL DISCUSSED

["Perspective" Column by Anne-Marie Mischke: "This Is How South Africa's Power Domain is Broadened"]

[Text] While the Presidential Council is beginning to take shape both criticism and expectations of and about this new institution are being voiced. There are warnings about pot holes in which we must not be trapped and there are arguments about the way the council should work. In this interview Prof Gerrit Olivier of the University of Pretoria's Department of Political Science was sounded out about the aspects of the problems surrounding the council.

At this moment South Africa is in the midst of a transformation crisis and the Presidential Council can be regarded as an instrument for identifying problems and bringing about a new working structure, stated Professor Olivier.

The crisis of distribution and the crisis of participation are elements of this transformation crisis.

As for the first one, this has to do with a better distribution of goods and prosperity and can be brought about through economic development. However, the crisis of participation is a much more serious problem and this will be more difficult to resolve. Material improvement and improved education are simply leading to higher aspirations and the possibility of conflict arises when the people do not have institutions through which they can meaningfully participate in the decisionmaking process.

Seen from a broad point of view the greatest task now is the creation of legitimate institution through which everybody can participate in this in a meaningful way.

But then Professor Olivier warns that the Presidential Council must not be regarded as a magic wand which can get rid of the problems all at once. To be sure it is an important expedient for identifying problems and establishing working structures. The most encouraging aspect of the Presidential Council is that through it the whites are getting away from the age-old approach that they alone are to manage things for all of South Africa.

At the same time the council actually represents a form of redistribution of power.

It is being realized that the whites alone cannot cope with all the threats if national power equates to white power; so there has to be a distribution of power.

In this respect Professor Olivier is careful not to discuss either sharing of power or division of power. He explains that what he means by distribution of power is that the republic's power domain is broadened and the power components strengthened by involving the coloreds and the Indians.

"A new force is being created in the political system and in so doing, in the course of time, bridging loyalties will be developed with respect to common interests"; is how he put it.

As for the way in which the Presidential Council will be working Professor Olivier assumed the following stand with respect to a couple of important matters:

Authority must continue to be concentrated in parliament as is presently the case. This will mean that parliament can act as a policy renewer and will be able to put the stamp of legality on the process of change.

A strong central power is necessary in order to counteract the crisis being caused by the present transformation process. While the process is going on, the homelands must continue to develop, order must be maintained and well-being created. This will be impossible without a strong central power.

There will have to be quick results and these must be visible.

Urgency

Professor Olivier says that he has problems with the point of view that the Presidential Council will have time to consider things quietly for a long time. That is the ideal situation; however, with an eye to the attack upon us, and as matters stand in our neighboring countries, time is against us. Results must therefore be on hand soon.

Moreover, they must be visible. People must feel that such results are legitimate, that the Presidential Council's recommendations to parliament are authoritative and that subsequently these will also be carried out.

If it should turn out that there will be bickering about the recommendations of the Presidential Council, or should these be looked upon as simply a rubber stamp of the government, they cannot succeed. The council must have a strong input in determining policy.

Also one should not expect the Presidential Council to change the South African political system from A to Z.

Certain guidelines are already there and decentralization is one of them. The prime minister even points to the possibility of a confederation. The Presidential Council must work within this framework.

The policy of area collaboration which has just been announced is also creating a new dimension with respect to the homelands and should be given further consideration by the Presidential Council.

Professor Olivier said that people are now being careful about providing only an economic and not a political context to area collaboration. Yet he thinks that this is unavoidable because all development in South Africa is being politicized. Area collaboration can coincide with the development of a confederal structure.

The rationale of our present political development is that there can be no power sharing with blacks in parliament, for then a permanent minority group would be created again in this country.

It is necessary to be relentless in seeing to it that the Presidential Council along with the parliament of the republic will be one of the components of the confederation.

The Area Basis

The leaders of the other components could deal with the government on an area basis. For example, Chief Minister Buthelezi could discuss the arrangements for Natal and President Mangope those for Western Transvaal.

A collaboration structure on an area basis should be instituted as soon as possible and according to Professor Olivier a development bank and growth points outside the homelands are not sufficient.

The merits of Minister Alwyn Schlesbusch's view that the Presidential Council must preferably meet in the chamber are understandable, but this must not be an absolute rule.

According to Professor Olivier the arrangement of the Presidential Council meetings must be left to the discretion of the chairman.

If the public is not going to have any concept at all of what is being discussed in the Presidential Council, this would have a depreciating effect on political dialog. Ultimately the council would also experience difficulties in recruiting support for its recommendations since the general public would not be involved in the exchange of ideas.

COMMENTARIES ON PARTY UNITY, PIVOTAL POINTS

Party Unity

["Perspective" Column by Otto Krause: "Renewal Makes for Unity"]

[Text] If consideration is given to the things which have taken place in past weeks: the reorganization of the cabinet, the prime minister's great persuasive efforts at the Transvaal Nationalist Party [NP] Congress and its wide acceptance then it becomes clear that in this new era there is not going to be an easy splitting up of the NP.

After all the talk of divisiveness and splintering, ever since the Craven episode back in March, the NP is now effectively united and moreover it is now on a new political course.

Once again the NP has surprisingly and effectively managed to undergo renewal and yet remain united.

When a party which has been in power as long as the NP manages to do this sort of thing again, then its time to ask how and why.

In addition, it must be pointed out that the NP of 1948 is certainly not the NP of today despite all the talk of firmness of principle extending to each remote cranny of policy.

Not Easy

But even the most trusted members of our old guard will come to acknowledge that it is actually a good thing for the NP to have adapted itself to the demands of the new era. The party knows that its 1948 model could not really weather the storms of 1980.

But sometimes bringing about renewal has not always been easy and this is something which all of us must admit.

Now I want to say that the painful trudging of some of our transitional phases is due to certain assumptions in our policy which today, to be sure after three decades, have no longer seemed to be so important; yet they managed to influence our thinking for a long time.

I would say that the first of these assumptions is the supposition that South Africa really practices a two-party system with the constant possibility of an alternative government.

Technically speaking we do have such a two-party system in our country and this is a good thing, because it helps to keep the ruling party on its toes.

But for all practical party political purposes, ever since the fifties South Africa has not had a creditable alternative government.

The Outward Picture

Yet for a long time we have behaved as though we have had to meet all the requirements of a party in a two-party system. Thus the NP has for too long placed emphasis on its consistency of policy, on its old broad principle of steadfastness and the thinking that it never changes. This is because in a two-party system this is how a party behaves; it assumes (completely erronously) that it has a lease on all wisdom. Thus this is the picture that it must maintain outwardly. It is all a part of its political style.

However, when we look upon the reality of our situation, then these dangers do not actually appear to be as bad.

Of course, there are dangers for a nation such as ours in a world of increasing radicalism and it is never sensible to assume a carefree attitude; but at the same time we must recognize that in our immediate surroundings there is still a high degree of respect for our efficiency and also our readiness for collaboration.

We are now endeavoring to apply this readiness to a solution in South Africa. It is also a cardinal aspect of our new existence strategy, but it is all too clear that the exaggeration of the dangers (as part of our political style) has long kept us from adopting new possibilities.

Yet despite these inhibiting assumptions the NP has succeeded in accomplishing a renewal and maintaining party unity. Now we must ask how and why...

New Ways

Renewal (all of us must now look into this) came about mainly because of the takeover by a new prime minister. So far, under each prime minister, a certain amount of rigidity has been creeping in. A feeling then arose that new ways must be found and thus the new leader implemented a renewal action.

This has always taken place against a background of lively discussions, in inner circles as well as in the Afrikaner press, and has dealt with the course which the nation should undertake. Moreover there are also factions within the NP (North/South, enlightened/conservative) and although they all regret this factionalism it has contributed to the realism of the debates and in practice has helped along renewal through competitive attitudes.

Should there be no factions one day, that would be a sign of danger for the NP.

To be sure each new prime minister has had to go through a period of in-house difficulties marked with tensions and talk of splintering; but ultimately the NP has remained united.

But why? The fact that renewal has taken place each time is paradoxical and certainly the foremost reason for the preservation of unity. In addition, each Nationalist Party member knows in his heart that what we are dealing with is national interest and not an ad-hoc policy, ideology or outlook on life. Although often the debate is conducted along such considerations, usually, it is the aspect of national interest which turns the scale.

In addition, I want to state that we are also entering a new phase of maturity in this respect. The debate is more about the question of short-term and long-term national interest and is being conducted in much less obstinate terms of ideology, necessity for consistency and other things. This is a very healthy sign as it attests to a new realism about our situation and also to the fact that the influence of the worn-out assumptions, which I have mentioned, is on the decline.

As it is working out, sometimes in mysterious ways, we are actually taking heart with respect to the Nationalist Party.

Pivotal Points

["Perspective" Column by Willem de Klerk: "Afrikaners Are on the Move"]

[Text] During past months, things have been going better with respect to Afrikaner unity and the prime minister is becoming more and more the man of unification who is mobilizing the nation behind a clear course of action.

In the course of newspaper commentaries and stands taken on political views, various themes from various books have been observed and evaluated with many arguments.

Sometimes one cause supplants another in actuality and some of us are easily affected--and driven from our course also by the reaction of readers.

Everyone who discusses politics (and this means every other Afrikaner) feels the need of summing up things once more, repeating basic arguments to himself and reanalyzing again.

I feel the need to underline again three pivoting points in the politics of today.

Obstruct

The fact that there are accentuations in politics among Afrikaner nationalists is something which we have learned to accept. Acknowledging this can have the negative effect of having this become a cover for group formations which obstruct the progress of policy and delay political options.

Without fear of contradiction I can say that during the past months things have gone better with regard to Afrikaner unity.

This indicated that the average Afrikaner person is willing to look at our political problem straightforwardly.

The finality of our situation in Southern Africa is liberating us from wishful thinking, eye blinders, the comfortable path of least resistance and the hope that the long road of political evolution will surely take care of us.

We are being liberated from a false conservatism which only wants to hold on to the past (political policies, national relations, customs of coexistence) simply because this represents the status of past times. Such an attitude is not conservative, but reactionary.

The new pure conservatism among our people is the readiness to set Afrikaner interests as the criterion for each renewal and change of policy.

Out of this motivation to preserve (exactly by being politically dynamic and creative and by breaking through impasses) Afrikaner harmony is now becoming very strong.

Plan

The prime minister, who was at first branded as the creator of schisms, is now becoming more and more the man of unification who is mobilizing the nation behind a clear course of action.

The steadily growing Afrikaner harmony is becoming the pivotal point of our policy.

Yet another pivotal point is the fact that we are keeping on working with a basic political plan which has specific aims. We are not floating out in the open sea as some people would like to believe.

P.W. Botha calls his basic plan a national strategy against a total attack.

Figuring among the chapters of this basic plan are the meaningful abolition of discrimination, the establishment of economic integration between races and national groups in decentralized economic areas, a new agreement on cogoverning between whites, coloreds and Asiatics and a confederation type of joint governing between the Republic of South Africa and the black people.

The steadily maturing basic plan is a subsequent important pivotal point in our policy.

Arrangement

The negotiating machinery is the third pivotal point which I want to mention today.

No basic plan, no political ideology and no dispensing of peace and prosperity in South Africa is possible without accord and collaboration between our national groups over basic matters. We have irrevocably entered the epoch of consultation and stipulation, of mutually acceptable proposals before there can be progress, and the epoch of thorough discussions of subjects.

We are making arrangements for a future political, economic and social order.

If we Afrikaners cling to these three pivotal points we shall be well on our way from the drifting in which we can so easily be entrapped.

SABRA'S ULTRACONSERVATIVE VIEWS CRITICIZED

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 25 Sep 80 p 18

[Editorial: "Flights of Fancy"]

[Text] In the past leading figures of SABRA [South African Bureau for Race Affairs] have insisted that their organization is not a policymaking body, but an academic study group. If one accepts this view, then it is also necessary to admit that SABRA has the right to theorize about important national affairs and to do so in a far-reaching and radical manner.

Yet there necessarily arises doubt as to what contribution can be made by a study group if it does not take into account the existing reality about itself and, through its flights of fancy, succeeds only in throwing into further disarray an already delicate and complicated national situation.

Against this background it is justifiable to ask what the chairman of SABRA wanted to achieve this week, during the organization's congress in Pretoria, with his introductory speech. Let's mention only a few examples taken from his speech: The continued presence of coloreds in white lands is contrary to the principle of self-determination; the survival of the Afrikaner cannot be guaranteed by a constitutional model which may be presented for whites, coloreds and Indians; whites must start planning for a country which shall be uncontestably theirs; separation of races is necessary in South Africa and this makes for a political system of complete self-determination for each racial group in its own land and under its own authority.

It is true that there are whites who, not necessarily out of feelings of hate, dream of a South African utopia without the coloreds and that there are coloreds who dream of a country without the whites. But it is a risky escape for an organization like SABRA to give white dreamers the impression that the South African realities can really be spirited away.

What can possibly be achieved by implications, now already being intimated, that the Presidential Council will not be able to come up with a constitutional arrangement which will be able to guarantee the survival of the Afrikaner and of other groups? What is meant by "complete self-determination for each racial group in its own territory?"...and among other things even a colored homeland which has already been rejected by the government and by the coloreds themselves? Can we really talk about a "white economy"? Such a thing has never yet existed in this country.

In past decades SABRA has found itself in several storms as a result of certain arguments by its leaders, including those who favor a colored homeland. In the process, the organization has lost influential members. If it goes on ignoring realities then we can certainly ask whether it still has any practical contributions to make in the circumstances of today.

INKATHA YOUTH, AFRIKANER STUDENTS FORMING ORGANIZATION

Johannesburg DIE TRANSVALER in Afrikaans 16 Sep 80 p 5

[Article by Amanda Botha: "First Alliance Between Whites and Blacks"]

[Text] Capetown--The Afrikaner-Black Foundation, the first alliance of its kind in South Africa was founded in the course of the weekend after negotiations between students of Stellenbosch University and youth leaders of the Zulu organization INKATHA.

The Afrikaner-Black Foundation was brought into being for the purpose of establishing a better understanding between blacks and whites.

A statement which was simultaneously issued in Stellenbosch and Ulundi dealing with this matter was signed by Nick Koornhoof and Frans Foelofse, two Stellenbosch University student council members, and Simon Maphalala and Musa Mkize, respectively secretary and chairman of the youth wing of INKATHA.

According to Roelofse's statement yesterday, offices of the foundation will soon be opened in Stellenbosch and in Ulundi. The foundation has the full support of Chief Gatsha Buthelezi and Prof Mike de Vries, the rector of Stellenbosch University.

The four leaders who signed the agreement for the alliance form the managing committee of the foundation. The foundation will consist of a "thinking scrum" of 20 members; 10 students from Stellenbosch and 10 youth members of INKATHA will be serving in it.

Replaced

According to the statement as issued, the foundation will dedicate itself to the "establishment of a new South Africa."

This entails an order of things in which discrimination, improper practices and incomplete political models will be replaced and substituted with new things so that a more functional and more acceptable South Africa can be created for all its inhabitants.

The foundation was the result of a meeting held in June of this year in Ulundi between Koornhoof and Roelofse and the youth leaders of INKATHA. In the course of the meeting, it was agreed that "superficial political chatter in cocktail parties" cannot bring about peaceful change in South Africa. Only a partnership between blacks and whites can administer an orderly change in South Africa.

It was agreed that the foundation shall rest upon a "scientific and academic basis," although it will certainly develop into a body having political shadings. Membership in the foundation shall be obtainable only at the invitation of the management committee.

The activities of this body are in principle being planned for a term of 3 years. Thereafter its rights to existence will be reconsidered.

Among the things which have already been planned is the arrangement that the "thinking scrum" will analyze selected publications in an academic manner and subsequently will formulate proposals which will be made available to interested groups in South Africa.

An effort will be made to improve relations between blacks and whites. Leadership seminars will be arranged and these will serve this purpose of improving the quality of leadership. Also a program will be launched for "identifying a conflict and countering it."

Tours within the country and abroad will also be arranged for the purpose of propagating the aims and ideals of the foundation.

CISKEI CRITICIZE SCHOOL CLOSINGS--Port Elizabeth--Serious concern prevails in Ciskei government circles over the school disorders which are now affecting this national state and which have already led to the death of four persons. It is suspected that the banned African Nationalist Congress is playing a big role in these disorders. Criticism has already been voiced on Minister of Education Ferdi Hartzenberg's decision to close schools in urban regions of the Eastern Cape and elsewhere. Ciskei leaders regard this as a tactical error especially with regard to the closing of schools in Port Elizabeth. Ciskei claims that it has a great influence in Port Elizabeth's black areas. Government spokesmen point out that 80 percent of the black people of Port Elizabeth are Ciskei voters. One of the spokesmen indicated that the Ciskei schools are being greatly influenced by the urban regions and students are being forced to collaborate by means of threats. This was also the case at the Fort Hare University where students who returned to attend classes received threatening letters. Rev W.M. Xaba, Ciskei's minister of agriculture and forestry, stated that Dr Hartzenberg's school closings only profits the enemy. He pointed out that the ANC has stated that 1980 is the year of organization and school children are one of its main objectives. The school closings are causing great frustration among children and the ANC is exploiting this situation. Students are being told that they can get a better education elsewhere. They are thus being enticed to leave the country and trained as terrorists, said Xaba. [Text] Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 26 Sep 80 p 33] 7964

REVIEW OF HUMAN RIGHTS, POLITICAL SITUATION

London WEST AFRICA in English 27 Oct 80 pp 2103-2105

[Article by Victor Ndovi]

[Excerpt]

EXACTLY three years ago this month (October) combined Anglo-American efforts foiled an alleged multi-national invasion of Togo. According to the Togolese authorities the brains behind this mercenary attempt to wrest political power from President Gnassingbe Eyadema were the sons of Togo's first civilian chief of state, the late Sylvanus Olympio, who was killed in the country's first military coup in 1963 engineered by the incumbent head of state Eyadema.

Eyadema has accused Bonito and Gilchrist Olympio, both exiled in Paris, of persistently scheming to oust him violently.

Despite this lapse in time the mercenary issue remains the one most sensitive aspects of Togolese politics. In August this year, after press reports in the United States alleging gross human rights abuses in Togo, Eyadema dispatched his Foreign Minister, Anani Kuma Akakpo-Ahianyo, at the head of a top-level government team to the US and Europe to burnish Togo's tarnished human rights image.

In addition to appearing on television and radio Akakpo-Ahianyo was also instructed to buy space in newspapers and other publications and to invite journalists from these establishments to Togo to verify the allegations of human rights violations. The newsmen's trips and stay in Togo were at government expense.

However, Togolese officials strenuously kept away all the relevant aspects of their domestic politics which were contained in the American press reports. Instead the journalists were chauffeur-driven to areas where the government has established development projects. Some of these projects, however, remain static.

A good example is an area just outside the capital, Lomé, on the road to Kpalime, where the Libyan Development Bank, with offices in Lomé, has lent the Togolese unspecified sums of money for agricultural development in the area. But up to now there is nothing to show except for the signposts indicating the areas earmarked for agricultural development.

In the local press, particularly on radio and television, there are programmes praising his "wise" leadership. Added to that are the groups of dancers, "les animations," formed by the party, so the officials claim, who are paid and whose uniforms are bought by the government. These dancers are said to comprise chiefly northerners many of whom also act as paid government informers. Eyadema himself is a Kabre from the north.

The presence of informers among the dancers entertaining the President suggests strict security in the country. Indeed Togolese do not openly discuss domestic politics for fear of being victimised. There are unconfirmed reports of people mysteriously disappearing for expressing opposing views to the government. Such arrests are always blamed on the army which plays a vital background role in Togolese politics.

Although the government is almost wholly civilian, except for Eyadema and one or two others, the army is the real political arbiter. In addition to being head of state and commander-in-chief of the armed forces, Eyadema is also Defence Minister. Close behind him are the southerners, Col. Yamvi Assila, the deputy chief of staff, and Lt.-Col. Koffi Kongo, head of military intelligence, a brilliant and the most feared army officer.

At times some of the senior army officials explain government policies even in the presence of the relevant government ministers. This strict security surveillance also extends to civilians.

Visitors movements in the country are closely monitored including their contacts. All the same the government maintains Togolese are among the most free Africans and that Togo has only six political prisoners. The six were placed on trial, attended by international obsarvers, including those from the London-based human rights group Amnesty International, for their alleged part in the abortive mercenary bid.

The trial itself has been heavily criticised by some of the international observers. The Amnesty International observer states in a written report that the trial was improperly conducted Serious questions have also been raised over the treatment of the six prisoners. Sanvée was severely tortured by the security authorities in an attempt to obtain a confession. As a result he developed mental problems. There are independent medical accounts to confirm his ill-health. Besides, the prisoners are frequently transferred from one jail to another to conceal their real whereabouts. Added to that are doubts concerning the location of Saturn Ayite, one of the prisoners freed in an amnesty granted by Eyadema but whose whereabouts have not been accounted for.

Despite all these bizarre internal politics Eyadema has managed in the last 13 years to wield together a sense of national unity. He has also ensured the even spread of development to as many parts of the country as possible. And he has been careful to maintain an ethnic balance in the country's centres of power.

In the three main centres of power, the party's politburo, which is the top policy-making body in the country, the party central committee and the cabinet, all the country's regions are fairly represented. Of the nine politburo members four are from the north, four from the south and one from the centre. In fact the most powerful political figure next to Eyadema is the Interior and Information Minister, Kpotivi Tevi Djidjogbe-Lacle, a southerner. As Interior Minister he is in charge of all internal security and regional administration. He is also a senior politburo member.

Of the three most senior ministers, two including Djidjogbe-Lacle are from the south. For 10 years Djidjogbe-Lacle was directeur du cabinet, a post now held by the northerner, Foumbara Outtara Natchaba. However, all this has proved costly to Eyadema. There are now frequent charges of nepotism and ethnic favouritism against some government ministers and top officials in the state enterprises. Eyadema has responded by often reshuffling his government, partly to cut out dead wood and to maintain efficiency.

Particularly discontented are the lowly-paid and the unemployed. Wages are pitifully low and unemployment is fast rising. Official statistics, however, remain unavailable.

The government's extravagant spending in certain areas of the economy remains questionable.

In many parts of the country roads are in a very bad state, schools remain poorly constructed and hospitals acutely inadequte. In Lomé itself insanitary conditions are rife. Official explanation for some of these discrepancies, especially over poorly-built schools without proper facilities, is that the government does not want to alienate pupils from their local environment.

Externally Eyadema has tried unsuccessfully to mediate in the Chadian dispute. Togo also continues to have border problems with its eastern neighbour Benin and its western neighbour Ghana.

To worsen the situation there are a number of Ghanaian women in Togo engaged in prostitution. There are also Nigerians and Ghanaians involved in illicit currency deals on the black market. These problems are known and openly admitted by the Togolese authorities but no action has been taken.

DETAILS ON COUP ATTEMPT REPORTED

Dissidents Plot Smashed

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 28 Oct 80 p 1

[Text]

ZAMBIA's security forces have smashed a plot to topple the Government, President Kaunda disclosed at a Press conference at State House yesterday.

Dr Kaunda said the plot was planned by a clique of Zambian dissidents who had hired a gang of Katangese mercenaries in collaboration with racist South Africa.

The mercenaries had planned to strike on October 16 and 17, but the Zambian defence and security forces moved in to smash them 24 hours before they could launch their plot.

The President said a number of Zambians behind the plot had been arrested and more than 40 of the mercenaries captured.

He revealed that according to the maps confiscated from the plotters, several strategic installations such as State House, Zambia Broadcasting Services, the Lusaka International Airport, Arrakan barracks and the residence of the commander of the Zambia Army were targets of the attack by the hired private army which was flushed out of their Chilanga base outside the capital.

Dr Kaunda said police were looking for a former Cabinet minister, a white Zambian and another man to help them with investigations. He did not name them.

He warned people, especially on the Copperbelt, to be on the lookout as the Chilanga mercenaries had been scattered. Since their total number was not known, some of them might be on the Copperbelt, the President said.

Dr Kaunda also announced that three Zambia Army officers were involved in the plot, but declined to name them, as this would prejudice court proceedings.

Convicted

One of them, he said, had already been suspended in connection with theft by servant, a charge for which he was convicted and had been awaiting his appeal to the High Court.

I am conscious of the fact that I cannot reveal the names here because I believe the State will like to prosecute those involved," Dr Kaunda said.

In the case of the army officers, the President declined to mention their ranks, saying: "I am walking a tightrope. I am really handicapped about whether I should do that."

But, he said, there was quite a number of Zambians picked up and investigations were continuing to find out how many they were.

"However, we are quite clear that the leadership of the gang is Zambian and the soldiers of fortune are Zaireans," he said.

The President exonerated the Zambia national defence force, saying its good name had not been tarnished because investigations carried out which, he said were thorough, only implicated three army officers in the plot.

Explaining the climax leading to the present situation, the President said security forces at their Sesheke garrison in Western Province received a message from South African soldiers demanding to have a meeting with them.

At the time, secretary of State for Defence and Security, Mr Grey Zulu, was in the province and he instructed the Zambian soldiers not to do what the South Africans demanded, saying they should [illegible]ugh a third party who [illegible]ontact the Zambian [illegible]ent for them.

[illegible]appened on September [illegible]

"A couple of days after that, the message was repeated. On a Friday before October 16, we received an ultimatum from the commander of the South African soldiers to our Sesheke garrison commander, saying if their request was not met, they (South Africans) were going to bombard Sesheke," Dr Kaunda said.

Mr Zulu later informed Dr Kaunda that he had refused to meet the South African demands again and the President agreed with him, insisting on the racist soldiers going through a third party.

"By that time, intelligence reports were being received that there was a gang of foreigners preparing to topple this Gov[illegible]ment hired by certain Zambian elements.

"Naturally, we were following these reports. And time did come when we learnt authoritatively that the gang was going to attack on the night of October 16 and 17," he said.

Dr Kaunda, as Commander-in-Chief of the armed forces, gave instructions to Zambian forces to move in 24 hours before the enemy struck.

"The story is well-known from there," he said.

He added: "Our boys moved in and uprooted the enemy. Two were killed and two others were captured.

"It seemed they knew that we were going to attack first and dispersed," he said and saluted the Zambian forces for their gallantry. He paid tribute to the people of Mumbwa in the Shibuyunji area for their vigilance and cooperation with the security forces.

Dr Kaunda described Zambians detained in connection with the plot as anti-revolutionaries who wanted to amass money through exploiting the people.

These people, he said, might have been frightened by the Anti-Corruption Bill which was passed by Parliament recently as an Act.

"Perhaps they feared that it would reveal some of their dark corners," he said.

Asked whether the plot had weighed him down, Dr Kaunda said: "I don't know. How do you look at me? How are you weighing me?"

But he added that he was a democrat who loved mankind. His leadership on the people of Zambia depended on the people's trust and confidence in him and not on "thugs and gangsters."

"If the great people of Zambia say I should continue working for them in this way, I will continue. But if they tell me that I should go to become a peasant farmer, I will go straight home at Shambelakale and start ploughing with a hoe.

"That is my line. I am genuine — gangsters have no chance with me. None," he declared.

Dr Kaunda said Zambia's enemies had been plotting against the country since independence.

Bus Station Sealed Off

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 28 Oct 80 p 5

ARMED police and Zambia Army personnel yesterday cordoned off the Kitwe main bus station (KMB) and searched all people coming in and going out of the area.

This is the first time security forces have spread their operations to public places.

Kitwe police chief, Mr Clement Mbangweta, could not say how many suspects were picked up. But he said the exercise was "routine."

People going in and out of the station were searched and those without national registration cards or other identity papers were detained.

More than 160 curfew breakers were arrested on the Copperbelt on Sunday, provincial police chief Mr Julius Zulu said.

Most of them were in Ndola Rural and in the townships who appeared to be ignorant of what was required of them during the curfew hours — from 19.00 hours to 6.00 every day, Zana reports.

The police chief commended residents in town centres throughout the province who he said were cooperative in observing the curfew.

In Solwezi, police shot and wounded a suspected thief in the early hours of yesterday.

The suspect, who was apprehended, is nursing wounds in Solwezi hospital in the intensive care unit.

North-Western province police chief, Mr Adam Shiyanda, said the man was seen carrying assorted goods at 04.00 hours by a police officer guarding the house of the province's Central Committee member, Mr Fine Liboma.

He said the officer ordered the man to stop, but he allegedly ignored this despite three warning shots being fired in the air.

Mr Shiyanda said the police man then shot and injured the suspect in the legs.

Provincial under-secretary Mr Josiah Kazhila whose house was ransacked by thieves on Sunday, identified some of his property.

Last Friday, thieves broke into the house of the assistant secretary Mr Moses Kusweje and stole goods worth hundreds of Kwacha.

South Africa Implicated

YESTERDAY Zambians knew, once again, how lucky they are in having as their President the indomitable but loving Dr Kenneth Kaunda. He has foiled a plot which could have ruined Zambia by now.

There is no telling the magnitude nor the horror of that ruin had the diabolical plan, hatched in South Africa, taken place on October 16 with the treacherous support of local dissidents.

The President himself aptly summed up his courage over what has been happening when he divulged the sordid details of the plot to a hushed State House Press conference yesterday. He said:

"I was elected not to preside over the destruction of Zambia, but to preserve Zambia. I have a duty to maintain law and order in this country. The laws in Zambia must be obeyed."

That is rare courage in the face of destiny. It is genuine faith and unadulterated conviction for Zambia's well-being as a strong and united nation.

Such traits merit something more than fine words. They merit and demand the will to form clear-cut decisions; to adopt an unequivocal and realistic stand, and to take remedial action.

Dr Kaunda has already [illegible] pre-emptive action by the security forces to foil the plot. Hence the dragnet, the arrests and now the curfew. Soon the gory details will be revealed, hopefully, in open court.

Yesterday's Press conference was a bit of an anticlimax. The people's appetite for more information was whetted but not satiated.

Patriots that they are, they were craving for the names of the local dissidents supposedly behind the plot. As it is they are left to vile rumour-mongering and witch-hunting.

This might prove dangerous and actually help the enemy who is still lurking in the shadows ready to pounce at an opportune moment. But if we are genuine patriots, and not mere paper Zambians, we have to do the President's bidding.

Dr Kaunda explained that he could not divulge the names lest he prejudiced the matter in the eyes of the law. But he asked the people to watch out for all other details from the courts soon.

For the present it is incumbent on every genuine Zambian to be vigilant,

This is the time to prove that the security of the State does not only lie with the over-burdened but brave security forces alone but with every Zambian in every walk of life. That is vital.

It would be futile to forgo our unity as a nation just for the sake of a few "pieces of silver" by a few money-lovers. Workers and the trade unions too must avoid being used by subtle elements to subvert Zambia's unity.

There can be no doubt as to the gravity of the President's warning against their manipulation by the enemy.

REPORTAGE ON GOVERNMENT-LABOR DIFFERENCES

Trade Union Leaders Meet

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 29 Oct 80 p 1

[Text]

ZAMBIA Congress of Trade Unions leaders will today meet officials from the Ministry of Labour and Social Services in Lusaka to iron out differences between the two, ZCTU general secretary, Mr Newstead Zimba, announced yesterday.

"We shall discuss what went wrong between us and the minister (Mr Joshua Lumina). We are prepared to discuss anything that crops up during the meeting," Mr Zimba said.

Mr Zimba said the ZCTU had boycotted Mr Lumina's meetings a month ago because of his "unsubstantiated allegations against the labour movement."

Mr Lumina had blamed the ZCTU for the strikes in the country, saying they were politically motivated.

"The minister had gone too far in his attack. The boycott we made was to protest against his utterances," he said.

He said that the ZCTU would go with an open mind and ready for any subjects the minister might bring up.

At a State House Press conference on Monday, President Kaunda announced that he had received intelligence reports that Zambian dissidents had planned to use the labour movement to paralyse the country through strikes and topple the Government.

He said the mercenaries had planned to attack the country during this industrial unrest, but the security forces foiled their plot 24 hours before it was launched.

Mr Zimba, however, denied later in Kitwe that the labour movement was to be used by the mercenaries, saying: "As ZCTU we refuse to be used by foreign powers in their devious activities. We stand by the resolution of 1960 in which we pledged to work with and support UNIP. The resolution has never been revoked."

Mr Zimba said yesterday the meeting would also discuss the findings of the committee of inquiry into the Nakambala shooting incident in which about five workers at Nakambala Sugar Estate in Mazabuka were shot and wounded when police were called in to quel a strike over delays in getting their K156 salary increase.

The ZCTU at the time demanded an explanation as to why police opened fire "on unarmed workers" and the Government appointed a committee of inquiry headed by Mr David Lewanika to look into the matter. It presented its report to Mr Lumina early last month.

Meanwhile, a row has erupted between the Mineworkers Union of Zambia (MUZ) branch officials in Kalulushi and the area governor, Mr Morgan Simwinji, with the union leaders vowing that they would never cooperate with the governor.

MUZ branch secretary and branch chairman Mr Webby Kaoma and Mr Robert Lihanga respectively, have claimed that the governor was ignorant on trade union matters.

The two union officials were commenting on Mr Simwinji's attack on MUZ when he warned the union last weekend to stop working against the Party.

He said that he was assured by the mining management that the jobs of the two union officials who stood for ward elections were safe.

The officials who stood for elections were Mr Philip Mukosa who went through as Kalulushi ward vice-chairman and Mr Emmanuel Chimfwembe as ward chairman for Chambeshi.

In Ndola, ZCTU chairman Mr Frederick Chileba, is expected to attend a meeting between Rover Zambia management and officials of the United Transport and Allied Workers Union today over workers' demands to have a branch manager in Ndola sacked.

ZNUT Official Resigns

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 30 Oct 80 p 1

[Text]

ZAMBIA National Union of Teachers general secretary, Mr Shiyenge Kapini, has been forced to resign.

The decision to remove Mr Kapini who has led the union for more than a decade was made at the two-day ZNUT annual executive council meeting at Adastra Primary School in Choma early this month.

Reasons for Mr Kapini's dismissal have not been announced and acting general secretary, Mr Albert Chibale, refused to discuss the matter in greater detail yesterday.

During the meeting, Mr Kapini was reported to have stormed out when he was asked to step down "in the best interest of the union."

However, Mr Chibale said Mr Kapini left the union on October 21. "He is no longer with us."

Mr Kapini could not be reached for comment yesterday.

Mr Chibale said during the meeting, there was a proposal that Mr Kapini should step down — which he "accepted willingly."

The council resolution on Mr Kapini reads: "The council has asked the general secretary, Mr Shiyenge Kapini, to resign his post in the best interests of the union."

The council thanked Mr Kapini for the "tireless" efforts he rendered to the union during his term of office.

Mr Kapini was elected ZNUT general secretary in 1970 after the resignation of Mr Muletambo Mubita.

At its Choma meeting, the union described that those who took up full-time posts in the union in future would be on secondment "rather than resigning their teaching posts."

Tension

Mr Kapini's dismissal is a culmination of tension which had been mounting against him.

Last month, a number of branches demanded his removal for allegedly using the union to further his political ambitions.

On September 19, ZNUT Nchanga area secretary Mr Abson Simfukwe was suspended for allegedly campaigning for the dismissal of Mr Kapini — a move which was strongly opposed by local union officials.

Three days later, teachers in Kitwe passed a vote of no confidence in Mr Kapini, claiming that they were convinced he had "his sights on a higher political job, using the union as a ladder."

Mr Kapini denied the charges, describing them as "nonsense."

Meanwhile, the council called on the Government to "quickly" announce and implement the improved salaries and conditions of service for teachers — an issue which has been dragging on since last year.

"It has been noted that the patience of teachers throughout the country is taken for granted by some people in authority despite the directives to solve our problems by President Kaunda.

The teachers condemned remarks made by Ndola governor Mr Alexander Kamalondo that he would make the district "hell" for some union leaders whom he accused of being disloyal to the Party and its Government.

They also attached Labour and Social Services Minister Mr Joshua Lemina for criticising the teachers and railway men in Kabwe who went on strike last month.

Meanwhile Labour and Social Services acting permanent secretary Mr Stocker Makwakwa said the report on the shooting incident at Nakambala sugar plantation presented to Mr Lemina last month will soon be made public.

Strike Threatens National Economy

ZAMBIA's economy will collapse if threats of a general strike are carried out by the labour movement, the Zambia Federation of Employers said yesterday.

ZFE chairman, Mr Kennan Nkwabilo, said his organisation was concerned about the tension between the Government, the Zambia Congress of Trade Unions and the employers' organisation.

The ZFE chairman described relations between his organisation and the ZCTU as "very cordial".

He also described the present labour situation as "spades of tension here and there" and the employer felt the tension of the threat of a nation-wide strike and was concerned, but not frightened.

Asked if the federation could do anything to improve relations between the unions and the Government, Mr Nkwabilo said:

"No. Under normal circumstances in the tripartite arrangement, the Government is supposed to act as the conciliator between the employers and the union."

According to the latest information bulletin of the ZFE, a tripartite consultative meeting was held on July 10 to discuss the President's speech to ZCTU leaders and labour market parties.

Reviewed

The employment situation in the country, the state of the economy and the formation of a tripartite committee to classify "essential services" were also reviewed.

In Kitwe, about 120 workers at Chloride Batteries went on strike on Tuesday in protest against the alleged failure by management to award them annual wage increments.

They resumed work yesterday after the National Union of Transport and Allied Workers and the management promised to look into their grievances.

Chairman of the works council, Mr Brent Chilongo, said the workers had waited for four months without getting their increments.

Mr Chilongo said the workers went on a one-hour strike demanding their rises.

But general secretary of the union, Mr Clement Mulonga, said the management was discussing the collective agreements and not the strike.

He declined to discuss the matter further and the company general manager could not be contacted for a comment.

● The Mineworkers Union of Zambia has warned that miners will take an industrial action if the local government administration is imposed on them.

This was one of the resolutions passed by the MUZ bi-annual conference held in Livingstone and released in Kitwe yesterday.

Delegates said the integration of mine townships with councils had been rejected by MUZ since independence.

The intended Local Administration Bill was tantamount to repealing the Mine Township Act Cap 472.

"This action is worse than integration as it is aimed at depriving Zambians of their rights to choose councillors since the election of ward chairmen will only be confined to few Party cadres", the resolution said.

"It must be noted that the decentralisation of local authorities, if implemented, will replace the councils with the Party and its Government. If this happened, there could be a breakdown of local authority administration."

The delegates resolved that Zambia's economy had been at its lowest ebb for the last four to five years mainly because of inflation, the liberation struggle in Zimbabwe and low copper prices.

Minister of Labour and Social Services, Mr Joshua Lumina yesterday met members of the tripartite investigation committee on the Nakambala riots to review the report.

The meeting, which Mr Lumina chaired was attended by the ZCTU, ZFE and ministry officials.

The ZCTU was represented by its secretary general Mr Newstead Zimba.

A ministry spokesman said the public would be informed of the ministry's reaction to the report at a later date.

The tripartite committee, chaired by Mr David Lewanika, a lawyer and member of the Industrial Relations Court, was appointed on April 30 by Mr Lumina to investigate the Nakambala Sugar Estate riots which resulted into a number of people being shot and injured by police.

BRIEFS

ALL MAIZE HAULED--The National Agricultural and Marketing Board (Namboard) has now collected and transported all the maize to the main depots throughout the country, operations manager, Mr John Nyirenda, revealed yesterday. Mr Nyirenda said in an interview that the exercise had been accomplished on time because the maize yield this year was low due to poor rain. "We have been efficient this year because of the low crop yield," he said, adding that when yields were high, it took Namboard until December to finish collecting the grain. He reported that there were no losses of the grain this year despite the sudden downpours in some parts of the country. My Nyirenda also attributed the early finish of the exercise to fruitful meetings with the transporters hired to do the job. "They had co-operated with us extremely well during our regular meetings," he said. The operations manager said Namboard had hired 200 private trucks including Contract Haulage. He said except for 3,000 bags of rice in Kalabo area which needed to be transported to higher and dry ground, all the maize in the country had been hauled to the depots. The problem in Kalabo was undeveloped roads. Mr Nyirenda, however, said tractors were being mobilized to transport the cereal to safe grounds. He said maize in Lusaka, Mumbwa, Luapula, Eastern Province, Copperbelt, North-Western, Serenje and Southern Province had already been transported to main depots. But Mkushi and Kabwe are yet to finish off transporting the grain. The number of bags that have not yet been ferried to the depots is negligible, he said. Last month general manager, Mr Daniel Luzongo, gave a three-week ultimatum to the transporters contracted by Namboard to finish off collecting maize. ZANU-PF URGED TO FOLLOW YUGOSLAV MODEL

Salisbury THE FINANCIAL GAZETTE in English 24 Oct 80 p 4

[Editorial]

[Text] What will the role of ZANU (PF) as a party be in the new Zimbabwe that lies ahead. Concern has already been expressed that while Parliament sits in its chambers, the Government is controlled by the party organization at 88 Manica Road, Salisbury.

The power of the party is, understandably, very great. It was through the party that the fundamental and necessary changes in our society were achieved. Those who participated in what has become known as "the struggle" understandably wish to have a major voice in the conduct of the nation's affairs. What is in doubt, is whether this is to be achieved through the elected members of Parliament, or by direct party influence.

In attempting to assess which road the country will take, it is often useful to examine the situation in other countries, particularly those which the Prime Minister and party have indicated they admire.

Yugoslavia is such a country. Because of its leadership by Marshal Tito, its assistance to ZANU (PF) during the war years, and its unorthodox and flexible socialism, it has attracted the attention of the party's political intellectuals.

What is the role of the party in Yugoslavia? Although--like ZANU (PF)--the Communist party led the country through a liberation war and revolution, it has renounced political power. In its programme, the party is described as the "leading social force," with its goals as the development of activity and initiative by personal example.

Marshal Tito himself warned that the party could adopt a leading role only if it constantly regained the trust of the workers. This could be done, he said, only if it is capable of "pointing out to the working people the ways and means of struggle for the achievement of a better and freer life."

A cardinal principle of the party is that membership "brings no privilege nor special social position."

The role of the Yugoslav Communist Party has changed over its history. Like ZANU (PF) it has had its "underground" period, and under its leader was the initiator of a liberation war and revolution. In the post-war period, it laid the foundations of a socialist state--but not one rigidly bound by idealogy or bureaucracy.

The Yugoslav Communist Party admits that its leading role is "not assured in advance." The extent to which it is realized depends on the Yugoslavs themselves, and the ability of the party to be the true interpreter of the interests of all the nationalities within the country.

If ZANU (PF) follow such directions many fears within Zimbabwe will be laid to rest.

IMPORTANCE OF SALISBURY MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS DISCUSSED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 28 Oct 80 p 14

[Editorial]

[Text]

CANDIDATES in the Salisbury municipal elections next month have only a few days left in which to submit their nominations. We hope the voters will be given a wide choice of men and women from which to choose.

There should be no repeat of the apathy that has characterised so many previous city elections. For the first time all areas of Greater Salisbury are involved, and about 150 000 people are eligible in 36 wards, instead of only about 16 000 in 13 wards last time.

Special pages in today's Herald will show candidates and voters what Salisbury is all about and what makes it tick. The city machine is a big and complicated one that for the most part runs extremely efficiently.

The new council must build on this good foundation and fill in the gaps that prevent many residents from enjoying urban life to the full. The emphasis must be on what used to be the black areas.

The new councillors particularly can be expected to press for more housing and electricity connections, more recreation centres and community development projects, better roads and transport.

But the chances are that the voters, and the councillors, will have to be patient because the required improvements will not come quickly. Even if the finance were available from the central Government, the shortage of men and materials could inhibit development.

The quality of life will be better for more people in Salisbury. But municipal candidates must appreciate the difficulties and not make wild promises in their campaigning.

IMF LOANS COULD RESTRICT POLICIES

[Text] Conditions attached to World Bank and International Monetary Fund loans could mean that Zimbabwe will have to tailor its economic and political policies.

In an interview with The Gazette this week, the Minister of Finance, Mr Enos Nkala, said the problem of conditionality--the laying down of rules and conditions by the IMF and WB in exchange for loans--was a major cause of contention at the recent joint annual meeting of the two organizations in Washington.

Sovereignty

Most developing countries at the meeting, including Zimbabwe, felt some of the conditions laid down by the two bodies were too stringent and hampered development. When the IMF and the WB lend funds, their demands also effectively reduce a country's sovereignty, said the Minister.

While he agreed that the conditionality system should be changed, he believed in "conservative" change and did not go along with some more radical third-world countries that wanted to completely dismantle the system.

Mr Nkala added that membership in the IMF and WB would give Zimbabwe access to funds to meet short-term balance of payment shortfalls, and, through participation in the fund's Special Drawing Rights department, increase Zimbabwe's imports and stimulate trade.

On the problem of attracting private development capital, Mr Nkala said potential lenders will look at three areas:

The projects that need to be financed.

The Government's ability to repay loans.

And the country's stability.

"Projects must be viable or marginally so, and must be related to the most urgent needs of the country," said Mr Nkala. Zimbabwe already has a list of priority projects which are currently under review.

As for the ability to repay, the Minister said that most international financial institutions believed Zimbabwe could repay loans because of its ability "to export more and more."

Stability

On the question of stability, Mr Nkala accused some people of painting an excessively gloomy picture of Zimbabwe. These "distortions" have done the country harm, but this is being overcome by talking to "the right people overseas" and "getting them to come out here to see for themselves."

"People that I meet are deeply impressed by what we have achieved in the last six months and go away with a totally different view of conditions and prospects here," he said.

The Minister added that he did not believe Zimbabwe's policy of socialism is frightening away private investment. Said Mr Nkala: "Socialism exists in many forms throughout the world, and generally has not been an inhibiting factor. I think that you must bear in mind that it is not our policy to introduce a stereotyped form of socialism. We have seen the problems and difficulties that other countries have as a result of blind implementation of the socialist policies of others. We do not intend to follow that course."

FARMERS' PROSPECTS LOOK BRIGHT

Capetown THE CAPE TIMES in English 28 Oct 80 p 10

[Text]

White Rhodesian farmers were the backbone of the Rhodesian Front and provided the core of Ian Smith's support when he took UDI in November, 1965. They bore the brunt of sanctions and when the bush war got under way they were at the sharp end of it.

They endured hit-and-run attacks, lost many of their number, farmers' wives and children included, lived in a constant state of siege and often had to leave their farms to serve in the army or police reserve.

Now, under the black government they resisted for so long, their future could be bright. These days they are known as commercial farmers rather than white farmers — to be more in keeping with the non-racial spirit abroad in Zimbabwe and to make the clear distinction between their large-scale business type of farming and the smaller output of the tribal and peasant cultivators.

A man who opposed UDI, himself one of Zimbabwe's most successful farmers, was appointed Minister of Agriculture by Mr Robert Mugabe. He is Mr Dennis Norman, who in this interview with the Cape Times Central Africa Editor, ANTHONY RIDER, talks of his key role as one of two whites in the Mugabe cabinet, and gives a remarkable insight into that independent nation's problems and potential.

Contrary to general belief, the number of commercial farmers has not fallen drastically. There were 5 000 of them when the war flared anew in 1972 with the north-east incursions by Zanla. Only a few hundred have abandoned farming.

HOW ARE farmers responding to the changed situation in Zimbabwe?

First of all we have no war on our hands. We still have acts of banditry, a little bit of terrorism, but basically the war has ended. It's made a big difference to the farmer's way of life. Take stock theft. It was a major menace in the last part of the war. It has dwindled down to something like 110 to 130 head a week net loss. In the last week of January it was 4 500 a week, so there's been a dramatic reduction.

The camps are over except for the reserve situation, so farmers can get on with their farming. They haven't every month to put on uniforms and leave their farms. Security in the rural areas has improved enormously and that is a tremendous relief to family life. This business of perpetually sleeping with weapons behind security screens and brick walls to a large extent has ceased.

On the economic side sanctions have been lifted. The fuel situation has eased. There's no rationing. That means a bloke has one more restriction off his shoulders and he can plan his programme in the full knowledge he has adequate fuel.

On the negative side there is still this criminal element going round the country and people are getting roughed up, and there are question marks hanging in the minds of the farmer and his wife whether they should continue or how long they should continue.

So the government has a problem here of restoring full law and order, but I believe the measures introduced, if the police are reinforced with the army, as has been promised now, and they can get on top of this, there's no reason why the farmer should not settle down to a normal way of life again.

And farming prospects?

Well, we entered this new period with a new government with pretty low stocks on hand of grain, and predicted low stocks of beef, which have now come about. We have to ration the butcher, and we have a tobacco surplus. With the better grain prices now being offered we will have a maize surplus next year, which means we'll be able to feed the country and sell the surplus at a profit.

The beef shortage is partly seasonal (it's difficult to produce animals economically coming out of the winter), and the cost of feed is high because of the higher grain and oilseed prices. So we've got a problem there to try to rectify the pricing schedule to get an even offtake of beef throughout the year. I'm currently looking at this one.

We've oversupplied the tobacco market this year with poor-quality leaf after a bad season last year. The Zimbabwe Tobacco Association will limit the amount of tobacco for auction next year. They've introduced a quota system for their growers and I believe that will lead to a better quality, because if you're limited in production you'll go for the better quality. I see no reason why we shouldn't very rapidly recapture our world position as quality producers.

Dairying

We try to look at dairying every six months rather than annually to make sure prices are right to keep up supplies. We have a bit of a shortage in some of the butters, the cheeses, but this could be seasonal. And we'll get an uptake of milk once the rains come.

So on balance the prospects are fairly good. Your question marks are law and order and political stability?

Yes, but I have sufficient confidence in the Prime Minister for him to introduce political stability. I don't think we're heading for another election soon. One hears the rumours occasionally that the government will call a snap election or be forced into one. I don't believe it. I think the PM's majority is sufficient to see him through the first five-year term. So as time goes on I believe he will demonstrate there is political stability.

On law and order once they have been able to place the chaps now in the assembly points, whether they're absorbed into the army or they go off for further education or technical training, whatever their future is, and some of these weapons can be collected and we have one national army, that will go a long way to defusing the situation.

It'll take a bit of time. These things aren't easy. The kind of war we came out of was slow to start. I think it will be slow to wind down. Nevertheless the indications are fair and there's more than a reasonable chance we're going to come out on the credit side.

If we can get through the first year without too many wheels coming off the vehicle then there's every reason that we will succeed.

Are the farmers with you on this?

I think my views are generally speaking shared by the white community as a whole. There are obviously some who have very serious doubts, but I am speaking more for the farmers and I believe the farmers are realistic enough to accept that the government we have is the one that was the choice of the people and is the one they are going to work with. They certainly will make no attempt to buck the government. All that they ask in return is that they be allowed to get on with their affairs.

We've had two very large meetings (up to 600 farmers at one of them) with the Prime Minister. There is a rapport going between the government and the farming community. I just hope that that will strengthen rather than weaken as time goes on. So on balance I remain optimistic.

How do the farmers regard Mr Mugabe?

At first they were surprised because he was a different animal from what they had expected. I think they now have respect for the policies, the attitudes, he has adopted. The first test came in the budget, which was a pleasant surprise. They thought there'd be heavy taxation, restrictions on travel. But it didn't happen. The second surprise was whether people would believe the PM is genuine when he says he wants to build a nation that is free for all races, all creeds, all colours, and everyone can within civilized limits lead their own lives.

Good record

He makes no bones and doesn't apologize for being a socialist but nevertheless says there is room in our society for the free-enterprise system. And the performance, and one can only judge on performance, the track record has been good. So I would say that the farming community, certainly at this moment, have a high regard for the Prime Minister.

How do you feel about your acceptance in the cabinet?

I think I am accepted. I went there with a certain amount of trepidation. I find that the cabinet is very professional. Meetings are run very much on professional lines. The Prime Minister is the chairman very much in command. My views are sought on matters pertaining to agriculture. I can talk on any subject I wish to and I believe I have as fair a hearing as anybody else in the room. Certainly there is and never has been any animosity shown to me because I happen to be white.

Never questioned

My political views have never been questioned by anybody. They've never been sought by anybody. I think I've been accepted for what I was put there for — as somebody to represent the private sector, particularly the white farming sector, to get a balance in cabinet or government decision-making, and I've never felt uncomfortable there.

How do you get on with the Prime Minister?

My first meeting with him was two weeks before the election. He asked me to go and see him. I went along with a lot of apprehension at that stage. He said: "Look, I know nothing about agriculture. I've asked you here to explain it to me." We had a chat of just over an hour and I was surprised how easy it was to talk to someone so receptive. I never saw him again until I was in the cabinet. I had been led to believe that with his ideology he wasn't prepared to listen to a voice from the private sector. But that wasn't quite the case and since then I've found it easier and easier.

He's not a great extrovert, but he's got a very good sense of humour. He has a tremendous capacity for work. I've never known a man to put in as many hours in the day. He never seems to flag or get tired. He has endless patience. He's accessible. I find him so. You only have to ring up and if you get through the outer screen of secretaries he always seems to find time to see people. He probably is a better listener than a talker. He is a great listener in fact, and one has plenty of opportunity to put one's viewpoint across. He's quite decisive. Having heard you he will then respond in a positive manner.

Two of the things that have struck me in Zimbabwe are the release of black energy and talent, people wanting to get to grips with the problems and the sense that suddenly the country has rejoined the world. Do you have the same feeling?

Yes, very much so. There is an upsurge. I think one can detect it if you take a half-hour stroll through the streets of Salisbury. They're throbbing again. In the commercial world I'm told all sales are at record levels. The country is on the move. Yes, we have rejoined the world community, and particularly the young are beginning to enjoy it. There has been a big return of blacks who have a variety of degrees, training and so on, and they're anxious to get stuck in and do something useful.

I believe the goodwill that has always existed in this country is still very much with us and there is a feeling the whole thing is moving forward. It is exciting, I agree.

Skyscrapers

I am told that although we haven't had a big revival in building quite a bit of interest is being shown in residential building and even in some of the commercial and industrial sectors. The government is going to put up a big office block and a couple of skyscrapers are going to go up in the middle of Salisbury — scenes we haven't seen for a few years. It gives one the feeling that possibly the darkest hour is over and we're coming into the light again. We might be blinking a little but it's quite pleasant.

You believe Zimbabwe can make quite a contribution in Africa, don't you?

Yes indeed. We had the nine-nation meeting in Lusaka where they started drawing up strategic plans in various fields — transport, communications, health and so on. We in Zimbabwe have been tasked with formulating an agricultural policy which will benefit the region. And I'm delighted because I believe we can be the catalyst for agriculture in this region. We have the historical expertise which has been retained in this country to put this thing together. We have the dedication among our farmers, among our research and extension workers, and I believe our farming record is probably at a higher level than any other country in Africa.

Food imports

Africa generally is running short of food. We have seen fairly substantial food imports going into our neighbouring countries. Now there's no reason why this region should not be self-sufficient in food and no reason why it should not help ease the world food deficit. This is going to get worse. Somebody has to organize the relief, put it all together. I believe Zimbabwe could well be the catalyst.

What sort of thoughts would you have for South Africans who are looking very closely at what is happening in Zimbabwe and trying to relate it to their own situation?

I wouldn't pretend to have a clearer crystal ball or a monopoly of wisdom. I came to the political side very late in this exercise, although I was involved in a lot of the earlier discussions, as you know. I believe the big advantage is being able to converse or hold a dialogue with all and sundry. Once everybody puts their cards on the table it's surprising how easy it is to play. But it's when cards are kept close and information, thoughts, policies, ideologies, are kept hidden that everyone's in a guessing game and you try to out-manoeuvre the other fellow. You're playing a great game of bluff.

To converse

But once you get through the barrier where you don't even have to trust each other, just be able to converse with each other, it's amazing how easily it comes after a while. You don't even have to agree. You can agree to disagree on many fundamental issues. But if you talk to someone, finally his respect for you seems to increase, and yours for him.

So the only thoughts I would have on your question are that I think we're all suspicious of something we don't know. The unknown is always frightening, but if you get to the stage of talking, at least, I believe you're on the right road to beginning to understand, and if you understand perhaps you can start to solve. But talking is the first step to take.

ZINDOGA TO STAND IN MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 28 Oct 80 p 9

[Text]

THE former Minister of Law and Order in the last government and UANC national chairman, Mr Francis Zindoga, is standing for election in the municipal elections in Salisbury.

He has submitted his nomination form as a candidate for Ward 8, which includes Waterfalls, Houghton Park, Lochinvar, Southerton, Malvern, Parktown and Prospect.

By Thursday evening, four days after the lists opened, 10 nomination forms had been received. A city council spokesman said yesterday most nominations were expected towards the deadline, 4 p.m. on Thursday. This will leave three weeks for campaigning before the elections on November 22.

Another candidate who has been put forward in the same ward as Mr Zindoga is Mr John Drake Chambwe, a radio technician with the National Railways of Zimbabwe.

Mr Chambwe of Lochinvar was among the first blacks to stand for municipal elections in Salisbury last year.

The Mayor, Councillor Jack Whiting, has lodged his nomination for ward 12, comprising Avondale, Alexandra Park and Gun Hill.

Serving councillors, Councillor G. Ismael and Alderman Ronald Cowan, are both standing in Ward 10, which includes Belvedere and Ridgeview.

The only nomination to have been lodged so far for any of the new wards representing the former local government areas is that of Mr Kenneth Mano, who is standing in Ward 19, comprising Kambuzuma and Rugare. Mr Mano is a company director.

STANDING

Mrs Elaine Raftopodlos of Arcadia has submitted her nomination form to stand in Ward 7 which includes Braeside and Eastlea. She is a branch manageress with a Salisbury firm. Standing in the same ward is Alderman Ivor Pitch.

Councillor F. J. Mills has been entered for Ward 9, representing the central business area and the industrial sites, and Councillor Mrs B. L. J. Boaler has been nominated for Ward 11, Mabelreign.

WANKIE POWER PROJECT TENDERS INVITED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 28 Oct 80 p 2

[Text]

TENDERS for Phase Two of the Wankie thermal power station project will be received early in November and the financial propositions they include may decide the future of the scheme, Mr Douglas Irvine, General Manager of the Electricity Supply Commission said yesterday.

Phase One, costing $300 million, is for a station to produce 480 megawatts a year. It should be completed in three to four years.

Phase Two of the project is far bigger both in terms of financial investment required and in the amount of power it could produce, said Mr Irvine. Its initial output would be 800 megawatts with an option of adding capacity for another 400 megawatts.

That would make Wankie capable of meeting Zimbabwe's electricity supply needs of about 1 200 megawatts a year. About a quarter comes from Zambia.

An investment of about $700 million would be needed to finance Phase Two.

Mr Irvine said it was hoped the bulk of the finance would come through foreign contractors who would ask their governments to back their investments.

"How the contractor finance works is very complex," said Mr Irvine, "but it is the best form of finance for a project of this magnitude.

"Whether Phase Two goes ahead, and when, depends largely on the financial arrangements put forward in the tenders for the work. These tenders are due in early next month," said Mr Irvine.

Negotiations on other forms of finance for the Wankie project were also continuing, he said.

FIREMEN END STRIKE, MORE STOPPAGES REPORTED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 28 Oct 80 p 1

[Text]

STRIKING firemen from three Bulawayo stations are to return to work today as a result of a request by the Minister of Labour and Social Services, Mr Kumbirai Kangai.

The regional industrial relations officer, Mr Peter Cowan, said yesterday the Deputy Minister of Labour, Mr Robson Manyika, and the Deputy Minister of Local Government and Housing, Mr Godfrey Chidyausiku, would hold talks with the firemens' workers' committee and himself today.

At Wankie yesterday 280 construction workers employed by Richard Costain (Africa) Ltd, downed tools.

They were demanding better accommodation after their huts were damaged in a rainstorm at the weekend.

A spokesman for the Industrial Relations Department, which has sent an official to Wankie, said arrangements were being made to rectify the situation as soon as possible.

About 130 workers from the Ascot, Bradfield and Abercorn Street branches of TM supermarkets, Bulawayo, went on strike yesterday. All other departments were working normally.

A TM spokesman said the strikers would not give reasons for staying away from work, but asked that the general manager, Mr Martin Cameron, come down from Salisbury to listen to their grievances.

Mr Cameron arrived at about 3 p.m. and went immediately into discussions.

He said after the meeting: "Agreement was reached on all the points they raised. These require action by both sides."

The strikers will be briefed on the outcome of the talks today.

FINANCING FOR NEW AIRPORT SOUGHT

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 28 Oct 80 p 1

[Text]

ZIMBABWE is seeking overseas funds to finance the $70 million first stage of Salisbury's new international airport.

According to a highly-placed Government source, the funds will finance the initial stage of the airport development on the site of the present Kutanga Tobacco Research Station to the west of the existing airport.

Both Kenya and Malawi received substantial financial assistance from friendly overseas countries to finance their new international airports at Nairobi and Lilongwe.

The $70 million will cover detailed planning of the new airport to cater for Zimbabwe's international air traffic needs up to the year 2000 and the construction of the new terminal capable of handling 2 000 passengers an hour or an overall capacity of three million a year.

"Initially, the terminal will handle a smaller volume of passengers but it will be designed to expand rapidly to meet the expected increased demand," the source said.

The project will also include new link roads between Queensway and Prince Edward Dam Road which are destined to provide the main access to the city.

"We are aiming for a long term, low interest loan.

"If Kenya and Malawi were able to attract such financial assistance in building their airports, why should Zimbabwe be any different," he said.

He made the distinction that the airport development was part of the Government's normal expansion programme whereas aid for national reconstruction and the resettling of the population was "a separate project".

The new airport has been given a high priority by the Government which recognises the shortcoming of the existing airport complex.

The overall plan includes a second parallel main runway, a large car-park and sophisticated passenger loading facilities giving undercover access to aircraft.

BLACKS GET TOP PRISON POSTS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 28 Oct 80 p 2

[Text]

TWO blacks have been appointed deputy directors of the Zimbabwe Prison Service and 18 others have been given top posts by the Minister of Justice and Constitutional Affairs, Senator Simbi Mubako.

Senator Mubako said yesterday he had taken these "far - reaching measures" because all along the staffing in the service had been divided on racial lines.

"The blacks have been generally at the bottom of the ladder while whites were predominantly at the top," he said. "All senior posts from the director — the highest position in the service — chief superintendents, superintendents, chief prison officers and the rest have until now been held by whites only.

"Most blacks in the service were warders and only recently were some admitted as prison officers. No black was at the top despite the fact that some of them have been serving for a long time."

All the 24 appointments, announced yesterday, become effective from Saturday.

The deputy directors are Mr Langton Chigwida and Mr Nicholas T. Mapfumo, both long-serving members of the Prison Service.

Other appointments are: Chief Superintendents — Mr Jeremiah Brada; Mr John V. Clack; Mr Stephen Grey; Mr John Kombo; Mr Innocent M. Mabika; Mr Samuel N. Matshalaile; Mr Jacobus A. Steyn; and Mr Brian B. Thom.

Superintendents — Mr Johannes J. Alberts; Mr Stephen Chimurahara; Mr Patrick Chimanga; Mr Marvin A. R. Dingwall; Mr Cyril K. Gwase; Mr Stanley Hendome; Mr Jonathan S. Mazna; Mr Gwere Mudzvamba; Mr William Mutsau; Mr Lee C. Mutero; Mr Ludwin Z. Nyanta; Mr William H. Rautenbacher; Mr Anthony Rush; and Mr Mhao M. Thaddeus.

Chief Prison Officers — Principal Prison Officer (PPO) Mr Thomas E. Brecham; PPO Mr George W. Davies; PPO Mr Gert P. Gouws; PPO Mr Francis Jairus; PPO Mr Damascus M. Machingu; PPO Mr Ernest Mupambanga; PPO Mr Ngwena Nkabo; and PPO Mr Andrew Siangale.

Area Chaplains — Mr Francis E. Ribeiro and Mr Edward C. Nyahwa.

The present Director of Prisons, Mr Frank Patch, has said he will retire at the end of January next year.

BRIEFS

TRADE UNION FREEDOM--Trade unions yesterday supported a weekend plea by the Patriotic Front leader, Mr Joshua Nkomo, that the Government or political parties should not interfere in the trade union movement. The chairman of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions, Mr Alfred Makwarimba, said his organization would not tolerate any interference by political parties in the trade union movement. "I wish to warn any political party that may want to interfere in our trade unions that this will not be tolerated," he said. He claimed that there were some political parties who sent bogus trade unionists to organize people. Mr Makwarimba said some of such bogus unionists claimed that they were externally based. "If this is so, they had better go where they left their supporters because we don't know them here. Workers whom we are supposed to represent as trade unionists are in Zimbabwe. Mr Makwarimba said political parties should concentrate on organizing their political supporters and leave trade unions alone. He said: "Workers should be free to decide their function regardless of political affiliation." His organization had not experienced any interference by either Government or any of the political parties. He said the ZCTU was in control of unions and there was no question of political parties doing it "on our own behalf." [Excerpt] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 28 Oct 80 p 2]

RETRAINING FOR POLICE--The Deputy Minister of Home Affairs, Mr Tarisai Ziyambi, said yesterday that all members of the police force would undergo a reorientation programme as part of the new social order. In an interview with ZTV, the Deputy Minister said the programme was made necessary by the fact that a large number of policemen in the present force had undergone training, which, because of the war, had accentuated the use of force. He said it was now necessary to retrain these men under peace conditions. The training programme was already in progress, but on a very selective basis, he said. It would not become very intensive. "We have found from experience that most members of our police force have not adjusted to peace conditions, and we will have to work very hard to help them to adjust," he said. "The attitude is displayed by members-in-charge, by those even above that rank. We've seen it in the lower ranks, so every policeman will have to undergo this reorientation course." The Deputy Minister said the course would be part of the conditions of service. Those policemen who could not adjust would have to leave the police force. END

Zambians who go into Zaire are equally severely maltreated.

The border area between Zaire and Zambia has in the past also proved thorny. Zaire's Shaba province, which borders Zambia, is the home of the dominant ethnic group in the region, the Lundas. Shaba's most prominent political figures include the late Moise Tshombe, a former Congolese (Zaire's former name) Prime Minister and the Foreign Minister Nguza Karl I'bond.

Formerly Katanga province, Shaba demanded secession under Tshombe from the rest of the country in the early 60s and opted to join the defunct Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. However, through combined international effort, Tshombe's secessionist movement was eventually subdued. Although he was exiled he returned to Zaire to become its Prime Minister in the mid-60s.

HISTORY OF ZAIRE-ZAMBIA BORDER DISPUTE DETAILED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 2 Nov 80 p C1

[Article by Victor Ndovi]

[Text]

RELATIONS between Zambia and its northern neighbour, Zaire, have soured yet again. Zambia's announcement that Zaire had tightened its claim over a part of Zambian territory in the Kaputa area of the Northern Province highlights a dispute between the two countries which has gone for years.

Their quarrels arise chiefly from rich deposits of platinum, tungsten, cobalt, copper and gold believed to lie along their common border.

Said the Times of Zambia: "Zaire has physically occupied Zambian territory by setting up customs and immigration posts" in the area.

But Zambia's President Kaunda has said the border wrangle should be solved in "a friendly manner" by the Zambia/Zaire joint permanent commission. So far the President's statement has been the only official Zambian reaction to the border issue.

PROBLEMS

The commission that was established about three years ago to smooth out mutual problems between the two states. Among its members are the Foreign Ministers of the two countries, and they alternatively meet either in Zaire or Zambia.

There is a long history of conflicts between the two countries. In September 1977 Zairean armed security units opened fire on a group of former members of the Lumpa church, an outlawed religious sect in Zambia, killing three and seriously injuring 10 others.

The incident happened as the Lumpas were being transferred deep inside Zaire from the Zairean border town of Mokambo where they had been resettled after fleeing from Zambia. The Zairean units also ransacked and riddled with bullets the nearby Zambian customs and immigration posts, taking away files and other official documents and also cash from the safe at the posts.

TRAINING

During the invasion of Zaire's Shaba province by rebels apparently from Angola in May 1978, Zairean authorities accused Zambia of assisting the National Front for the Liberation of the Congo rebel forces fighting the Zairean central Government. The Zaireans claimed Zambia had provided military training bases for the FNLC from which it crossed into Zaire to wage war against the official security forces.

Although Zambia denied the Zairean accusations the Zairean authorities nonetheless expelled several thousand Zambians, some of whom had lived in Zaire all their lives.

For a long time now Zambians travelled through Zairean territory along the Pedicle Road, which connects the Copperbelt and Luapula Provinces of Zambia, have been persistently harassed by Zairean officials. Several Zambians, among them party and Government officials, have either been detained for sometime or fined on the spot for alleged breach of local Zairean laws.

What compounds matters is the difficulty in communication between officials on both sides of the border. Zambians are English-speaking while their Zairean counterparts are French-speaking. And on both sides of the border live members of the same ethnic groups who are nationally defined by the international boundary as Zaireans or Zambians.

In an attempt to solve some of these problems the two states agreed to set up the joint permanent commission comprising senior government officials including ministers. But it made very little headway. Very often the commissioners have had enormous difficulties in meeting largely because of lack of co-operation by one or other of the countries.

At the same time the Presidents of the two countries, Kaunda of Zambia and Mobutu Sese Seko of Zaire, have met on more than one occasion to discuss, among other issues, border problems but with insignificant results.

On the surface, however, relations appear warm, judging from the numerous goodwill visits between the two countries by officials of Zambia's United National Independence Party and Zaire's Popular Movement of the Revolution as well as their Governments.

But the hostility shown to Zaireans in Zambia and vice versa and when sports teams of the two countries are competing clearly indicates that there is a mutual resentment between the two peoples.

Zaireans living in Zambia have been accused of involvement in crime, prostitution and other shady activities. Many of them have been rounded up and sent back to Zaire. Others have been gaoled on various accounts.

DJIBOUTI MINISTER NOTES RESULTS OF KENYAN VISIT

Djibouti LA NATION DJIBOUTI in French 16 Oct 80 p 4

[Interview with Aden Robleh Awaleh, Minister of Trade, Transports and Tourism by LA NATION DJIBOUTI correspondent: "Djiboutians Must Realize the International Potential of their Country"]

> [Text] "We were ourselves astonished by the very lively interest shown in our country by the Kenyan authorities and press." This little remark by the minister of Commerce, Transportation and Tourism, during the interview he was kind enough to grant us together with our colleagues of the RTD says a good deal about the international potential of the Republic of Djibouti. The purpose of this interview was to supplement the recently published official communique, which reported on the visit to Kenya by Mr Aden Robleh Awaleh, heading a large delegation.

Before getting to the heart of the matter, the minister discussed the historic and geographic grounds which justify the contacts between Djibouti and Kenya and explain their novelty: like many Third World regions, East Africa remains subject to the practices of "North-South" relations, inherited from colonial days. It is easy to travel between Europe and the former colonies, there is also regular travel between neighboring countries, but between these two extremes, relations remain very rare.

That is why, responding to the appeal of the secretary general of the OAU [Organization of African Unity] who would like to have regional relations develop in Africa, we are seeking to extend the circle of our relations with the countries which are geographically close to us. Thus we discover in Kenya, a country already very highly developed on the economic, industrial and agricultural level considerable potential for the fulfillment of many of our needs, while at the same time we are becoming acquainted with close neighbors who find in us an interesting partner in many areas.

Mr Aden Robleh indicated that the Kenyans, who know very little about us, have been attracted by our choice of a liberal economy, our position as economic "turntable" which offers them new horizons, also by the peaceful policy of nonalinement defined by President Hassan Gouled and the government, a policy which assumes its full significance if our country's strategic position is considered.

Travel

The visit of the Djibouti delegation made it possible to remove several great obstacles. The first of these obstacles is communications. It appears so simple to travel between two neighboring countries, if you look at a map, but if air (or other) communications do not exist, travellers cannot cross the border, and the two countries remain isolated.

The Transport minister emphasized this practical aspect which conditions all our relations with Kenya, and announced the following decisions:

--our two national airlines will harmonize their services on the Nairobi-Djibouti line in such a manner that the travellers will have two flights a week. The Air Djibouti flight which has been serving Kenya every Thursday for seven months will be supplemented by a Kenya-Airways flight every Sunday;

--measures will be taken shortly to facilitate the granting of the visas needed for the free movement of the travelers;

--close cooperation between the Djibouti Chamber of Commerce and Industry, young and still lacking in experience, but anxious to develop and resolved to act, and the Nairobi institution, whose experience will provide valuable assistance to the former, especially in facilitating the movement of goods between the Kenyan port of Mombasa and the port of Djibouti (another interesting prospect of development of our port activities).

An Important Activity: Tourism

We all know the extent and the attraction of toursim in Kenya, which attracts every year about 600,000 visitors to this country whose flora and fauna are rich and diversified.

Cooperation in this field can only be profitable to the two countries. First of all, because the people of Djibouti, who have acquired a liking for tourism, as a result of visits to Europe, and the many foreigners who live in our country are so many potential clients for Kenyan tourism (which concerns particularly our airline); then because the Djibouti tourist business which offers original (not to say unique) possibilities, may find an important source of promotion in regular relations with Kenya. Indeed, the authorities of the two countries have grasped so well the mutual benefit derived in developing their cooperation in the area of tourism that an agreement was signed by the end of the visit.

The People of Djibouti Must Be Worthy

Finally, in respect of a question concerning his trip to Kuwait in the framework of a delegation led by the prime minister, Aden Robleh Awaleh declared that he was delighted at the interest shown by Arab investors in our country. In this case too, our policy of liberal economy and political neutrality is bearing fruit. But even so the people of Djibouti must deserve the interest shown in them, should understand their international vocation and respond accordingly, whether they are dealing with the Arabs, Kenyans or other neighbors of East Africa or the Near East. How can this interest be merited? First of all by inspiring confidence through their work, their earnestness, their dynamism, but also be learning to live in the international age, that is, striving to speak several languages, of which the most important are Arabic, French and English.

As was stressed by the minister Aden Robleh, we are entering into a new era of international relations. After the North-South "cooperation," which had too often been unilateral, "horizontal" bonds must be established with the nearest neighbors. The future belongs to those who are able to understand this and act accordingly.

MINISTER CLARIFIES GOVERNMENT'S POSITION ON ECOWAS CITIZENS

Foreign Ministry Press Release

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 27 Oct 80 pp 1, 6

[Text]

Liberia's Foreign Minister G. Baccus Matthews has reiterated that it is the obligation of the Liberian Government to live up to the terms and conditions of the Protocol of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) relating to the movement of persons.

Minister Matthews made the position of the Liberian Government clear last Tuesday when the diplomatic envoys of the Governments of Ghana, Nigeria and Sierra Leone called on him and complained that the Liberian Bureau of Immigration was not honoring the ECOWAS Protocol, especially when Justice Minister Chea Cheapoo publicly expressed his reservations about it.

The Protocol in question was signed in Dakar, Senegal, on May 29, 1979, to which Liberia is signatory.

Moreover, Liberia's Instrument of Ratification of the Protocol was transmitted to Nigeria on April 9, 1980 for deposit.

"No ministry, bureau or agency of the Government of Liberia can, therefore, be discretionary about the observance of the terms and conditions," a Foreign Ministry press release said.

The release said "Minister Matthews regretted whatever inconveniences the failure of the Immigration Bureau to comply with the Protocol might have caused nationals of ECOWAS countries, and the unfortunate declaration by the Minister of Justice."

"The Instrument of Ratification having been formally deposited, becomes a binding obligation of Government," the release concluded.

Liberian Objections to Protocol

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 27 Oct 80 p 2

[Editorial]

[Text]

LAST WEEK ENVOYS of three ECOWAS countries raised querries on Liberia's position with regards to the ECOWAS Protocol relating to the Movement of Persons.

THEY COMPLAINED THAT the Liberian Bureau of Immigration is not honouring the Protocol, especially since the Minister of Justice publicly expressed his reservations about it.

THE FOREIGN MINISTER assured the Envoys that as the Government of Liberia is a signatory to the ECOWAS Protocol, it is obligated to observe the terms and conditions contained therein.

ONE OF THE prime objectives of the formation of regional organizations is to build a bridge of understanding among the peoples of the region; to improve their economic conditions by creating a wider market for their products; to eradicate misunderstanding and suspicions.

FREE INTERCOURSE THUS becomes one of the cornerstones of such an organization.

NEVERTHELESS, HOWEVER FREE this flow or movement of persons may be, it is the responsibility of the member government to protect its citizens, guarantee protection to those who come in and ensure that peace within the context of law and order prevails within the borders.

IT IS WITHIN this framework that the Liberian Immigration Bureau is undoubtedly seeking to carry out its work.

IT SHOULD BE agreed that during the initial stages of the implementation of a Protocol regarding the Movement of Persons, many of those who seek to take advantage of such would be criminals, unemployed and trouble-makers or smugglers.

KNOWN TO BE operating within their own borders, they find new avenues by crossing boundaries and establishing networks in other countries.

GOOD CITIZENS, BUSINESSMEN and tourists who travel under the umbrella of the Movement of Persons are little heard of, but it is the ones whose motives are tainted with criminal intentions that receive wide publicity and thus bring into question the compliance by one government of international agreements subscribed to.

WE THINK THAT apart from the need to blindly comply to such international obligations, it should be obligatory on the part of these member states to supply their respective immigration counterparts names of known criminals, troublemakers and smugglers in order that a watch may be on for them.

INDEED, ECOWAS SHOULD set up a Regional Interpol to serve as a clearinghouse for criminals.

SECONDLY WITH THE effects of world-wide inflation causing serious damage to the economy of developing countries leading to acute unemployment, food shortage and the constant migration of citizens from the rural areas into the urban areas, governments must take steps to contain the situation existing within its own borders.

WITHOUT SEEKING TO disregard its obligations under international agreements, it should nevertheless first provide for its citizens, improve conditions within its borders so that when strangers come in, there would be room for all without prejudice, without red-tape and without suspicion.

AS A PRIME mover for regional cooperation and integration as exemplified by her role in both ECOWAS and the Mano River Union, the Liberian Government will spare no efforts to achieve the objectives these organizations are set out to accomplish.

THERE WILL BE no difference in her pronouncements and performance. Nevertheless, the implementation of these Protocols should be carefully carried out, ground rules solidly laid and close cooperation among the organs concerned of member-states be established in order to safe-guard the interest and security of all the countries concerned and eradicate suspicion and confusion.

OFFICIAL REPORTS ON MBABANE MEETING ON MIGRANT LABOR

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 14 Oct 80 pp 1, 6

> [Text] "When we talk about changing the current migratory system, we mean that our countries' independence must lead to a radical change in that system, since South Africa is no longer dealing with colonies, but with free, independent and sovereign states." So said Teodato Hunguana, minister of justice, yesterday, referring to the central issue discussed at the meeting on migrant labor in southern Africa, held from 7 to 10 October in Mbabane, Swaziland.

Teodato Hunguana substituted for the minister of labor at the meeting, which was also attended by the [labor] ministers of Lesotho, Botswana, Malawi, Zambia, Swaziland and, for the first time, Zimbabwe. Hunguana felt the proceedings went very well. "The meeting was important because it succeeded in going more deeply into the analysis of the problems of the migrant worker. Above all, we began to look at the problem for ourselves, and not on the basis of recipes and formulas perhaps produced by institutions outside the area."

The agenda for the meeting included a study of the problems of recruitment and the living conditions of the migrant workers in South Africa, to find a common formulation and treatment of these issues among the countries that supply the manpower. Another topic was revision of the present system of compensation. The identification of specific development projects to absorb the migratory workers when they are retired from South Africa, as well as the mobilization of international technical and financial assistance in the implementation of such projects, were also topics of discussion.

Regarding the manner in which the discussions were conducted, Minister Hunguana said: "The real dimensions of the problem are beginning to be recognized, that is, in the context of the multifaceted and complex reality of southern Africa."

He added: "The problem is not isolated. The correct solution must lie within the basic strategy which we are assuming in southern Africa and which began to take shape with the meeting of the nine in Lusaka."

The chief of the Mozambican delegation to the Mbabane meeting also linked the problem of migrant labor to the strategy which the nations in the region have begun to define to guarantee and consolidate economic independence, in the face of the strategy of satellite states designed by South Africa to perpetuate its domination of southern Africa.

The measures proposed by the states involved in the issue are not meant to eliminate migratory work, but to abolish the present system based on South African domination. "This system is the target of our struggle; first, because it was designed by the colonialists to serve colonialism and, second, because the system continues to be dominated by South Africa, which always uses it to serve its own needs."

As part of this overall strategy at the level of southern Africa and the measures to be taken, Minister Hunguana divulged that a report on the status of migrant labor will be presented at the next summit meeting of chiefs of state of the nine nations in the region, to take place this November in Maputo. According to the Mozambican government official, this decision was one of the results of the analysis, which pointed to inclusion of the migrant labor problem in the more general question of the economic development of each of the countries involved.

In this context, referring to his address at the Mbabane meeting, the minister of justice said that, if it is successful, this economic development "will [eliminate] the current unemployment and underemployment that makes our economies a source of cheap manpower." In Mozambique's case, "this development will give rise to a manpower shortage, since for us the elimination of underdevelopment in this decade means putting the existing labor force to the fullest use."

Another noteworthy decision of the Mbabane meeting was to confer on SALCO (Southern African Labor Commission) the status of observer for the southern African liberation movements (ANC and SWAPO). To make the commission (constituted by the labor ministers of the member countries) more effective, an executive secretariat was also created. Finally, it was decided that the next meeting will be held in Salisbury in the first quarter of next year.

Regarding SALCO activity, the justice minister noted that it is not meant to establish common standards for all the countries, but to arrive at a "certain level of coordination and harmonization of the policies of the various countries with respect to the problems common to all of us."

During a press conference yesterday, the chief of the Mozambican delegation to the Mbabane meeting expanded on some aspects of this problem, which seriously affects the economic and social policies of the southern African states. He also reviewed the work that is being developed to put an end to South African domination in this respect. In our next edition, we plan to publish a more detailed report on the problem of migrant labor in southern Africa, based on statements by that member of the Council of Ministers and on other documents.

MAPUTO-SALISBURY RAILROAD CONNECTION OPENING

Repairs Completed

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 30 Sep 80 p 1

[Excerpts] On 2 October, railway connections will be resumed between the People's Republic of Mozambique [RPM] and Zimbabwe, via the Limpopo line. At first, the traffic between the two countries will be limited to cargo, but it is expected that passenger service will be resumed shortly, sources connected with CFM-Sul [Mozambique Railways-South] told NOTICIAS yesterday. The resumption of rail traffic between the two neighboring sister nations follows intensive repair operations on the respective lines, which were seriously damaged during Zimbabwe's armed struggle for liberation. The traffic cut-off, however, goes back to 1976, when the RPM decided to apply in full the sanctions decreed by the international community against the British colony of Southern Rhodesia.

Francisco Ilidio Dinis, director of CFM-Sul, left the capital last night to attend the inauguration, accompanied by other railway officials.

In the beginning, shipments will consist of steel and sugar, or one of the products destined for Europe through the port of Maputo.

The reopening of the line marks an important step in the implementation of the accords signed between our country and the young Republic of Zimbabwe. The first steps have also been established for the cooperation that nine southern African countries are working to bring about.

The port of Maputo could come to handle import or export products for Zimbabwe, Botswana, Zambia and Malawi.

Merchandise Traffic

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 2 Oct 80 p 1

[Excerpts] Traffic in merchandise via the Limpopo line between the People's Republic of Mozambique and the Republic of Zimbabwe resumes today, with the transfer of cargo from the two countries at the border station of Chicualacuala. To this end, the first convoy left Maputo last night, carrying about 1,500 tons of fuel for that neighboring country.

Resumption of cargo traffic, which will shortly be followed by passenger transport between the People's Republic of Mozambique and the Republic of Zimbabwe, is of particular importance to the economic relations between the two states.

Resumption of rail activity between the two countries also constitutes an important step in the development of bilateral relations between the nine independent states of southern Africa.

FIRST RESULTS OF PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLIES ELECTIONS

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 14 Oct 80 p 4

[Text] Luanda, 13 Oct--The first deputies elected to the provincial people's assemblies in the People's Republic of Angola were presented to the public on Sunday in rallies held after the electoral conferences, which began on Saturday. The democratically elected deputies who constitute the provincial people's assemblies, the highest government bodies at the province level, will speak for the people during their 3 years in office.

To date, throughout the country, about 940 deputies have been selected in the electoral conferences. They are distributed by province as follows: Cabinda, 54; Zaire, 42; Malange, 54; Lunda-Norte, 53; Lunda-Sul, 55; Moxico, 49; Kwanza-Norte, 71; Kwanza-Sul, 64; Luanda, 82; Benguela, 71; Huambo, 78; Huila, 67; Kuando-Kubango, 49; Mocamedes, 58; Bengo, 60; Bie and Uige (results not yet confirmed) and Cunene, 33. The official results will be announced in the next few days by the National Commission for Institution of Organs of Popular Power, the organ responsible for the electoral process. According to electoral law, the provincial assemblies will meet 30 days after the election of the deputies.

Meanwhile, the National People's Assembly will be announced on 11 November, the anniversary of national independence. The supreme organ of government, the People's Assembly is ruled by the principles of democratic centralism and expresses the sovereign will of the Angolan people.

The process of creating the organs of popular government from Cabinda to Cunene, from the election of the delegates to the electoral conference, by workers from companies representing the various sectors of national life, to the electoral act, was very dynamic. Thousands of workers in these companies elected 6,750 of their comrades as delegates (electors) to represent their interests in the conferences, and about 1,104 candidates for deputy were proposed by rank and file structures of the MPLA-Labor Party, the JMPLA Party Youth and the mass organizations, the UNTA (National Union of Angolan Workers) and the OMA (Organization of Angolan Women).

The candidates for deputy had been presented previously to the factory workers, agricultural cooperatives and military units, and their biographies were publicly posted. They represent various social conditions and ethnic origins, in accordance with the constitutional law, which guarantees that any citizen, regardless of race, social class or religious, ideological or political affiliation, may serve as representative of the Angolan people.

In Cabinda Province, a minister was elected deputy, and in Luanda Province a Methodist bishop was proposed as a candidate. The representatives of the church were invited to take part in the electoral conferences. The Catholic Church did not accept this opportunity to be represented, arguing that "the Catholic faith cannot appear in any organ that defends Marxism-Leninism." In the Huambo rally, Lucio Lara, secretary for organization of the MPLA Labor Party Central Committee, denounced the lies and campaigns orchestrated by internal reactionaries against the organs of popular government. Lara said: "If the interests of the Catholic Church are not defended in the provincial assemblies, it is because the church refused to take part; there was no religious discrimination."

Both in the opening and closing sessions of the provincial electoral conferences and in the rallies to present the delegates to the people, the leaders of the MPLA-Labor Party, vanguard of the Angolan workers class, stressed the great importance and the role conferred on the provincial people's assemblies in directing the social, political, economic and cultural development of the provinces and in deciding issues pertaining to their territory and respective citizens.

They stressed the responsibilities that fall to the deputies in the fulfillment of the deepest aspirations of the working classes, through increased production and productivity to improve living standards, mobilizing the people to resolve supply problems, specifically with respect to energy and potable water. Popular democracy and socialism cannot be achieved without the participation of the working masses in the direction of the government and the society, the speakers noted.

According to the constitutional law of the People's Republic of Angola, "the deputies serve the people and engage actively in the activities of the respective popular assemblies, mobilizing the working masses in the tasks of reconstruction, aimed at building socialism." In sum, the election of the deputies and the creation of the provincial people's assemblies represent an achievement in the construction of a democratic popular government in Angola, a fruit of the irreversible social and economic changes brought about by the Angolan revolution.

UNITED STATES ACCUSED OF WORKING WITH SOUTH AFRICA ON SOUTH ATLANTIC BASES

[Article reprinted from JORNAL DE ANGOLA]

[Text] There are news sources which, although they are somewhat suspect, are trustworthy in certain cases. A case very much in point: a few days ago the British news agency REUTER printed a report from Noel Hughes, its correspondent in South Africa, announcing that the South African racist government will modernize and expand the naval base at Simonstown, on the Cape peninsula, in order to assume its role as protector of the great southern maritime routes.

Just that, no more and no less! The report then describes a visit by a group of foreign journalists to the Simonstown installation, a privilege seldom granted to newsmen. Concluding his report, Hughes notes that, according to racist Prime Minister Pieter Botha, Simonstown is the most modern and best-equipped naval port in the entire maritime region encompassing South America, Australia and the Mediterranean.

Obviously, this unexpected visit by the reporters to the South African base at Simonstown, followed by a full explanation of the "facilities" of that port, was not by change. It was meant to prepare international public opinion for the new maneuvers the imperialists are currently planning in the area.

Some weeks before the opening of the 35th UN General Assembly, diplomatic circles in the United Nations were already virtually confirming that the United States and South Africa had agreed to reactivate their forces to create the much discussed SATO (South Atlantic Treaty Organization), with the participation of several Latin American and African countries.

The North American administration is giving great attention to creation of this military bloc, because it seeks to secure the South Atlantic sea lanes by which the United States moves various imports, specifically, petroleum and other strategic raw materials.

According to the same sources, interpreting the celebrated Directive 59, for which President Carter himself drafted the announcement to prove he was more of a "hawk" than he seemed, Washington is unquestionably planning to expand its forces and its military presence in the Atlantic, particularly in the South Atlantic.

It is clear that, to do this, the United States must have air and sea bases in Africa, and to this end it will do everything possible to cement its alliances with some African countries, namely, Senegal and Gabon. According to these observers, the recent visits by U.S. military missions to various African countries were directly linked to American strategic interests, since the main purpose was to examine the possibility of creating U.S. bases on the west coast of Africa.

Washington is obviously well aware that open participation by racist South Africa in a pact of this nature would be a serious obstacle to the entry of certain African countries. Thus, in a first phase, the U.S. administration will use every means within its grasp to disguise Pretoria's participation in this offensive pact, which could endanger the sovereignty of our continent and the victories already won by the African peoples.

One thing is clear, however. Everything leads to the belief--the racists leaders themselves lead us to understand--that the United States initiated discussions with the Pretoria government to arrive at a separate agreement with regard to the Simonstown base. It is also easy to predict what South Africa will demand in exchange: more support for the pursuit of its terrorist policy, not only with respect to the South African people but also against the African countries that have chosen to help liberate the peoples of Africa.

Despite all these maneuvers, one thing is certain. Africa will be free!

OFFICIAL POINTS TO TECHNICAL, TRADE COOPERATION WITH UK

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 4 Oct 80 p 8

[Text] London, 3 Oct--Pedro Pacavira, secretary of the Central Committee for political-ideological education, propaganda and information, of the MPLA-Labor Party, said Thursday in London that future collaboration between Angola and Great Britain should basically embrace the technical and trade areas.

Pacavira made the statement during a press conference in the British capital, and added that the first Angolan ambassador to the United Kingdom would be appointed shortly.

During the conference, the Angolan official told the newsmen that, from his impressions during his meeting with Lord Gilmore (an individual close to the queen), Great Britain may be exerting efforts to resolve the Namibian problem.

Replying to a question on the status of Angolan-Portuguese relations, the Angolan official indicated his government's astonishment at the "scndalous involvement of certain members of the present Portuguese Government in subversive and collusive pacts with the Angolan puppets and forces of treason."

In this regard, Pacavira said these groups "are apparently dreaming about a rebirth of the old Portuguese colonial empire, and this cannot make the establishment of relations with Portugal any easier."

Meanwhile, Pacavira stressed, the "persecution operations" conducted by the racist Pretoria regime to destabilize southern Africa constitute one of the most serious problems on the international scene.

In his London press conference, Pacavira denounced the broadening of South Africa's influence in Western circles (including Great Britain) that have special interests there.

Referring to South Africa's "neurotic" arms race, apparently pursuing a strategy of intimidation, the Angolan party secretary called it a "natural" attitude and stressed that Angola "will not allow itself to be intimidated."

In this context, Pacavira emphasized the legitimacy and justice of Angola's position on the Namibian problem, within the framework of the UN resolutions.

"We have used our influence," he said, "to bring about a cease-fire agreement, and we accept that such an agreement should be discussed by SWAPO and South Africa, to end the war and allow all those directly concerned in the problem to take part in free elections."

The Angolan leader reaffirmed Angola's support for SWAPO, the legitimate representative of the Namibian people, and for the secretary general of the United Nations, whose efforts have won him the esteem of the Angolan Government.

PDT Initiates Discussions

A delegation from [Brazil's] Democratic Labor Party [PDT], led by its president, Leonel Brizola, arrived in Luanda on Thursday, and today began discussions with the leaders of the MPLA-Labor Party.

The scheduled program for the visit of the PDT representatives also includes the laying of a wreath at the tomb of Agostinho Neto, founder of the MPLA-Labor Party and of the Angolan nation.

The PDT president and the parliamentarians accompanying him will meet with Angolan leaders to strengthen and consolidate the ties of friendship and cooperation between the two parties, the Angolan news agency ANGOP reported. In this regard, Brizola said on his arrival that these ties "create an environment for a relationship that we feel will be a continuing one between our parties and peoples."

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT DESCRIBES CONDITIONS IN SOUTH

Paris LE MONDE in French 11, 12 Oct 80

[Article by Patrice Claude: "Southern Chad: Neither War Nor Peace"]

[11 Oct 80, p 7]

[Text] I. Secession Amidst Chaos

For the first time since the beginning of the battle for Ndjamena on 21 March, the Air Force intervened in the fighting on Thursday, 9 October, when an unidentified jet bombed the capital. On the third day of the "general offensive" of Hissein Habre's Armed Forces of the North (FAN) against President Goukouni Oueddei's People's Armed Forces (FAP), it could well be a question of the decisive battle for Ndjamena.

Elsewhere, Togolese Minister of Foreign Affairs Anani Akakpo-Ahianyo said that the approaching conciliation meeting planned in Lome at Togo's prompting would bring together with the OAU subcommittee (Togo, Benin, Congo and Guinea), the Transitional National Union Government (GUNT) headed by President Goukouni Oueddei, leader of the FAP, and the Command Council of Hissein Habre's FAN. The date of the meeting has not yet been set. Our special correspondent in southern Chad, a zone controlled in principle by Lt Col Wadal Kamougue, vice president of GUNT, describes the troubled situation that prevails in the main cities and reports on the secessionist movement stirring up the region.

Sarh--In southern Chad, from Sarh to Pala by way of Doba, Moundou and Kelo, in that zone which has not experienced war but which does not have peace, the civilians no longer talk with the armed forces. Some tried to do without them in February 1979. "We had to. Lieutenant Colonel Kamougue and his men were fighting in Ndjamena and the area, suddenly overpopulated because of the exodus of southerners from the capital, was totally disorganized. Fraud, a lack of security, extorsion: It was chaos," says Dr Ndem Woyor Ngoidi, the only surgeon in the city of Sarh, almost as an excuse, for it was chaos and worse: a massacre.

At that time, the fighting in Ndjamena was not going well for the "southern Christians." Kamougue's gendarmes and the Chadian Armed Forces (FAT), commanded by another southerner, General Djogo, would soon be defeated. Civil servants in the capital, the vast majority of them from the south, fled the city and went back home, terrified. "The Muslims are murdering our brothers!" As the bloody tales succeeded the terrible accounts, anger seized the population. By mid March, hordes of Sara peasants, normally so peaceful, suddenly went berserk and attacked Muslim districts in Sarh, Moundou and Kelo, looting, burning, killing. "With my own eyes, I saw over 600 bodies of persons slaughtered laid out on the Sarh playing field," one merchant remembers. According to estimates, at least 2,000 Muslims were massacred throughout the south, a large red blot on the "peaceful, good Christian" image that the people of the south want to cultivate.

"To Do Something"

On 7 April 1979, Dr Ngoidi and a number of southern cadres just back from Ndjamena decided "to do something." Thus the first civilian political organization was born in the region of the Moyen-Chari. Its main objective was to reorganize the economic structure, social and administrative services. In order "to restore a climate of confidence, tolerance and understanding between all the sons of Chad, transcending ethnic, linguistic and religious differences," the Moyen-Chari Political Renewal Committee plans to arm militia forces. One might imagine that this is not popular with the military. Lieutenant Colonel Kamougue, back in the south, rapidly contacted the committee and obtained "power to federate the zone." Who could resist the Kalashnikov? The 2.5 million southerners will henceforth be ruled by a veritable government, called the "Permanent Committee."

Lieutenant Colonel Kamougue named himself head of the committee and named Colonel Roasingar, his second-in-command, as vice president.

All powers were concentrated in the hands of the military. To those surprised by this, a civilian member of the government responded: "After all, we are at war. It is normal for the military to control the zone." Not everyone agreed. Another civilian most anxious to remain anonymous said: "The results of the military have been totally negative, even in military matters."

Having become vice president of the Transitional National Union Government (GUNT) that emerged from the Lagos accords in August 1979 and was formed 3 months later, Lieutenant Colonel Kamougue nevertheless does not spend most of his time in his southern fief. The most frequent criticism made of him militarily is that he was unable to unify the armed forces in the area. "Every corps does practically what it wants," complains one government employee.

On the roads, washed out by the rains, that link the cities, barriers have been set up on the outskirts. Gendarmes slowly go through papers and safe-conduct passes. Customs officials rummage through belongings. Further ahead, policemen sift through baggage and look to see whether vehicles are in proper working order. Their meticulousness is surprising when one realizes that all the brush taxis, Peugeots 404 pickups in pitiful condition, generally carry 25 passengers. There remain the "rain barriers," guarded by persons unknown who can detain anyone all day long if they deem that "you cannot travel any further because it is pouring down there."

One might be tempted to praise such a concern for security if all the barriers were authorized and if their main objective were not to ransom travelers. Even in the cities, no one is safe from such blackmail. Recruited into the militia at the age of 14, children bursting with pride at having abandoned their hoes for a semblance of uniform and drunk with their new power, happily indulge in the practice. "The militia here is a synonym for swindling and brutality," says a former newsman for MULA (COMBAT), a small Sarh daily banned by Kamougue in May. "It is a budding Mafia."

Mafia? "We can raise an army of 30,000 men in a matter of hours," says one prefect in the zone. While it is impossible to verify the figure (20,000 men in different forces and some 10,000 soldiers), it is undoubtedly true that "there is no lack of weapons."

On the other hand, one can have serious doubts about the ability of the command to regroup all its forces rapidly and in an orderly fashion, for the lack of discipline, not erected as a survival system, is also widespread in the regular army.

It is a morning like any other in Sarh. At the little airport, an old DC4 spitting oil everywhere awaits permission to take off. Under its wings, a group of soldiers takes refuge from the rain. Inside the plane, two rows of seats are missing, thrown out at the time of the Ndjamena debacle. Only about 30 seats are available. At the boarding ramp, some 50 soldiers in ill-matched uniforms wait to get on. An officer arrives, sees that there are too many and calls out the 30 privileged names. All 50 enter the cabin. The officer insists, then loses his temper. So do the 20 not named. The most determined take their places on the blood-stained carpet. Some are dead drunk and yell for Gala, the local beer. A Kalashnikov is carelessly dropped and falls with a thud to the floor. The soldiers burst out laughing, rub out their cigarettes on the "No Smoking" sign that has just gone on. It takes a full 55 minutes of cajoling and the intervention of the pilot, watch in hand and refusing to take off overloaded, before the plane can move, with two stowaways in the toilets.

It is as difficult to discipline an army that has not been paid for several months as it is to prevent customs officials, also poorly paid, from helping themselves from the trucks that go back and forth between neighboring countries to supply the south.

The war also allows fantasies. "The bad examples come from so high up," laments one young student. Let us pass rapidly over the southern prefect who takes his personal cut out of the food and medicines sent from France to the courageous missionaries still taking care of the people. Others in countries nearby do not even need the excuse of the war to engage in similar abuses!

But what can one say about the members of the Permanent Committee who have themselves called "Mr Minister" -- to the detriment of the real ones! -- and who can be seen drink in hand at the Disco Snob in Moundou, one of the few places in the city which has its own generator in case the city's powerplant should fail (a plant that operates only a few hours each day because of the scarcity of fuel)? What is one to say about the official in the south who is having a fine villa built in Moissala, "his" city?

"The social climate is tense and threatens the political unity of the zone," wrote LE BOUCLIER (Moundou daily) on 23 August. And yet, however condemnable they might be, the abuses of a given village tyrant are not the only causes of the waste and economic mess in the south. This region, which has always supplied 90 percent of Chad's cadres and civil servants for 20 years, now finds its "brains" out of work.

Thousands of jobless veterans unable to return to the fields find their way onto the lists of civil servants. Authorities have the greatest difficulty eliminating from their lists those who are truly active and who therefore receive some pay, albeit irregularly. Bonds formed because of regionalism and tribalism play a heavy role and in order to receive allotments, every possible means is used. The soldiers are not the ones least compromised and among the population, their level of popularity is at an all-time low.

At the end of March, MULA abruptly asked the question: "Should the Permanent Committee be decapitated?" This time it is clear: The people are trying to send Lieutenant Colonel Kamougue and his men back to the barracks. But the vice president of GUNT has not had his final word. Up north, in Ndjamena, he exists only in terms of the south, which he intends "to hold." He must consolidate his power. The restless lieutenant colonel therefore immediately undertook a tour in order to offer explanations and regain control. At the end of April, there was a shakeup of "his government." He punished a few notorious swindlers to serve as an example, banned MULA and for the first time, set up a retroactive "southern budget": 5.2 billion CFA francs for the period from February to December 1980, with 40 percent of all spending reserved for defense. Has "an important step toward the secession of the south" just been taken, as Hissein Habre's fans claim? After all, a budget is but the arithmetic calculation of the cost of all operations to be undertaken. What is the source of the receipts?

[Text] II. When France Schemes....

> The massacres of "southerners" that bloodied the northern region of the country in February 1979 caused a large number of southern cadres, who are predominant in the administration, to try to structure their native region. A Permanent Committee was set up to administer the daily life of 2.5 million southerners and was very quickly controlled by Lieutenant Colonel Kamougue, the strong man of the south. And yet, the army is without discipline, the administration corrupt, the government ineffective and the absence of war has not made it possible, under such conditions, to establish real peace (LE MONDE, 11 October).

Moundou--"Where are you going?" "To Ndjamena.... Well, actually, to Kousseri." "Very well. Get in." The three southerners from GUNT disappear into the reporter's car with their baggage and a sack of rice. They are furious. Colonel Coualant, military attache of the French Embassy in Ndjamena, drawn in from Novotel de Maroua (Cameroon), had just refused them helicopter transportation to Kousseri, 300 kilometers further north. "In order not to annoy Hissein Habre," grumbles a minister. "Because I have very strict orders and because it is not France's job to haul Chadian officials, whatever their field," says the colonel.

The ambiguity of French policy in Chad is in part illustrated by this anecdote.

Long accused, not without cause, of aiding Hissein Habre, the Elysee Palace now seems to have chosen a neutrality so waivering that it may in many ways look discreetly favorable to the south, the "useful country," as it is said in the Ministry of Cooperation. As if there were a "useless" Chad.

In short, Lieutenant Colonel Kamougue, who maintains excellent personal relations with Robert Galley, godfather to one of his children, it is said, has obtained certain forms of support from France, the most discreet of which have turned out to be the most effective.

State Within a State

Concerning finances first of all, the 2 billion CFA francs (1 CFA franc = 0.02 franc) officially requisitioned from the Central Bank in Moundou last year by Lieutenant Colonel Kamougue to pay civil servants (who saw only a tenth of that amount -- "We have to pay the weapons bills") lasted a long time. Taxes levied on the country's five main enterprises can scarcely suffice since those companies practically make no profits. SONASUT [expansion unknown], 80 percent Chadian owned but staffed by some 40 French employees from a subsidiary of the Great Mills of Paris, lost 1.4 billion CFA francs during its second fiscal year (October 1979 to May 1980).

The MCT (Tobacco Manufacturing Company), 83-percent French owned (Job, Bastos, SOFICAL [expansion unknown]), is operating at only 50 percent of its capacity and arbitrary cigarette requisitions are slowly eating away at profit margins. Most of the customers of the Chadian Textile Company (STT) have remained in the north. Inaccessible, Cyclo Chad (75-percent owned by the CFAO [French Company of West Africa]) has also lost many northern buyers and by the end of July, its losses amounted to 60 million CFA francs. A single enterprise is still making profits: the Logone Brewery, which makes the famous Gala beer, "the taste of happiness." But on the one hand, this firm is 80-percent owned by the Dutch firm Unilever and on the other hand, the amortization of investments made last year in Ndjamena for the construction of a plant (looted since then) is eating up all the profits. The net loss for 1980 is an estimated 200 million CFA francs.

Actually, one may wonder how all these enterprises still manage to operate. The question would also be valid for the country's main company, the veritable state within a state which Chad Cotton is, if its political importance were not so obvious. It is difficult to encompass the many activities of the company and its French director does not receive newsmen. Chad Cotton is to the south what Renault is to Mans or Michelin is to Clermont-Ferrand. It is to Chad Cotton that the hundreds of thousands of small planters sell their cotton. It is on its premises that the most highly secret meetings take place between French officials and "southerners." It is Chad Cotton that distributes the infrequent mail to expatriates. It is in its cooperative, "reserved for cadres," that one can buy butter and other European products one cannot find elsewhere. It is Chad Cotton which houses visiting officials in its concession or at local residences in the case of certain members of the Permanent Committee. In short, for Lieutenant Colonel Kamougue, who reportedly escaped one attempt on his life at the end of July, Chad Cotton is the war treasury. But the lode is not inexhaustible.

One can requisition its trucks, fuel or even its small airplane, but one cannot draw on its coffers indefinitely. By April, the company had had to suspend payments. Not a penny was left. Nor was that an obstacle, for the company's president, Madjadoum Kolingar, an aide to Lieutenant Colonel Kamougue, made his request to Paris. The firm's minority shareholder is the mysterious French Company for the Development of Textile Fibers (CFDT, which holds 17 percent of the capital; the Chadian Government, 13 percent). Here, without any doubt, it is "the Elysee Palace which has the funds released,"[1] and some persons recall that Marcel Beaux, formerly ambassador to Ndjamena, was in Moundou with Kamougue in mid April. In short, 1.5 million CFA francs were handed over a little later by the CFDT middleman. Unfortunately for the peasants, it was but a stop-gap measure.

Today, the problem is posed with even more acuteness: Chad Cotton does not have a penny with which to buy the cotton harvests of the coming weeks. It needs some 3 billion CFA francs for the purpose. No private bank is about to supply the sum to a company that is far in debt and furthermore, "the hostage of a faction" in Chad. The solution still depends on the CFDT or the Central Bank, whose official reopening in Moundou Lieutenant Colonel Kamougue has requested "with Goukouni's approval," the Permanent Committee stresses. It is superfluous to say how much everyone in the south hopes for the reopening of that institution, especially the Chadians who anxiously watch their money drained to neighboring countries. But the 150 French people who have remained in the region and operate the enterprises feel the same way. For them, it is first of all a matter of security. "The threats of which we are the victims almost daily are now scarcely veiled," one of them complains.

The memory of the articles in MULA or UNITE-HEBDO (published in Moundou before its banning and replacement by BOUCLIER) evoking, a few months ago, a "Saint-Barthelemy of the French" or reminding the French, "Remember what we did to the Arabs," is still vivid in everyone's minds. Today, those newspapers have disappeared, but the atmosphere is still tense. "If Paris does not allow the bank to be reopened, it will be more difficult to guarantee your security," we are told semi-officially. "As for myself, I have understood. I am going back to Paris."

With Goukouni's Approval

Could it be that France opposes the Chadian request? That would be difficult to understand. Actually, its action in the south sometimes takes on a totally official nature. The only French Consulate in Chad was opened in July in Moundou. Likewise, the four treasury-paymaster's offices summarily set up 2 months earlier in a little white villa on the bank of the Logone in Moundou are very useful to the area, with their canteens stuffed with bank notes. Since April, the French Treasury has reportedly paid out over 2 billion CFA francs in veterans' pensions. Formerly, the paymaster's office was in Ndjamena. Today, the thousand veterans residing in the north have no choice but to go south to Moundou, with all the risks that involves, in order to receive what is due them or else simply give up their retirement pay.

And yet, we were advised by one diplomat well acquainted with Chad not to "draw too many final conclusions from these actions, which are always open to question." "Actually, it is mainly illusions that are distributed. In Paris, no one knows who will finally win this conflict. In the meantime, people scheme and stretch legality, without getting their hands too dirty. You will see that nearly everything we have done in the south: the consulate, paymaster's office, had the written approval of President Goukouni, legal head of GUNT." Even the southern demand for a resumption of cooperation, both in medicine and education, bears Goukouni's seal. "That is a good example of our absence of any policy in Chad. Kamougue has filed cooperation requests with Robert Galley amounting to 7 billion CFA francs. On the instructions of the Elysee Palace, they will perhaps send two doctors and three or four professors, if they find volunteers...."

But does the north not receive the veterans' pensions or any official aid? "We have discreetly proposed to Hissein Habre that there be some cooperation (medicine and education) with him. He accepted provided that an official letter is sent to him in care of Hissein Habre, minister of defense. That is not possible." France therefore acts only in the south, at the risk of encouraging secession. "We cannot all the same leave these people without aid. And I repeat that all the requests of the south are countersigned by a northerner, President Goukouni himself! If he does not realize the risk he is taking, what can we do?"

The president of GUNT is in fact persuaded, as he told us (LE MONDE, 17 September), that Lieutenant Colonel Kamougue has no secessionist aims. Is he making a mistake? The first resolution in the charter of the Permanent Committee reaffirms the "safeguarding of independence, national unity and the territorial integrity of Chad." It also proposes to "fight all forms of excessive regionalism and all the evils from which Chad suffers: tribalism, religious fanaticism and racism." The charter also recommends "the homogeneity, coherence and integration of the system of defense and security of the southern zone" and goes on to come out for a "united, decentralized, lay state." But one must note that this document has never been submitted to the population. "Secession? Everyone in the south thinks about it as an inaccessible dream," says one southern minister who, like his seven colleagues, has no other task in Ndjamena than to be next to President Goukouni, while trying to avoid shells.

Officially, all the politicians representing the opposing factions in Chad are opposed to the setting up of a federation, except for Lieutenant Colonel Kamougue, who has never formally said no. There are many, particularly in the south, who support this idea taken up by Giscard d'Estaing in February 1979: "The south has had enough of paying for this monstrosity called Chad," wrote the author of an article published in the 3 March issue of MULA, before going on to squarely support "a temporary separation of nationalities." "Do you not see that that idea, put out by the French imperialists, will lead to a de facto partition of the country and give greater freedom to regionalism and tribal struggles?" replied a reader.

A federation or not? Torn by the war, Chad has not yet reached that point. Peace must first of all be made. But whatever the case, one may wonder whether a federation inevitably dominated by a more highly populated, richer, more technologically advanced south would not rapidly lead to the emergence of a new FROLINAT. Then everything would begin all over again.

MINISTER DESCRIBES KUWAIT VISIT AS PRODUCTIVE

Djibouti LA NATION DJIBOUTI in French 16 Oct 80 p 5

[Article: "In Kuwait, Mr Barkat Gourad Found his Interlocutors Very Much Aware of Our Concern For Economic and Social Development"]

[Text] After an official 3 day viist to Kuwait at the head of a large delegation, the prime minister, Mr Barkat Gourad Hamadou returned to the capital on Thursday.

When he got off the plane at the Ambouli Airport, where he was welcomed by all the members of the Government Council present in Djibouti and many civil and military authorities, the prime minister declared to the press that his trip to Kuwait had been productive. He emphasized in particular the warm and brotherly welcome he had received and the similarity of the viewpoints on all the areas mentioned in the discussions with the highest Kuwaiti authorities.

In the area of Kuwaiti cooperation, Mr Barkat stated that he found the persons with whom he spoke "well informed and very much aware of our concern for economic and social development." He indicated that Kuwait will finance an economic project relating to port development. This project which is to be financed by the Kuwaiti Development Fund in the form of a long term loan offered in very advantageous conditions, aims at implementing a certain number of improvements in the services of the port of Djibouti to restore vitality to this primordial economic sector; thus the port, whose status will soon be that of an autonomous port, will be equipped with a container terminal.

He also indicated that the Kuwaiti Government, has agreed to finance, in the form of a gift, a social project concerning the most disadvantaged sections of the Djibouti population, in the shape of the building of several hundred welfare residences.

Finally the prime minister indicated that the Kuwaiti government is prepared to supply to the Djibouti Republic its hydrocarbon needs, and high officials of the Kuwaiti Oil Ministry will soon be visiting Djibouti to discuss with the Djibouti authorities the modalities of the cooperation in this sector. In conclusion, we may mention that Kuwait is already financing the implementation of a dairy project in Djibouti which is to be inaugurated very shortly. The call for consultation bids will be sent by the first week of November and a mixed Kuwaiti-Djibouti commission will proceed to study the bids. The consultant appointed will be assigned to prepare a detailed technical study of the files and to launch a call for bids from construction companies and to follow up the project.

COOPERATION WITH UDEAC DISCUSSED--Equatorial Guinea is studying the aspects which could contribute to its admission within the customs and economic union of Central Africa (UDEAC), the first vice president and minister of foreign affairs of Equatorial Guinea, Mr Florencio Maye Ela stated on Monday night. Mr Maye Ela, who is leading his country's delegation to the meeting of the Cameroon-Equatorial Guinea joint commission in the Cameroonian capital, added "we are bound to cooperate with the UDEAC," while speaking to journalists after his audience with President Ahmadou Ahidjo. The UDEAC, it will be recalled, comprises the Central African Republic, Congo, Gabon and Cameroon. The Equatorial Guinea first vice president also stated that his country had broken ties with the POLISARIO Front after the fall of the Dictator Francois Macias, because it did not find any solid basis for maintaining its relations with that movement. It is no secret to anyone that my country has very good relations with Morocco, he added. [Text] [AB041001 Paris AFP in French 0858 GMT 4 Nov 80]

Addis Ababa THE ETHIOPIAN HERALD in English 26 Oct 80 pp 1, 6

[Text]

ASSELA (ENA) — A socialist producers village with an intake capacity of 500 peasants and a water reservoir are being constructed at a point 40 kms West of here at a cost of 500,000 Birr.

The village will take in peasants drawn from 10 peasants' associations in the vicinity and 176 of these are already deployed on the farm. Comrade Tekele Guebre, Deputy General Manager of the Arsi Rural Development Agency, said another 2,500 dependents of the peasant producers will be accommodated on the 2,000 hectare project. He said 128 dwelling units have already been constructed with plans for putting up another 42 units.

Each peasant member will have a self-sufficient home costing an estimated 1,145 Birr each. A grain warehouse costing 10,000 Birr has been already built and there are plans to build a school, a kindergarten, an assembly hall, a market stall as well as a health station and a central revolution square.

The Arsi rural development agency helped the newly settled community by placing 90 per cent of the total farm acreage under cultivation. Crops to be harvested include wheat, barley and peas and beans.

Apart from the 1,000 hectares alloted for farming, 480 hectares will be used for pasture, 20 hectares for irrigation, 100 hectares for afforestation, 80 hectares for housing construction, and 320 hectares for various other uses.

The 80,000 cubic metre water reservoir is in the meantime nearing completion. The 56,452 Birr project is being built 15 kms from the village.

GDR YOUTH BRIGADE--Addis Ababa (ENA)--A group of the Free German Youth (FDJ), named after the renowned late Comrade Werner Lamberz, arrived here yesterday from the German Democratic Republic (GDR) for a ten-week voluntary work campaign in Socialist Ethiopia. This is the second batch to come to Ethiopia on a working campaign as an expression of the solidarity of the GDR youth with the Ethiopian People's Revolution. The 21-member brigade which arrived yesterday will be deployed in the maintenance of agricultural machinery and the harvest campaign in rural areas. The group consists of experts in the maintenance of harvest combiners and tractors, of whom some have already been in Ethiopia with the previous batch. NEW PLACE NAMES--Addis Ababa (ENA)--The Ministry of Interior announced that Robbe had become the new capital of Ticho province and that the district of Sherka had become part of Chilalo province, both in Arssi region. The change of the former provincial capital of Ticho was prompted because of the geographical position of the town that renders it unsuitable for development. Besides the town was relatively far from the other districts of the province. The district of Sherka was incorporated as part of Chilalo also because of the terrain in the district which proved difficult for the construction of roads that can readily be connected with other districts and the provincial capital of Ticho. The change was made in answer to the persistent appeal of the local populace and with the approval of the Council of Ministers, it was learnt. EDITORIAL ADVOCATES STRENGTHENING OF CHIEFS' AUTHORITY

[Editorial: "Chiefs Are a Vehicle for Growth"]

[Text] It is fitting that 45 chiefs were awarded the "Head of State's Commendation". It is fitting, not only because for too long have many people taken chiefs for granted and, as a result, the office of the chief has not only lost influence, but it has become fashionable to throw mud at it, particularly by politicians who argue, wrongly, that in independent Kenya they should always have the last say in all matters at the local level.

The decline of the office of the chief started in the middle of the Sixties, when a lot of national politicians sought to get what they considered "colonial stooges" fired.

Many of the very experienced chiefs who had made the transition from the colonial period were fired at that time, not because they had committed any crime against the Government of independent Kenya or its people, but simply because they did not take sides in the conflicting politics of the time. Many had been trained in the colonial tradition, which, rightly, insisted that chiefs should not take sides in politics since this impaired their objectivity and, therefore, their ability to act as the most important mediators between the people and the Government.

Their role as the initiators of development at the local level would have been seriously compromised if they accommodated the politics. Although this negative impact of the extensive retirements was quickly understood by Government, the damage had already been done. It is believed that some politicians had already got some political activists appointed chiefs and they wrought havoc in the service until they were retired.

It was not until much later that the office began to attract some good candidates. In the honours list, there are both chiefs from the colonial period, who did not get swept under, and others who have been recruited since the Sixties.

The office of the chief should be concerned primarily with development. Of the 45 who were honoured, it is encouraging that 31 were specifically cited for their contribution to development. Within the category of development, the most common reason for the citation was involvement in organising educational Harambee, followed by water projects and cattle dips.

The second major category of awards was security. In some of the outlying locations in North-Eastern, Eastern and Rift Valley provinces, some chiefs have been bearing the brunt of the fight against Shifta and Ngorokos.

Lives have been lost in the process and it is commendable that some of the chiefs have defended the country so honourably. Their example is worth emulating by the rest of the country.

Some four chiefs have been ahead of the rest of the country in enforcing soil conservation and afforestation programmes. It is now recognised that the country will have to put more effort into the conservation of the soil and the forests. The chiefs who have been so honoured should serve as examples to the other chiefs to intensify their activities in this extremely important area of national concern.

The wananchi should also become interested in the problem of conservation and help the chiefs expand the programmes. The war on smuggling and illegal brewing was the basis for the citations of seven chiefs. When such breweries were banned, the country gave very vocal support to the Presidential ban.

Yet in many areas we find that illicit breweries are back in business and are flourishing. Many chiefs know this, yet they have not done anything about it. This practice should end, since unlimited drinking not only destroys the health of the drunks, but causes uncalculable loss to the society which must carry the weight of the ignored and underfed families of those who squander their money on liquor.

It is healthy when a country honours those who do not stay in the public limelight but who make significant contributions to our collective well-being. Their dedication and devotion should be emulated by the rest of us who are made of more base material.

Of all the Government officials, none has closer contact with the wananchi than the chief. He is, therefore, the most important person to make the people understand Government policies as well as letting the authorities know the feeling of wananchi about any Government project.

Mr. Moi's decision to give awards to 45 out of a total of 762 chiefs in the country is a clear indication that he follows their activities closely and knows those devoted to the hard task of spreading the Government gospel to the people.

Presently, the country is going through very important political changes. Of their own free will, the leaders have, for example, decided to do away with all tribal organisations or associations, which tend to divide the people along petty political groupings.

In making sure that the people will truly be united, the chiefs will have a very important role to play in future, making sure that no secret night political meetings take place in their areas without their knowledge. May be the best way for chiefs to work for national unity is for them not to belong to any parochial political groupings, and to make sure that such groupings do not exist here in Kenya.

IRAQ ASSURES KENYA OF OIL

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 23 Oct 80 p 3

[Text] IRAQ will soon supply oil directly to Kenya despite the current Gulf war.

This was said yesterday at a Nairobi press conference by visiting Iraqi Minister of State Hasham A'grawi.

"The Government and the people of Kenya can rest assured that the agreement still stands and, in fact it will soon be implemented," he said.

The Minister is in Kenya to deliver a personal message from Iraqi President Sadam Hussein to President Moi.

He said he was satisfied that President Moi and the Government "now fully understand the war situation".

He recalled that President Moi had recently appealed to the two countries to observe a ceasefire during Idd ul Haj.

The Minister said the Kenyan Head of State had "in fact earlier sent his personal message to President Hussein, but due to poor communication it was not delivered."

He said the message was sent with Minister of State Nicholas Biwott.

Mr. A'grawi gave the background to the war, blaming it on Iran, which, for a long time, "has been carrying out aggressive attitudes within the Iraqi borders."

He said the war broke out when Iran bombed an Iraqi shipping yard and destroyed several Iraqi ships.

After the press conference, Assistant Foreign Affairs Minister Kamwithi Munyi said Kenya wanted an immediate ceasefire and a just solution to end the conflict.

Mr. A'grawi and his delegation arrived in Kenya on Wednesday afternoon. They spent almost the whole of yesterday touring coffee farms. Iraq buys a substantial amount of coffee and tea from Kenya.

The delegation leaves Kenya this morning.

POOR CROPS CONTRIBUTE TO KENYA'S ECONOMIC WOES

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 24 Oct 80 p 36

[Text] The bumper maize harvest predicted earlier this year has not materialised.

Only a small improvement over the 1979 production is expected.

This was revealed by Planning Minister Zachary Onyonka in his half-yearly economic survey, released yesterday.

He explained that poor weather in late August and September led to crop failure in certain Rift Valley areas and this had reduced the expected harvest.

The forecast for maize production was based on surveys conducted in July and August.

Kenya would also be badly hit by the world economic recession next year because of high oil prices accompanied by low prices for coffee and tea.

There were indications, said Dr. Onyonka, that next year could be more difficult than this had been.

Addressing the Press, he pointed out that in Kenya, petroleum prices had more than doubled since May last year and that it would cost twice as much to import crude oil this year for the same quantity as last year.

The Minister said that, developed and non-oil producing countries had to anticipate continuing serious balance of payment difficulties in 1981 because of the high petroleum prices.

He said deceleration of growth in the Kenya economy, which started late in 1978, persisted in 1979 and had spilled over into 1980.

The continuing drought conditions had adversely affected the volume of agricultural output especially tea, cereals, dairy and livestock products.

The Minister said that, although coffee production was expected to increase by 20 per cent, coffee prices were on the decrease in world markets.

Tea prices, he added, had been more stable this year than last but the production of tea was forecast to fall sharply by 22 per cent because of poor rainfall.

On the manufacturing sector Dr. Onyonka said the rationing of electricity in the early part of the year had affected production.

On building and construction, he said that, during the first eight months of 1980, the number of plans approved by the Nairobi City Council fell by 6.3 per cent from 1,976 to 1,909 while their value increased by 17 per cent.

On consumer prices, the Minister said a cost of living rise of 12.7 per cent had been recorded between August 1979 and August 1980 and the rate of inflation was expected to increase further before the end of the year.--KNA

MINERALS SEARCH--A Sh. 20-million geological mapping and mineral exploration project has been launched to cover Samburu and Marsabit districts. Environment and Natural Resources Minister Andrew Omanga said this yesterday while signing an agreement of cooperation with the British Government who will finance a part of the cost. Mr. Omanga said the Kenya Government had received a Sh. 10.6m grant from the British. It covers technical aspects of the project. He said the British would also provide four geologists and a cartographer to give Kenyan counterparts on-the-job training while the mapping and exploration goes on. The grant also covers post-graduate training for Kenyans, and the provision of four Land-Rovers, station wagon and a four-wheel drive truck. The Minister said the area to be mapped covered over 100,000 sq. km. in north-central Kenya Kenya. Mr. Omanga signed for the Kenyan Government while the British High Commissioner to Kenya. Mr. John Williams signed for his government. ENVOY RECALLED--The Kenyan High Commissioner in Kampala and his staff have been recalled due to worsening insecurity. This was said in Parliament yesterday by Foreign Minister Robert Ouko. He was replying to a question from Kitutu East MP Abuya Abuya. Dr. Ouko explained that following the collapse of the East African Community, the Nyayo Government had decided to establish a High Commission in Kampala. He said while accommodation was being sought, problems started in Uganda. The Government then thought it wise to recall the diplomatic staff for security reasons. The High Commissioner and his staff will stay in Nairobi until a suitable office and accommodation are found. Dr. Ouko assured the House that Kenya would not be used as a platform for hostile propaganda against foreign governments. "This is because Kenya believes in good neighbourliness and that is why the Kampala High Commission was established." [Excerpt] [Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 23 Oct 80 p 1]

DOE ISSUES FIVE-POINT ORDER REGARDING BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION

Monrovia THE REDEEMER in English 28 Oct 80 p 3

[Text] Head of State M/Sgt. Samuel K. Doe has advanced five points for the proper implementation of the budget for fiscal year 1980/81 in Executive Order Number 15, issued here on Wednesday, October 22, 1980.

The Ordinance deals with a request for additional funding, payment of utility bills, allotments, expenditure control and budgetary transfers.

Under request for additional funding, M/Sgt. Doe said "due to the present deficit in the Budget for fiscal 1980/81", and Government's commitment to the International Monetary Fund (IMF) to hold the overall deficit at $75M, all ministries and agencies are directed to desist from requesting additional funding.

He said that no request for additional funding should go to him or to the Budget Bureau since infact there were no reserve accounts in the budget from which such fundings could be provided.

On the payment of utility bills, the ordinance directed all Ministries and Agencies to submit breakdowns of their utility appropriations including electricity, water and Sewer and Broadcasting to the Budget Bureau and the Ministry of Finance.

Ministries and Agencies are also asked to attach their quarterly allotment requests, vouchers representing quarterly advance payments of their utility bills when submitting their breakdowns to the Finance Ministry.

The ordinance said such payments would be charged to each agency's account to ensure that public corporations remained viable.

There would be strict control of expenditures by allotments of budgetary appropriation for each ministry or agency of government for each budgetary item, the ordinance said.

It said such allotments shall be issued quarterly in advance, based on the allotment ceiling communicated to the Director of Budget by the Ministry of Finance prepared on the basis of cash projections.

Under the allotment scheme, the budget director would circulate a list of conditions that must be fulfilled prior to the issuance of allotments.

Requests for allotments for development expenditure would be made through the Ministry of Planning and Economic Affairs, after consultation with the concerned agency or ministry under the scheme, said the ordinance.

The ordinance said under no circumstances would expenditures exceed allotments.

It said each agency of government would keep adquate records of accounts, expenditures and balance of allotments or appropriations, and shall under no condition institute expenditure in excess of its allotments or appropriations.

Officials of government are absolutely forbidden to incur obligations on behalf government unless the expenditure concerned is provided for in approved appropriations.

Any official who violates this order will be dismissed from office and prosecuted for misdemeanor, the Ordinance added.

The AD Hoc Budget Committee, comprising the Ministers of Finance, Planning and Economic Affairs, the Budget Director and Auditor General, which meets monthly, would review instances of extra-budgetary expenditures and report findings to the Head of State.

Under the expenditure control scheme, all ministries and agencies of Government, excluding the armed forces and the Security Service, are directed to present lists of names of personnel occupying the positions in the budget for fiscal 1980/81 to the Bureau.

Ordinance No. 15 said prior approval must be obtained from the Budget Bureau and the Civil Service Agency for the change in payroll status of any employee, and that the Ministry of Finance would not authorize payment except the change is accompanied by a properly executed personnel action notice.

Ordinance 15 said agencies of government could flexibly operate within major codes of the current budget in the absence of budgetary transfer.

It, however, said spelt out minor codes including rents, utilities, drugs, medical materials and supplies, food supplies to schools and hospitals, gasoline and medical equipment are to remain intact because of their contractual nature.

In the event of a need to use funds from one major code to another, such request must be made to the Budget Bureau for disposition through a budgetary transfer after thorough analysis and scrunity, the Ordinance said.

The Ordinance stressed that no unused salaries would be considered as savings for transfer to other areas of expenditure because of the overall defecit of $75M, which includes the uncovered gap of $25.7M in the Budget.

Therefore, it said, transfers from one major code to another should not be encouraged.

However, where the budgetary transfers are considered essential, the requests should be made in writing to the Director of the Budget by the head of the ministry or agency concerned for preparation by the Budget Bureau.

The Budget Bureau would analyse the request and recommend is for the approval of the Minister of Finance if found necessary, the Ordinance 15 concluded.

GOVERNOR'S CHARGES OF PRC HARASSMENT OF CITIZENS REFUTED

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 27 Oct 80 p 3

[Text]

Armed Forces Deputy Commanding General, Col.Larry W. Borteh, has refuted allegations by the Governor of New Krutown, Francis Kloh Fukah that the citizens of the borough were being harassed by some senior members of the PRC.

Speaking to newsmen on Friday Col. Borteh said Governor Fukah's statement was false, baseless; and aimed at discrediting the image of the PRC.

Governor Fukah had alleged that some senior PRC members were in the constant habit of visiting new Krutown at night and beating and insulting the people without any justifiable reason.

Refuting the allegation, Col. Borteh said the PRC stoo for justice, and fairplay, and it respected constituted authority.

"Its members would do nothing contrary to the aims and objectives of the revolution", Col. Borteh said.

He said the Governor's refusal to disclose the names of the council members involved, indicated that his statement had no grounds.

Col. Borteh also refuted allegation by Mr. Fukah that two senior PRC members had stormed his office, demanding deeds they claimed belonged to the former governor of the borough, John Naklen.

Col. Borteh said there were reports that Mr. Fukah was in fact in the habit of changing individuals fees for deeds.

The Deputy Commanding General then appealed to Governor Fukah to desist from such acts as land deeds registration was to be carried out only by the Ministry of Lands and Mines.

DOE THREATENS FOOTBALL TEAM WITH JAIL FOR POOR PERFORMANCE

Monrovia THE REDEEMER in English 29 Oct 80 pp 1, 6

[Excerpt]

MASTER Sergeant Samuel K. Doe said yesterday that members of the Lone Star, the National Football Team, will go to jail if they perform poorly in any international match.

The Head of State and Chairman of the PRC said that as long as he remains Head of State, he would not like to see the Lone Star defeated in any international encounter.

The Lone Star drew one-all with the national team of Mali on Saturday in a friendly match. The odds were against the Malian side, but the homesters failed miserably to take advantage.

The Liberia News Agency (LINA) quoted the Liberian Leader as saying: "My reason for identifying with the National Team at all times is to demonstrate my interest in the development of sports in Liberia."

Since the inception of the April 12 Revolution, Sergeant Doe and other members of the PRC and the Cabinet, including Vice Head of State Weh Syen, Commanding General Quiwonkpa and Planning and Economic Affairs Minister Tipoteh, have at one time or another actively participated in football matches at the Antoinette Tubman Stadium as a means beefing up sports in the country.

The Master Sergeant told sportsmen and sports authorities yesterday that sports should not be given "scanty attention."

He made these statements at the Ministry of Labour, Youth and Sports where he had gone to look into the cause of the one-all draw with the Malian national team on Saturday.

The Head of State said since members of the Lone Star are on the Government's payroll, they must devote their time practising.

He also said that those players doing part-time jobs should be excused by their employers to enable them to practise.

He directed Labour, Youth and Sports Minister Fred Blay to find means of sending for all former Lone Star players who are doing undergraduate studies abroad.

MINISTER NOTES EFFECTS OF OIL PRICE INCREASES ON ECONOMY

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 27 Oct 80 p 8

[Text] Oil prices are likely to go up some more because of the effects of the Iraqi-Iranian War.

Explaining why this is so, Planning and Economic Affairs Minister, Dr. Togba-Nah Tipoteh, said that among other things, oil fields have been destroyed and/or crippled.

The oil prices decisions made recently by OPEC (Organization of Oil Exporting Countries) are further indications of the likelihood of oil prices to be increased.

Dr. Tipoteh said that at this time when the Government, under the leadership of M/Sgt. Samuel K. Doe, has undertaken the onerous task of national reconstruction, it becomes imperative for the people of Liberia to be appraised of this important commodity and its consequences and effects not only on us, but also on all peoples throughout the world.

He noted that over the years and around the world, oil prices have always been and are still set by the OPEC countries, majority of whom lie in the Persian Gulf area where the largest supply of oil comes from daily.

The following are further explanations given by Dr. Tipoteh:

As known, whenever there is an increase in the price of oil, there is an increase in our daily spending due to the multiplier effect which the uses and by-products of oil have on us.

If we take a look at the current situation facing us now, we will find that the world is faced with a veritable time-bomb in the "Gulf" - The war between Iran and Iraq in the Persian Gulf. These two countries alone were exporting over 3,000,000 barrels of crude oil per day up to July this year.

Despite the fact that there has been recent increases by OPEC, just the other day Kuwait increased its price by $2.00 per barrel unilaterally and it is expected that the other OPEC members will follow suit very soon - and for many reasons. The area from the Gulf of Oman through the Strait of Hormuz to the Persian Gulf is the most volatile area in the world today.

As a direct result of this war, many of the shipping companies have either refused to send their ships back to the Gulf or refused to send them at all.

For those who take the risk in sending their ships, the costs are absolutely astronomical as a result of the unavoidable adverse direct costs such as: Payment of war risk bonuses to attract those who are prepared to go; increases in ocean freight rates; hikes in marine insurance coverage which is up about 5-6 times over the current price, the accumulation of these variables are passed on to the buyers /sellers and consequently in the long run to the ultimate user - the consumer.

Every nation in the world is affected by this very severe crisis today, and at the moment, there is no ready solution in light.

Liberia is, as compared to other West African and African countries, rather fortunate when it comes to the prices of petroleum products

It has practically the lowest prices for these products in the area. But with Iraqi-Iranian War, the American hostages in Iran, an uneasy peace in the Middle East, the uncertainty of American Politics until the outcome of the Presidential elections in November, it is hoped that prices will roll back or hold constant.

Such thoughts tend to be wishful thinking and quite illogical. But, then what do we look forward to?

The recommendation was made by the PRC [People's Redemption Council] committee on commerce, industry and transportation in a memorandum to Head of State Doe yesterday. The memorandum resulted from a result by the head of state that the PRC committee on commerce should submit to him its observations on the current gasoline situation and the $2 a barrel increase in Saudi Arabia's crude oil. FJKM MEETS TO DEFINE ROLE, POSITION OF CHURCH

Tananarive MADAGASCAR-MATIN in French 12 Sep 80 pp 1, 2

[Article by R. J. A.: "Seventh General Synod of FJKM Opens in Arivonimamo. Role and Position of the Church in Present Day Society"]

[Text] To preach Christ, Strength and Wisdom of God: it is under this very important topic drawn from the letter of the apostle Paul to the Corinthians that the Seventh General Synod of the FJKM [Federation of Churches of Jesus Christ in Madagascar started its meeting yesterday in Arivonimamo to try to define once more the role and position of the Church in present day society, which wishes to be fair and equitable within the framework of the Malagasy socialist revolution.

In fact, more than 300 delegates representing the regional synods of the six regions are participating in this general synod, which is held every 2 years in a different location. The meeting allows the participants to better specify the problems that the Church is running into in its commitment and its will to better serve its fellow man while preaching the "good news" of He who brought it to the world.

This commitment of the Church is becoming increasingly important at this time when one speaks a great deal about the resemblance of the goals of religion to those of socialism in creating a new society of justice and equity. President Didier Ratsiraka in person upheld this concept during a very worthwhile interview that he granted to political reporters from Antenna 2 French television in Paris only a few days ago. To explain the Church's commitment to the progress of the development of man, and of all men, the chief of state also recalled on this occasion the orthodoxy of the "communism ahead of its time" of the first Church, which had placed its possessions among the people and that no one was poor within it (Acts of the Apostles: chapter 5, verses 30-35).

Since the general synod is the highest body of the FJKM, it allows everyone to publicly report what was done and what is still not among the propositions accepted during the previous synods. It is also an opportunity for the faithful who represent their parishes to ponder over the actions that still remain to be accomplished in the light of these reports that mark an important general assembly of this type. The topic chosen for each synod shows the strong resolve of the FJKM to move ahead --always ahead--in achieving its "share of servitude," to again use the word dear to the apostle Paul in his letters to the first Christians of his time.

May the general synod that is being held in Arivonimamo contribute to the country's development within the framework of this solemn commitment of the Church (FJKM) to "preach--as did the apostle Paul--Christ, Strength and Wisdom of God," despite the difficulties and other obstacles inherent in any act of liberation. And may it, together with the socialist revolution, build the new society.

REPORT ON VITM IDEOLOGICAL RENEWAL PROGRAM

Tananarive MADAGASCAR-MATIN in French 6 Sep 80 pp 1, 7

[Article by R. J. Antananarivo: "Ideological Activities at VITM"]

[Text] The Toliary region was recently visited by the politbureau, Vonjy Iray Tsy Mivaky [VITM]. In fact, Ambovombe Androy was the rallying point for all the southern partisans to attend and participate in the ideological training session for leaders presided over by the CSR [Supreme Revolutionary Council] head Razanabahiny Marojama, accompanied by Jean Desire Etono, Andre Fenomila, B. Rasolomaranantsoa, elected VITM members led by the president of the permanent committee of the Toliary region.... This training session, the second of its type this year brought together around the Vonjy leader, Dr M. Razanabahiny, a large crowd and achieved a strong success. The basic aim is to equip ideologically, to train and educate the leaders politically and technically, in short to "instruct the instructors" so that they can properly take up their responsibilities, clear up public opinion, reassure the public of the revolution's certain triumph and really be good soldiers in the service of the RSM [Malagasy Socialist Revolution].

The national president, with his usual zest, for 3 days then threw himself into an ideological sensitizing session. After having explained the constitution and defined Malagasy socialism, he expanded on the general policies of his party, whose basic objective is:

--To see all his countrymen united and interdependent, without which no progress is possible.

--To promote the specific characteristics of the Malagasy people: ideology, thinking and behavior in the Malagasy style, in a word "Malagasy essence." The VITM party leader cited some proverbs already embraced by our forefathers to explain his subject: "Ny mita-betsy lanin'ny mamba. Akanga maro tsy vakin'amboa..." [translation unknown] He emphasized above all national unity.

--Unity of all the Malagasy people.

--Unity and militant solidarity of all the revolutionary groups affiliated with the FNDR [National Front for the Defense of the Revolution]. "The political passions--passions of class, race, nationality--are of all passions those which are most divisive," Razanabahiny said resolutely. "This is why we, the Vonjy, determined to build a new free and independent life, to follow the policies developed by President Didier Ratsiraka, we are carrying out the duty of preaching national unity, the pledge of true progress in the socialist path that we have chosen," he added.

--Finally, solidarity with our progressive brothers throughout the world.

After having spoken about the party structures (the various hierarchies), about its "methodology" (the meetings, their methods), about party discipline (principle of people's justice) and about financial matters, Razanabahiny gave the floor to a member of the technical bureau, Andre Fenomila, who explained what we must know about the elections (with supporting concrete examples). Then the representatives of the national bureau of women and young persons also participated in this sensitizing session to better and more profitably train the instructors of the Toliary region VITM.

Finally, after the "question and discussion period," national president Razanabahiny Marojama outlined the qualities that the good militant should acquire, the true revolutionary aware of his duties, "the true apostle" in the service of the people and of the nation. And he extended advice to all the trainees; he launched an appeal for Madagascar to be one and indivisible, and the ordinary people productive for the ultimate triumph of the RSM. Dr Razanabahiny concluded, with his usual spirit, "May the Vonjy militants never be struck by these three serious diseases with their shrill tendencies: the verbosity bug, the demagogy bug and the complexity bug, in short (none of this wordiness, just move right away to actions, work and dare to apply in practice what one has learned theoretically for the best development of our revolution, under the guidance of comrade President Didier Ratsiraka)."

Towards A Provincial Training Session for VITM Women

After having made a detour to Tolagnaro and Tsihombe..., the VITM's No 1 man returned to Antananarivo, last Sunday, with his wife, Yvonne Razanabahiny, honorary president of the women union, enhanced by his presence the lunch concert organized by the women of the central committee, led by their general secretary Monique Andrianaivo. The large reception hall of the Ivato INPF proved too small to hold the several hundred guests. Mrs Andrianaivo, the first leader of the VITM women, explained the objective of this political meeting. The day's receipts will be directly deposited into the central committee's treasury to better organize the large provincial training session for women that will take place in Antananarivo on 12, 13 and 14 September, and in which hundreds of militants from all over the region will take part. In his talk, CSR head Razanabahiny congratulated the women of the central committee on their activities and emphasized the importance of this training session--ideological, of course--for which reasons he entrusted the officers of the central committee with taking charge of it. Mrs Yvonne Razanabahiny appealed to her militant sisters with advice for this training session to be successful.

The family meal took place in a relaxed and warm atmosphere and with a background of well-appreciated music, interspersed from time to time with sales of products and folkloric dances performed by the Fela-Tatamo troop of Andraisora.

In conclusion, we point out that the minister of Public Offices, Dr Celestin Radio, accompanied by Jean Desire Etono, W. Andriamandrantosoa, members of the cabinet, as well as Mr Telanosy, secretary general of the SRMM (a union affiliated with the VITM) also presided over this union's training session, which was held in the capital of the Betsileo country....

REPORT ON ARMY'S ROLE IN DEVELOPMENT PROJECTS

Tananarive MADAGASCAR-MATIN in French 13 Sep 80 pp 1, 5

[Article: "FAP [People's Armed Forces] and Development: Complete Review of Military Projects Made by the Prime Minister, Colonel D. Rakotoarijaona"]

> [Text] To make a complete review of FAP development projects, the Prime Minister, Col Desire Rakotoarijaona (in uniform) went yesterday morning to Tsimbazaza, to open the meeting of the Military Development Committee whose second regular session for 1980 is beginning....
> Faithful to the Red Book and to the policy set down by President Didier Ratsiraka, leader of the Malagasy socialist revolution and commander in chief of the army, Chief of Government Rakotoarijaona made a speech that omitted nothing and that shows that our FAP perfectly handles the double mission that is entrusted to it: defense of the country's territorial integrity, the maintenance of social peace on the one hand, and fighting against underdevelopment on the other hand.
> You will read below the ANTA ("Taratra" National Information Agency) report and on page 5 the prime minister's whole speech in Malagasy.

Antananarivo. The second regular session of the Military Development Committee (CMD) for the current year of 1980 began yesterday morning at the Palace of the People's National Assembly in Tsimbazaza. The opening ceremonies were marked by two speeches made in succession by the president of this fifth establishment of the RDM [Democratic Republic of Madagascar], Col Edouard Rabeony and the prime minister, chief of the government, Col Desire Rakotoarijaona, who was representing the chief of state. The various state institutions contributed to the rest of the representatives at this ceremony: ANP [National Popular Assembly], CSR [Supreme Revolutionary Council], Government, HCC and decentralized collectives from the Antananarivo region.

The Malagasies Do Not Consume Enough Fish

After reading namely the convocation decree and the order of the day of this second session, CMD president Colonel Rabeony first emphasized that after celebrating with splendor the fifth anniversary of the Malagasy socialist revolution, the battle continues, because there is still a lot to be done. Speaking then of the various points of the order of the day, Rabeony made clear the importance of sea fishing considering the fact that Madagascar is an island and that the sea surrounding it contains a lot of riches, especially fish, which the Malagasies do not consume enough. This point, moreover, was already studied during the previous session, which shows its importance in the national economy and the socialist plan.

As for animal breeding, this field is not unknown to us, because the Malagasy people have been practicing it for a long time. But in the face of difficulties encountered in supplying meat to the people as well as to local industries, the CMD was invited to study the reasons for the small increase in bovine cattle (0.78 percent a year while the annual number of animals slaughtered has risen to 1,050,000 heads) and to thus put forward suggestions.

Before concluding, President Rabeony urged the CMD members to get to work immediately.

Progress in Law and Order

In his turn, Prime Minister Rakotoarijaona, after having conveyed the militant greetings of President Ratsiraka, first stated that the celebration of the fifth anniversary of the revolution and of the 20th year of the national army should stimulate our zeal in the battle that we are waging.

Colonel Rakotoarijaona then recalled the various areas that are seeing the participation of the FAP in national life: peace and law and order, social production... Thus, after having emphasized the impossibility of development without the establishment of peace, Rakotoarijaona said that since 1975 up to the present day positive progress was noted regarding peace and law and order, with the revolutionary powers having adopted the principle of dialog to solve the problems that can appear. The chief of government however deplored the continuing existence in certain regions of the island of the plague that is the theft of oxen, which practice is out of fashion in the present revolutionary age and against which efforts have already been undertaken.

Prime Minister Rakotoarijaona stated that since the start of this year the battle against thefts of oxen and bush fires has been waged jointly and that 100 million Malagasy francs are dedicated to this aim. Since May, he said, an operation known as "Danga" has been carried out through the island. It consists of sensitizing the people about the need to protect the national forest heritage from destruction on the one hand, and on the other hand to explain that using fertilizers and planting certain types of fodder, such as stylosanths, can favorably replace a burned pasture and that, moreover, these methods provide fodder even during the cold season.

At the present time, government chief Rakotoarijaona continued, nearly 600 persons from the FAP, the Ministry of Rural Development and the land reform, as well as from "mobile divisions" are scattered in 31 fivondronana to conduct this operation.

The Transport Regiments

Regarding the actions of the FAP to benefit economic development, Prime Minister Rakotoarijaona first mentioned the 100,000 hectares of cultivation that OMIPRA (Military Office for Agricultural Production) is taking care of, for a yield this year of 750 tons of rice in the husk. Operations for clearing new lands are continuing. President of the Republic Ratsiraka, supreme chief of the army, moreover gave orders to extend cultivation of coffee, clove and vanilla.

Regarding the transporting of products, Colonel Rakotoarijaona recalled the great role played by the "transport regiments" that at the start totaled only 10,000 tons and achieved 120,000 tons for the first 6 months of this year. But we still must make a great deal of effort, he emphasized, as much as production has increased this year. And before the rainy season, 25,000 tons of rice are waiting to be removed, which has led the revolutionary powers to decide to use the administration's large trucks in this wide-ranging operation. It will be the responsibility of the services holding these trucks to organize well the round trips of these vehicles in the collection centers, in such a way as not to disturb their own daily activities. We purchased 1,000 trucks from the GDR. A first lot of 130 trucks will arrive on the 20th of this month. It goes without saying that the "transport regiments" will be equipped.

But these vehicles will become damaged quite rapidly without sufficient maintenance of the roads, the prime minister said, thus mentioning the FAP's activities in road support services. Thus, besides the budget (1.132 billion Malagasy francs) allocated by the Ministry of Defense to road maintenance, an agreement providing an endowment of equipment for the military engineers was also signed. The Ministry of Public Works signed an agreement for 1.8 billion Malagasy francs to buy equipment for the maintenance of roads. Regarding social matters, chief of government Rakotoarijaona cited the participation of young persons of the National Service in the battle against the illicit raising of prices.

To do this work they went through a period of instruction. And prime minister Rakotoarijaona denounced the corrupt practices that certain offenders are attempting to use, while warning them that these practices are liable to persecution.

Before concluding with sea fishing, the government chief advocated modernization in the fields of animal raising and agriculture, in order to make concrete the passage of the Boky Mena, which aims at self-sufficiency in the 21st century. The CMD [Military Development Committee] is thus asked to study this question.

Finally, regarding sea fishing, the chief of state's representative emphasized the important place that the natural riches contained in the sea will have in our economy in the year 2000 if we succeed in utilizing them.

We recall that this second regular session of the CMD, which is an advisory body, will last 14 days.

MACHINE FOR COTTON PRODUCTION--Twenty-seven Agricultural Field Assistants drawn from the upper land cotton growing areas in the Southern Region are attending a two-day course at Lunzu Agricultural Training Centre on maintenance and the use of a new spraying machine known as 'Water based ultra low volume spraying machine.' The course, which ends this Wednesday, has been organised by the Union Carbide Limited and Department of Agricultural Research whose officials are teaching Field Assistants how to operate and maintain the new machine. The theme of the course is 'Increase cotton production in the Region through the use of the ultra-low volume spraying machine.' A representative of Union Carbide, Mr. E. Kaunda said that it was observed that spraying is one of the main tasks in farming operations. The machine could be used easily because it was light and needed less water, less chemicals and less energy, he added. Mr. Kaunda said that the modern machine was recommended by the Ministry of Agriculture in 1972 because it was light and farmers would be able to operate it with less labour, and they would be encouraged to increase acreage of their farms. The Field Assitants would introduce the machine and encourage the farmers to use it, he added. The Field Assistants are drawn from Zomba, Mangochi, Machinga, Mwanza and Blantyre Districts.--MANA [Text] [Blantyre DAILY TIMES in English 29 Oct 80 p 1]

MACHEL STRESSES OFFICERS' RESPONSIBILITIES

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 3 Oct 80 p 1

[Excerpts] Beira, 2 Oct (from our correspondent Atanasio Dimas)--"Our officers cannot compromise with the enemy, their commitment is to the people." This was the assertion by Samora Machel, commander in chief of the FPLM (Armed Forces of Mozambique), speaking this afternoon at a ceremony in which he presided over the presentation of stripes and commissions to officers of our army.

President Machel arrived in this city late this morning. He was welcomed at the local airport by Jorge Rebelo and Mariano Matsinhe, members of the Permanent Political Committee of the FRELIMO Party Central Committee.

Speaking after the presentation of stripes and insignia to the officers, President Machel noted that, in the FPLM, the presentation of stripes and insignia is not a prize to those who took part in the armed struggle for national liberation, those who drove back the imperialist forces attacking our country or those who, even today, continue to break up the armed gangs that operate on our territory. "The presentation of commissions, stripes and insignia serves the development of the Mozambican Armed Forces," said the highest leader of the Mozambican revolution.

Machel said that our army is now strongly disciplined, that this discipline is an integral part of the lives of our officers, sergeants and soldiers, and that it was this same discipline which enabled us to rout the enemy.

"Our officers are the first to sacrifice and the last to benefit," said President Machel.

He added that the enemy the officers now graduating will have to face is more subtle; it is invisible. "Therefore," he said, "these officers will have to be incorruptible. Our enemy is now our brother who is reactionary, who is anti-FRELIMO. Our enemy is our sister, who is the prostitute we do not report," said Machel, adding at another point in his speech: "Our officer cannot be immoral; he cannot be a bum."

"Now the enemy makes your mind his base of operations. He does his writing sitting there inside your head; he bathes inside your head, and while he is bathing he [relieves himself] there in your head and it comes out your mouth," Machel explained.

"Let us be implacable; let our army be a bulwark of steel, incorruptible and combative," said the chief of state.

President Machel discussed one of the ways the army serves our people. He noted that officers should take part in the elimination of bandits in this city. He outlined a directive: "Starting now, life in Beira must change. There are a lot of bandits here. When is this going to stop? Let's feed our bayonets. Each bullet liberates each of us, while it liquidates the enemy. The people are always right. The people must be defended. In defending the people, you strengthen the policy of the party. You will be advertising by your action, in practice, the correctness of the political line of FRELIMO."

Concluding his address, President Machel said all the Mozambican people were honored by the presence at that ceremony of Jose Eduardo dos Santos, president of the MPLA-Labor Party and the People's Republic of Mozambique, leader of a brother party of FRELIMO and a brother country of the People's Republic of Mozambique.

In the evening President Machel gave a reception at one of the city's hotels for all the graduating officers and some guests. The president of Angola also attended the reception.

BRITAIN, SUDAN, FINLAND AMBASSADORS PRESENT CREDENTIALS

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 6 Oct 80 pp 1, 3

[Text] In ceremonies last Saturday at the Presidential Palace, ambassador-designates John Stewart of Great Britain, Kamal al-Makki of the Democratic Republic of Sudan, and Rista Kuappi of the Republic of Finland presented their credentials to Samora Moises Machel, president of the People's Republic of Mozambique. Jose Oscar Monteiro, minister of state in the presidency and deputy minister of foreign affairs, was present at the ceremony.

On that occasion, President Machel welcomed the new ambassadors and stressed the need to develop the bonds of cooperation and friendship between our country and the countries represented there.

Speaking informally during his meeting with the new British ambassador, President Machel emphasized that the People's Republic of Mozambique would make every effort necessary to establish and improve relations of cooperation between Great Britain and Mozambique. He recalled the role played by the former British ambassador in the Zimbabwean issue during the struggle for liberation of the people of Zimbabwe.

In turn, John Stewart stressed the fact that as representative of Great Britain and its people, he was prepared to help strengthen the existing relations of cooperation between the two countries.

On being received by the highest leader of the Mozambican revolution, Kamal al-Makki, ambassador of the Democratic Republic of Sudan, referred to the efforts of FRELIMO and the Mozambican people in the struggle for peace and social progress, noting Sudan's admiration for the role played by the FRELIMO Party and the Mozambican people in the struggle against imperialism. The Sudanese diplomat added that the struggle of the Mozambican people against imperialism had demonstrated to the Sudanese people Mozambique's determination to build a new society.

Responding to the Sudanese ambassador, President Machel said: "We recognize that the Sudanese and Mozambican people share a similar past. In 1978, we experienced the ardor of the Sudanese people in the OAU." President Machel stressed that the representative of the Sudanese people would receive all the necessary support from Mozambique for the establishment of good relations of cooperation and friendship between the two countries and peoples.

Rista Kauppi, the Finnish ambassador, was the last to present his credentials to President Machel. On that occasion the president referred to the ties of friendship binding the People's Republic of Mozambique to the Republic of Finland, noting the cooperation between the two countries in the areas of agriculture and construction, particularly with respect to the forestry industry.

The Finnish ambassador spoke of the steps already taken to plant forests in some zones of our country, reporting that this week he would be establishing contacts with government departments here to set up new projects to this end.

DOS SANTOS REPORTS ON VISIT TO GDR

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 9 Oct 80 p 5

[Excerpts] In a press conference yesterday, Marcelino dos Santos, secretary of economic policy of the FRELIMO Party Central Committee, analyzed the importance of developing relations of friendship and cooperation among socialist countries, on a correct basis of equality, aimed at mutual reinforcement, coordination of experiences and adjustment of opinions and positions to advance the development of socialism. Dos Santos met with the press to report on the visit by a People's Assembly delegation to the German Democratic Republic. In this regard, he announced that this contact at the interparliamentary level introduces a new stage in the existing relations between our two countries.

Describing the major views and experiences garnered on this visit, the high official stressed their importance, not in the sense that we intend to transplant the experiences of other peoples to our revolution, but in the sense of reflecting on their experiences and seeing how things were when they began to build socialism and how they handled the problems facing them, since the process was basically similar to the one we are experiencing in our country.

Interparliamentary Cooperation

The Mozambican People's Assembly delegation went to the GDR at the invitation of the People's Chamber. The visit basically centered around the various aspects of the life and function of that supreme body of government and the respective popular representatives, through which the citizens of the GDR exercise their political power, deliberate on the fundamental issues of society and government and determine how to resolve them.

Explaining how the people of the GDR exercise popular sovereignty through the medium of their deputies, dos Santos added that the Socialist Unity Party of Germany [SED] is the directing force of the state and society in the GDR and is broadly represented in the People's Chamber, although other minority parties are represented, as well as the mass organizations.

Other Aspects

"We also had a chance to acquaint ourselves with other aspects. One important observation was that the GDR actually constitutes the frontier between capitalism and socialism in Europe. It is, in effect, a vital bastion which is becoming increasingly strong in this open confrontation with capitalism," dos Santos added.

In this regard, the high party leader noted that the Mozambican delegation visited the gates of the border with the FRG in Berlin, where it could observe the constant threats and provocations to which the GDR is subjected by the imperialists. It also visited a concentration camp that has been turned into a monument, where the oppression, humiliation and savagery of Hitler's Nazism are evident, crimes comparable to those committed against our country by the Portuguese colonial army, when, for example, a soldier would put the muzzle of a rifle in the mouth of a child and fire it.

As dos Santos stressed, it is vital to be aware of this when we see, today, the imperialist powers refuse to allow the people to decide their own future for themselves.

In the economic area, our delegation visited factories and agricultural production zones, where they observed that agriculture is already fully socialized and there is no difference between city and country in terms of housing conditions, work, nutrition and so on.

Basically Like More Advanced State of Our Society

Describing the trips and meetings in Berlin, Potsdam and the district of Schwerin, dos Santos said the people of the GDR have already achieved great progress in moral and material well-being. He explained the importance of the exchange of experiences with that country.

"As we were comparing what we are doing here with what we saw there, we were often tempted to see how one thing or another would fit into our country. Not that we wish to transplant their experiences here, but, automatically, in the process of exchanging experiences we tried to look at our country, because the [German experience] is essentially the same as that of Mozambique, simply in a more advanced state of development."

The party leader added: "This desire to involve and stimulate all our people in the political and organizational offensive is really a demand that all our people take part in all the tasks of the revolution! But they should take part in such a way that the participation enables each individual to become a man of conscience, an effective citizen in this People's Republic of Mozambique. What we observed in the GDR was really this effort, with results already fully realized. The people are participating, in an organized way, in the phase of preparation, the phase of determination and the phase of implementation and control of the decisions."

As dos Santos reported, through this channel of interparliamentary exchange created between the two countries, the People's Chamber of the GDR will send a delegation of deputies to learn about the realities in our country, and a more specialized Mozambican delegation will also go to the GDR to learn in greater detail about their experience in developing cooperatives and in the entire process of rural socialization.

We could not learn and absorb all the details of this process in a single week's visit, because we were observing it in 1980. It must be remembered that the GDR began this task immediately after the war, in 1945, and it is this process that we are interested in studying in detail, so we can see how it was then, and what action they took, because they really took action," the FRELIMO Party secretary for economic policy said at another point.

The leader then referred to the brotherly warmth and hospitality with which our delegation was received in the GDR. He noted that this visit coincided with the presidential visit, which, he stressed, was a great political contribution for all of us, and one in which socialism was strengthened. Dos Santos took the opportunity to salute the People's Chamber, the president and all the people of the GDR on the occasion of the 31st anniversary of the founding of that socialist state, which was celebrated on 7 October.

STUDENTS IN CUBA ADDRESS MESSAGE TO MACHEL

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 9 Oct 80 pp 1, 5

[Excerpts] Mozambican students and teachers in Cuba have sent a message to President Samora Machel, reaffirming their engagement in the struggle of this decade. Responding to a message from the chief of state, the Mozambican students praised the highest leader of the revolution "for having taken the true measure of internationalism, for having taught the people and soldiers to make Zimbabwe's struggle their own struggle."

Following is the [partial] text of the message from the students in Cuba.

It was with deep patriotic and revolutionary pride, as the children of a free and heroic people struggling for social welfare, progress and world peace, that we received the message from Your Excellency, which was a great honor for us.

Not only will it be a valuable tool in our daily work, but we sensed in [your message] the support and affection of the FRELIMO Party, the government and people of Mozambique, from which we have always benefited. We are more deeply convinced that although we are far from our Father Land we are not alone in this task of training the New Man. Our task is within the general vision of the full development of our country in the direction of advanced socialism.

In your message, Excellency, you note in detail our most significant achievements and encourage us to consolidate our victories. This fills us with happiness and commits us to struggle for higher goals. You also tell us how, side by side with the Cuban people, we must overcome the practical problems and join in raising high the banner of militant internationalism.

Your Excellency,

We deserve no personal credit for such consideration from the highest echelons of the party and government leadership, but in the knowledge that the bright future of our people rests with us, we assure you, Mr President, that we will do everything in our power to be worthy of the trust deposited in us by the FRELIMO Party, the government and people of Mozambique.

We are encouraged by the vigor and enthusiasm with which our people carried out the political and organizational offensive, against the internal enemy and against our own shortcomings, in defense of the interests of the working masses.

The offensive was necessary. The dialectic of our struggle dictates that we pass to a more advanced stage of the class struggle, in which the proletariat, using its political supremacy, violently puts down its class enemies in order to build, for the first time in history, a just society. For this very reason, the offensive is in fact a genuine Mozambican contribution to the enrichment of Marxism-Leninism.

The greatest measure of our achievements is the success of the recent sessions of the FRELIMO Party Central Committee and the People's Assembly. Fulfilling the highest aspirations of our people and synthesizing practical experiences, they made important decisions that reaffirm the irreversible nature of our revolution. We reiterate our total and unconditional support for the resolutions of the Seventh Session of the FRELIMO Party Central Committee and the Sixth Session of the People's Assembly.

We offer our best wishes for their effective implementation.

There was great international reaction to the correct, firm and decisive stand taken by the People's Republic of Mozambique at the 17th summit meeting of the OAU regarding the situation on the African continent.

To you, beloved president, our most sincere admiration for the way you have unmasked the nature of the enemy on the African continent, an enemy which assumes new shapes but is basically the same enemy as always: colonialism.

Excellency,

Your message to us was delivered by his excellency, Sr Martin Moura, ambassador of the Republic of Cuba to the People's Republic of Mozambique, at a massive political gathering attended by all the Mozambican students on this island, on the occasion of the visit of his excellency, Sr Sergio Vieira, minister governor of the Bank of Mozambique.

After the message was read at the ceremony, it was circulated to all the schools, to be studied and more deeply absorbed. At the suggestion of his excellency, the minister governor of the Bank of Mozambique, and by acclamation of all those present at the ceremony, it was decided that your message, for its honorific nature, should be kept at the school with the best performance in socialist emulation. During the emulation process, the school will lose possession of the document if it fails to remain in first place.

Beloved president,

It has been a great privilege and opportunity for us to study in Cuba. We are aware of what this means. We feel deeply that we have a great responsibility. We know that our stay here is at the cost of great sacrifice by the Cuban people, who give us the best they have of everything. We also know that our people are eagerly waiting for us to play our part in contribution to the Mozambican revolution in the very near future. For all these reasons, Your Excellency, president of the FRELIMO

Party and of the People's Republic of Mozambique, we assure you that we will not hesitate to carry out to the letter the guidelines you have drawn for us.

We will struggle on all fronts against our shortcomings, and the political offensive in our country will be our basic inspiration.

We desire excellent performance in our studies and good results in production, cultural activities, sports, etc. We shall succeed; we are convinced of this.

Beloved president

Soon you will celebrate your 47th birthday. There will be a party throughout the People's Republic of Mozambique, and all the Mozambican people will rejoice. We address to you in advance our deepest congratulations, our best wishes for a happy birthday, good health and many, many years of life!

The Struggle Continues.

INFORMATION MINISTER REPORTS ON COMMUNICATIONS POLICY

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 13 Oct 80 pp 1, 6

[Speech by Jorge Regelo: "Guidelines for Improving the Work of the Party Structures"]

> [Excerpts] At the close of the provincial meeting of the DTIP (Department of Ideological Work) of the FRELIMO Party, in Sofala, recently held in Beira, Jorge Rebelo delivered an address summarizing the meeting's work and charting guidelines to be applied not only to that province but to the entire party machinery. We are today publishing a summary of that speech to which we want especially to alert our readers.

Comrade Resident Minister of the Province of Sofala and member of the Permanent Political Committee,

Comrades,

After 4 days of intensive work, we have now arrived at this meeting. Throughout those 4 days we had an opportunity to go into an in-depth analysis of the work that is being done in each of the districts of this province.

We thus had an opportunity to meet with the district officers who really know their districts; when they spoke, we felt that they knew the situation. And we met other district officers who, as we were able to see for ourselves, knew their districts only through reports but had no direct and thorough knowledge themselves. And they are not capable of answering the simplest questions, questions which are not written down.

During those 4 days we analyzed the political situation in the province and the ideological work that is being done. One of our first findings was that there is still no clear concept as to what ideological work should be on the provincial level.

This definition is fundamental because, without it, we cannot do any correct work, we cannot carry out a useful and consistent effort.

We are developing some efforts in terms of training, mobilization, and propaganda--and little more. Even those efforts are not part of a general plan. We still have not correctly spelled out our priorities in training. What is indeed a priority matter here? Training individuals in the communal villages, the enterprises, the government departments, schools, and hospitals? We did not study that; we do not have the knowledge that would enable us to come up with that definition.

What I have told you regarding training is only one example. The same could be said about mobilization, about propaganda, in relation to actions in the field of education and culture.

The provincial ideological activities officers do not have an overall and thorough knowledge of their districts and towns. This is due to shortcomings in organization, it is due to quality problems in cadres who are assigned to the districts and this very often also involves a lack of sensitivity.

When we took up this problem during the meeting, we concluded that it was necessary to establish an operations room on the provincial level. We are not going to create a complicated operations room, with many maps and charts and so on. This is a sector whose job it must be to get information from the districts, to process that information, and to supply the results to the provincial management branch so that it may draft the departmental action plan for the entire province.

One problem we must take up in this province is related to the fact that it has been a favorite target of the enemy for a long time. During colonialism, we knew that Sofala was the main base of the reactionaries. Following independence, that base has not yet been completely dismantled. This is one of the main reasons why we still have so many problems and complications in that province. Sofala has been a constant target of enemy aggression--ideological aggression and also physical aggression. This inevitably creates situations requiring a rapid, profound, and effective response. Now, as a rule, we did not manage to come up with that response.

One very important point which I touched on during the discussions concerns the attitude adopted by certain district officers in relation to areas where the enemy was present physically, with weapons, in other words, the infiltrated agent of imperialism. These are areas where the enemy murdered party members, party officials, and members of the population. We saw that certain district officers developed a fear of going to those areas. They would wait for our military forces to mop up the area first before they would go there and do the necessary political work.

This is absolutely wrong.

We must remember that the entire country was occupied by the enemy at that time. Before our forces advanced into a new area, they were preceded by the political commissars who infiltrated among the various population groups, who did political work, and who prepared the people for supporting the war. That was the only way to make sure that the guerillas would have support when they came looking for it. Where this political advance work was well done, the armed struggle was an immediate success.

We must therefore use these lessons learned in the armed national liberation struggle. These lessons must be applied to areas where we still have actual operations by infiltrated bandits.

Where we do not mobilize our forces, the enemy mobilizes. Where we do not act, the enemy acts. The areas we do not occupy are occupied by the enemy. Where we do not solidly set up our political and administrative structures, the enemy will install himself, primarily the ideological enemy.

At this meeting we also saw that some party members submitted their resignation; they no longer want to be party members; they are dissatisfied. They keep talking about religion and they tell us: "I am a religious fanatic, I cannot be a party member." Now, in 1978, those people applied for party membership. At that time they said that they were not religious. We discovered the same situation regarding the polygamous individuals; at that time, they already had several wives but they did not tell us about that.

In the analysis we prepared, we asked ourselves about the reasons for these happenings. We discovered various causes. One of the causes is the idea that being a party member means having to subject ones self to very strict discipline and that any violation of this discipline implies punishment—punishment which may even lead to imprisonment. And those people tell us: "No, if this is so, it is better to get out of the party, to lead a free life, to do what I want, because this party only restricts my individual freedom."

During the discussion we saw that it was necessary to eliminate repressive methods used by many officials, primarily in the provinces. We told them that their main effort must be aimed at political work, that it must be an effort of persuasion, an effort of mobilization. But, on the party level, we sometimes do have a case where there is repression. This is why some people think that being in the party really is a dangerous thing.

We must have iron discipline; on that we are intransigent. But the method which we must pursue in party relations must be very correct; we cannot turn our party into an agency of repression.

On the other hand, however, we must also be aware that these individuals, who are dropping out of the party, are doing so because they are incapable of accepting sacrifices. They want to have their several wives, they want to get drunk, they want to practice liberalism; and the party does not allow that. If a person wants to be a party member, he cannot behave like that. Being a party member demands sacrifices.

But on the other hand we must create conditions so that this drop-out situation, this desertion, will not be caused by the implementation of the wrong kind of methods by our party.

When we took up the question of mobilization, we found that mobilization for the sake of mobilization does not produce any effect. If mobilization is to be successful, there has to be advance work--solving the basic problems of the people. Without that, mobilization and propaganda have no effect whatsoever.

This is one condition without which mobilization has no effect at all, no matter how many slogans we come out with, such as "Long Live Marxism! Long Live Socialism!"

Another point we discussed during this meeting had to do with the brigades. This sort of thing has become a habit: when any problem arises in a certain place, we create a brigade, we order the brigade to work there for a week, and we think that the problem is solved. In reality however nothing has been resolved because this method does not enable us to become familiar with the problems in depth. We are acting like a "fire department."

The brigade method cannot work this way. The brigades are useful only as a method of creating structures which afterward will guarantee permanent work, at places of employment and residence. They are local, permanent structures which enable us to make sure that any problem that might arise in that locality will be immediately detected and solved or at least channeled toward the appropriate government agency.

Some party cells still have a tendency to become clubs because they have no connection whatsoever with the problems of the workers. Naturally, those cells are no longer accepted by all of the workers together and their action therefore is ineffective. This is another reason why our cells are inoperative--they do not go to the workers, which should be their fundamental task, in order to engage in political, ideological, and organizational work among them.

Likewise related to the problem of inoperative cells, we have the cadre problem, the cadre shortage problem. In many districts we have what is called party "collaborators" who do party work, who are busy in mobilization, propaganda, and sometimes training. They are not employed in any other place but we do not pay them.

This situation cannot go on. We must create conditions so that the individuals involved in this situation, individuals who are working in the districts, individuals who are dedicated and have already proved themselves, may begin to draw a fixed salary. This is a priority matter above all in districts which are more subjected to enemy action and where ideological work therefore is more necessary. The province must come up with a proposal so that these cases may be covered in next year's budget.

We can draw some conclusions and draft some guidelines from the discussions and studies we conducted and I would no briefly like to list them here:

The need for staffing the agencies on the district level, particularly districts that were hit by enemy action.

As their working method, the provincial and district structures must implement correct task planning, support, and supervision methods. So far we have not had a program, complete with tasks, deadlines, and responsibilities.

We also conclude that it is necessary to reduce the number of meetings and this has to do with the large number of structures existing, for example, in the enterprises. You have the party cell with its secretariat, you have the production councils, you have the OMM [Organization of Mozambique Women], you have the OJM [Mozambique Youth Organization], and the vigilance groups, and each of these structures has a weekly meeting. This means that the officers spend much time during meetings which usually last for many, many hours. That sort of thing turns people off because they have nothing to do and they then fail to show up for meetings. This is why it is necessary to reduce the number and duration of meetings so as to give people time to rest and to have their own social and family life which will guarantee them a physical and emotional balance. If we lose that sensitivity, we are going to destroy our party; there will be no participation in the party's tasks. We must correct this way of operating so that this error will not continue.

Meetings were held between districts to study and debate specific problems and to exchange experiences. It is necessary to provide dynamic impetus for those meetings and we assigned that task to the provincial secretariat.

The provincial structures must have a thorough knowledge of the district problems. This is why we decided to create a liaison sector with the districts and it will be tied in with the operations room. It will get reports and it will process those reports so as to permit the development of our own overall efforts, our strategy.

Likewise in relation to the internal organization of the department itself, On the district level, we decided that it was necessary to concentrate our action on some fundamental sectors. For this particular phase, we identified three sectors: mobilization and propaganda, which must include issues pertaining to religion, communal villages, and health; training, which must also include education; and the culture sector which must consist of what has been our historical file. In this way we will achieve greater efficiency in our work and we will make better use of the few cadres we have.

Another guideline for the province of Sofala, springing from a more general guideline issued by the Party Central Committee, is to prepare a survey of party members who were murdered or mutilated by the Rhodesian Army or its agents.

On the basis of that survey, we must send proposals to the central structures so as to get them to pay out pensions or give those people other forms of support--or to their families, in case they are dead. The People's Assembly has already adopted an identical decision relating to the deputies who were murdered by the enemy during the elections. For the same reason, if a cell secretary, because he was a party member, is murdered by the enemy, his family must be supported. Likewis , if a party member was mutilated by the enemy, due to the fact that he was a party member, we must create conditions for his physical recovery. And if it is physically impossible for him to work, the party must give him a pension or it must retrain him.

Another guideline emerging from this meeting is that, whenever a decision has been made by a higher-level party organ, it must immediately be studied by the structures down the line, for information and implementation.

When we discussed the reports of the districts, we analyzed the mobilization problems. Mobilization implies a profound analysis before we can provide dynamic impetus for any effort.

The population must feel that mobilization is being carried out by persons who are really interested and committed to solving their problems.

In mobilization it is also necessary to take into account the habits, tastes, and customs of the population. Mobilization and propaganda, as I said, must be related to the immediate problems of the population.

As for the training sector, we saw that it was important to consolidate political study in places where it has already been accomplished and to create new centers. We must organize weekend seminars to study specific situations and to organize party activity. We must organize the correct utilization of individuals who are already taking training courses and we must assign them specific tasks and supervise their work.

Regarding education, we concluded that the party's primary mission here is to participate more actively in mobilization for literacy drives and to guide and implement the permanent supervision of these drives to make sure that they will be properly carried out.

Comrades,

I expressed much criticism during the meeting. These were necessary, correct, and fair criticisms, both regarding the reports as such, and the ideological district and provincial officers. I criticized mistakes and shortcomings as well as irregularities which turned up in your work. The objective of criticism in our party is always constructive. It is never aimed at destroying, humiliating, or diminishing anybody; on the contrary, criticism is intended to make sure that the person criticized will become aware of his or her mistakes, will correct them, and will regain our confidence.

We are very much aware that, as a rule, our comrades do what can be done at a particular moment, under our conditions. The work which is done, generally, is very positive and gives us a guarantee that the party line is really in the process of being implemented.

This is why, in conclusion, I want to hail all participants, especially the district ideological secretaries, for the excellent work they are doing under difficult and tough conditions.

The struggle continues!

Socialism will win!

Thank you.

DTIP OFFICIAL COMMENTS ON IDEOLOGICAL WORK

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 12 Oct 80 pp 3-4

[Excerpts] The high point in the 21st General Conference of UNESCO in Belgrade was the matter of the new international information system where two concepts on this subject were contending, it was noted yesterday by Information Minister Jose Luis Cabaco at the Mavalane airport in talking to journalists moments after his return to the country.

According to the information minister of the RPM [People's Republic of Mozambique], the concept--which was advocated by the socialist and nonalined countries--was eminently political and stressed the need for creating a new worldwide order in communications, opposing the control which the chief communications agencies have over communications throughout the world, by means of the development of national communications policies.

Minister Jose Luis Cabaco then explained this position as follows: "As we know, the current situation is extremely serious in the field of communications because of the tremendous information imbalance existing at this time. The principal news agencies exercise control over the rest of worldwide communications and are being used as a vehicle for the values of imperialism and the depersonalization of the countries of the Third World. All information coming from the socialist and nonalined countries is processed by the big information agencies which naturally give it their own political interpretation and which slant that information to suit their political objectives. All information which the socialist and nonalined countries receive is once again being handled by those big news agencies which impose those news reports, which they have worked out, upon our countries."

The second concept was advocated by the capitalist countries and fundamentally constituted an attempt to reduce all communications to their technological nature and thus to try in this fashion to consolidate their control over information.

The Mozambican delegation participated in the work of all committees, especially those for education, natural sciences, and exact sciences. According to the information minister, the document on education, submitted to the conference, was generally progressive and the debates took place in a satisfactory manner. Mozambique held one of the two vice chairmanships on the education committee and the member of the Mozambican delegation, who was in charge of activities in one of those committees, earned the appreciation of the other delegates.

Official Visit to Yugoslavia

Upon completion of his attendance at the 21st UNESCO Conference, Jose Luis Cabaco made an official visit to Yugoslavia between 1 and 5 October in response to an invitation from that country's federation secretary of information.

In Yugoslavia, the group studied possibilities of cooperation in various fields of information.

Returning to Mozambique, Jose Luis Cabaco stopped off in Italy where he had contacts, not on the government level, with organizations in the information field.

COMPLAINT ABOUT AVAILABILITY, MONOTONY OF FISH DIET

Maputo TEMPO in Portuguese 5 Oct 80 pp 46-47

[Article by Calane da Silva: "Eternal Mackerel"]

[Text] Although many people do not like it, mackerel is a tasty fish. Fried, grilled, in pastries or with tomato sauce, in peanut or coconut curry, it is cooked in a wide variety of ways in the most varied Mozambican households.

I like mackerel. I have eaten it in every form and with maddening frequency in the past few years. Just last week I tried a new dish: fish pudding--made with mackerel, obviously. It is prepared with milk, bread and eggs, and I can assure you it is delicious. It just so happens that I am tired of mackerel. I dream about it. I feel mackerel bones all over my body.

Mackerel has come to be an obsession at my house.

We have no time to wait in the meat line, and the answer is mackerel.

A few days ago some neighbors sent over a little "tokossado," made with mackerel, of course. They admitted that they are tired of it, too.

A friend of ours recently helped conduct the general population census in Nacala Velha and thought he would be having a respite from mackerel for a while. He was sadly mistaken. As he laughingly told us on his return, he had had 2 consecutive weeks of mackerel lunches and dinners.

Croaker, rockfish, red fish (sea fish), grouper, sword fish, shark ("tuberao"), hake, anchovy ("xidana n'kata") and even "magumba," not to mention many other species that were once commonplace in our central and even our suburban markets, have simply disappeared.

If these species show up in our cities or even coastal towns, they are sold at a speculative price--and even so they are snatched up by those who can afford it--or in such small quantity that it doesn't begin to meet the local demand.

We wanted to find out why we have to eat, again and again, cook, again and again, "our" eternal mackerel.

"Our" is in quotation marks because the first thing we learned is that the mackerel is not "ours," it is imported.

A member of the structure that markets fish offered us some facts that, he felt, explained the background and the reason for this one-fish market, to which we would rather not become accustomed. His facts did not convince us, however. After citing them, I will pose a series of questions, which would certainly be asked by many readers who are as tired of mackerel as I am.

These are the facts.
a) We have enough freezers, he said, to hold twice the present stock of fish. Only 5 percent of the fish consumed is produced domestically, and the remaining 95 percent is imported.

b) Grouper, sword fish and other so-called noble fish cannot be fished by trawler (industrial fishing), but only manually. The noble species must be fished with lines.

c) We are obliged to import mackerel, sardines and "sardinela" (fish with many bones), because this is all we can afford.

The statements, which I will analyze later, continue.

d) People demand mackerel. The merchants boycott sales of other fish, such as pollock. In a single day's sale of mackerel and pollock, we sold 65 tons of mackerel, as against 5 tons of pollock.

This ends the list of facts cited by the above-mentioned individual linked to the nation's fish marketing system. Obviously, I have some questions, since, like many other citizens, I am not interested in spending the coming years eating nothing but mackerel.

If we consider only the figures given for the consumption of domestic and imported fish, the basic problem really would seem to be the declining production of our fishing fleet. The fact is that the state companies are not producing at all satisfactorily, although an effort is now being made to more decisively resolve the problem.

An example of this decline in the state companies' production and productivity appeared about 18 months ago in the city of Beira, where, we learned, a single shrimp boat operated by a private firm took on more shrimp than three larger shrimp boats operated by a state company. It was not our intent to talk about shrimp, however, since most of our shrimp production is naturally for export. The issue here is fishing for domestic consumption. It was stated above (line b), that first-grade fish, or the so-called noble species, must be fished with lines and are more within the province of the artisan. The question arises: How much support have we been giving to the local fishermen? If only 5 percent of the fish consumed is produced locally and 95 percent must be imported (line a), we are led to the conclusion that this support has been minimal.

Moreover, many private fishermen have complained that, although they have received financing and other assistance from the national bank, their productivity is held down by the lack of replacement parts for their boats' engines. The parts are slow to come. The same is true of fish hooks, lines and nets. Without such equipment, it is impossible to advance rapidly and efficiently.

I question the fact cited in line c), referring to current import requirements: In the agreements established for this importation, are mackerel and other species not to the consumers' taste the only fish offered at a price we can afford?

Again (line d), if the people generally reject a particular kind of fish, isn't it because they think they might have to spend several months eating nothing else?

If more than one species were available on the market, people would obviously buy more of the better-quality fish, and it would be a way of relieving the single-fish (in this case, mackerel) syndrome.

The problem I have investigated here is probably much more complex than these observations would suggest.

In conclusion, however, I would like to make a very important point. Although the National Marketing Enterprise for Fish Products does not market all the fish produced domestically, it has been doing a reasonably good job of supplying the market. If fish consumption is increasing, including the consumption of mackerel (even though people are already tired of it), it is mainly because of the lack of other protein products, such as small game or even beef, which is priced out of the market.

After all, mackerel is really good to eat. Only not every day!

NATIONAL INERTIA CONDEMNED IN 'TEMPO' COLUMN

Maputo TEMPO in Portuguese 5 Oct 80 p 25

[Commentary by Antonio Marmelo: "That's The Way It Goes"]

[Text] "Time is money," they say. But it seems that only a very few of us believe it. It is true that the phrase reflects various motivations, some of them pretty reactionary, but it is also a fact that time has a direct relationship to production and hence to costs, profits and losses, and it is important to bear this in mind.

We lose time everywhere--at work, waiting for transportation or for lunch at a restaurant, in the waiting line to buy sugar. We habitually lose time without any great concern; we are used to the idea of "Let it pass," "That's the way it goes," and "If not today, tomorrow."

There are real problems that excuse much of this loss of time, but in many cases there is no "excuse" but insensitivity, negligence and even (why not?) sabotage.

A case in point was a trip to Inhaca by ship, when the time spent disembarking was as long as the trip from Maputo to Inhaca. The disembarkation, by means of a small boat that takes about 45 minutes to get from the beach to the ship and another 45 minutes to return, is extremely sluggish, especially when there are many passengers and the boat has to make several trips.

We do not think this is the most flagrant example. It is only a case in point. Every reader will certainly have several other examples, and surely more telling ones. The important thing here is to point out that a spirit of inertia has been instilled in us and for many of us now seems natural, but it is urgent for us to "declare war" against it.

MACHEL ASKS FOR MERGER OF SMALL FACTORIES

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 6 Oct 80 pp 1, 3

[Text] Small companies should merge to form a large industry, as the correct way to combat underdevelopment. This was one of the recommendations offered by Samora Machel, president of the FRELIMO Party and the People's Republic of Mozambique, to the nation's exhibitors at the Maputo International Fair, FACIM, where the national pavillions are still in place. Machel visited the installations yesterday morning.

The president was accompanied by members of the Permanent Political Committee of the FRELIMO Party Central Committee, the Council of Ministers, national directors and other officials of the party and government.

The highest leader of the Mozambican revolution began his visit at the metalworking industry sector and then toured the other sectors exhibiting at the most recent FACIM, which was closed to the public on 14 September. It is noted that, after his first visit, the president had called the Mozambican exhibitors' attention to the fact that some products shown at the fair could not be found on the market.

As the highest leader stressed, this reflects the faulty thinking behind the formation of small firms with no perspective. In this regard, he recommended that all these small firms come together to form a large industry, as the correct means to combat underdevelopment.

Shopkeeper Mentality

In his final address to the nation's exhibitors, President Machel praised the progress made by some units, particularly the textile industry, adding that he preferred to go personally to the production units, instead of viewing FACIM exhibits that often do not reflect reality.

"I did not visit all the pavillions, because I saw that they always wanted to show me the same things. The spirit is still that of the shopkeeper, individualistic; these are cottage industries," said president Machel after he had gone through the FACIM exhibits.

He later noted the stingy spirit and lack of commitment in many of the company directors. He cited the example of the photographers who are self-absorbed and do not achieve anything out of the ordinary because they work alone. The president recommended that the photographers form a professional association, and execute works more closely linked to the lives of the people.

The president of the party and the republic also noted the case of journalists who still resist the spirit of collectivism, who still think they are irreplaceable professionals. He added that the journalists have already done a great deal to win this battle within themselves, but the old mentality persists in many of them.

"There is also the shopkeeper mentality here, the unwillingness to pass on their knowledge because they think this gives them more status," President Machel said at one point.

POST-INDEPENDENCE WORK QUALITY QUESTIONED

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 4 Oct 80 p 3

[Article by Antonio Mesa]

[Text] In addition to everything else, the Hotel Nampula has a pastry shop and a coffee shop. As incredible as it may seem, what is available in one section, is not, at times, in the other. The two shops are internally connected. When the coffee gives out on one side, the waiter goes to the other side to ask for some and is refused. And conversely. The two sectors do not get on too well. At least, that is what it looks like . . . As for the coffee machines, they seem to be under some spell. "Zicuembo," also known as disorganization, endlessly abounds there. And the one who pays for it is the public who, instead of being well served--and is so only by some--has to put up with the lack of politeness and the flimflam that reigns there. No one bothers in the least to keep the coffee machine filled with water while it is in use. When there is no more water left, they simply turn the machine off and just let everyone wait for ages until, after it has been refilled, the water becomes hot enough to be used.

This leaves one with the impression that in colonial times affairs were well run. Yes indeed!!! They worked harder at that time. Now, it even makes me angry. It seems as if some do it on purpose. If in colonial times we did the work with our own hands, why is it that now that these same hands which were never so free as they are now, are not improving the situation more than ever? It should be mentioned that the complaint book which is there, as large as life, in the coffee shop, for months has given no information regarding the city's own organization. Can it be that it is this organization that is responsible for this? The atmosphere prevailing there is contributing absolutely nothing toward the advancement of the Mozambican revolution.

DIFFICULTIES THREATEN LARGE COPRA STOCK

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 13 Oct 80 p 3

[Excerpts] With its warehouses completely crammed with 24,000 tons of copra, including all of this year's crop and half of last year's production, BOROR is having great difficulty marketing its product. Meanwhile, the copra is declining in quality and consequently in commercial value. This large quantity of copra cannot be moved because of a shortage of coastal ships and the silting of the ports in the Zambeze area.

Storage space is now very limited, despite efforts by the almost 6,000 workers to find locations with minimal conditions to store the product.

Evaluating the chances of placing the 24,000 tons of copra that still remain, not to mention the additional supply expected after these months marking the end of the 1980/1981 agricultural campaign, there is no prospect of resolving the problem with the means currently available to BOROR. With a fleet of 13 trucks, 8 of which are idle for lack of parts, the firm has no way of shipping the copra to the ports of embarkation.

Moreover, river transport is virtually immobilized because of the severe damage to three of BOROR's five tugboats. Even the two currently in use are not functioning well enough to insure efficient and safe operations. In addition, six large-capacity barges have been idle for over 6 months for lack of heavy plate and special ship's paint. The largest ship, the "Ana Carta," has been idle since February for want of a propeller, and its pilot is now vacationing abroad.

BRIEFS

GDR STUDENT GREETINGS--Through the Francisco Manyanga Secondary School administration in Maputo, students from the Orlando Magumbwe Secondary School in the GDR conveyed a message to all the students in the People's Republic of Mozambique. With this message, the students from that European socialist country sent two GDR Pioneer flags as a model of their own particular uniform. This gesture, as Minister Graca Machel pointed out in the opening session of the First National School Seminar, is the first step toward a future friendly alliance which these students aspire to establish with students in our country. We recall that the name Orlando Magumbwe was bestowed on a GDR secondary school in a ceremony at which President Samora Machel was present during his recent visit to that country. MACHEL MESSAGE TO HONECKER--Samora Moises Machel, chairman of the FRELIMO Party and president of the People's Republic of Mozambique, sent a message of congratulations to Erich Honecker, secretary general of the SED [United Socialist Party of Germany] Central Committee and chairman of the GDR State Council, on the occasion of this European socialist country's 31st anniversary. The text of the message is as follows: "In the name of the FRELIMO Party, of the people and government of the People's Republic of Mozambique, I extend to Your Excellency, to the United Socialist Party of Germany, to the people and the government of the German Democratic Republic, my warmest congratulations on the occasion of the 31st anniversary of the proclamation of the German Democratic Republic. We still very vividly remember the joyful moments of friendship, fellowship and valor which distinguished our recent very rewarding stay among the people of the German Democratic Republic. It gives me great satisfaction to note that our political relations are continually expanding and becoming firmer with the growth in economic cooperation within the norms which our parties and governments have determined. I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to repeat our sincere best wishes for the German Democratic Republic's greatest success. Please accept our, sincere fraternal regards." BRAZILIAN LABOR PARTY LEADER--Delegations from the FRELIMO party and the Brazilian Democratic Labor Party [PDT], led respectively by President Samora Machel and President Leonel Brizola, yesterday engaged in official talks at the party National Headquarters in Maputo. At the opening of the talks between the FRELIMO Party and the Brazilian Democratic Labor Party, the visiting delegation's leader presented the FRELIMO Party, through President Samora Machel, with his party's flag. Yesterday morning, President Brizola laid a wreath of flowers at the monument of the Mozambican Heroes and visited Cometal-Monetal, an enterprise located in the Machava

(Maputo) industrial area. Accompanying the distinguished visitor were a member of the FRELIMO Party Central Committee and Julio Carrilho, the minister of public works and housing. During a brief meeting held with the party cell and the Cometal-Monetal concern's management, Leonel Brizola was apprised of the steps which the concern's workers had already taken since the government's intervention, as well as the problems they have had to face to fulfill established plans. Regarding this last matter, the party cell and the Cometal-Monetal management informed the visitor that one of the priority activities now underway in the concern involves the formation of Mozambican cadres, and that they are being undertaken with the full support of the more advanced countries in this sector. Addressing those present, Leonel Brizola expressed his pleasure at having the opportunity offered him to visit some of the most important production units in the country. Lionel Brizola also said that on his return to Brazil he would share with the Brazilian people the first-hand knowledge he had acquired in Mozambique. REGIONAL ADMINISTRATION FAULTED--One of the major concerns at a recent provincial government meeting in Niassa was the outflow of the people's agricultural surpluses, a sore point, whose consequences constitute a veritable thermometer of the organization's improvement in output and of its progress. Local information media made public this meeting's final document which, through verbal reports submitted by provincial administrators and later confirmed by the provincial director of home trade and the Bank of Mozambique manager, draws particular attention to the work being done to promote the outflow of surplus products in Niassa. In terms of these reports, it became evident that regional administrators were far too removed from the problems in their own center of operations and lacked the necessary indepth knowledge of the activities carried on in their own districts. A situation such as this is the cause of many enterprises being jeopardized, which is precisely what happened with the outflow of surpluses in some regions during the present campaign. However, despite some problems, activities involving the outflow of agricultural output prove to be proceeding normally in some areas and should be completed shortly. NEED FOR CEMA COOPERATION EXPRESSED--Yesterday, President Samora Machel mentioned the need to establish a joint cooperative program between member countries of CEMA and the People's Republic of Mozambique as essential for the lasting achievement of our objectives, which are to meet the needs of the people, to assuage thirst, to abolish hunger, nakedness and destitution. President Samora Machel spoke during a meeting held with a CEMA delegation which has been in our country since 19 September. The head of state mentioned the possible areas of cooperation in which there is mutual advantage between the members of the above organization and the PRM, and within the international context, the importance which CEMA participation assumes in the projects for the development of its member countries and of Mozambique. E. Shopa, CEMA deputy secretary general, who is leading the delegation, expressed his wish to promote CEMA members' multilateral cooperation with our country. This delegation, which is to leave our country tonight, visited Tete Province, Cahora-Bassa Dam, the Moatize coal beds and the Zambezi Valley, Sofala and Manica provinces, the Maputo industrial units, and the Limpopo and Incomati Valley in Gaza. DELEGATION TO CZECHOLSLOVAKIA SEMINAR--In response to an invitation from the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic Central Cooperative Council, A Ministry of Home Trade delegation from the People's Republic of Mozambique recently took part in an International Cooperative Seminar which was held in the above European socialist country from 28 August to 23 September. The 26th International Cooperative Seminar, held in Prague, the capital of Czechoslovakia, focused basically on the indepth study of present relations between the nation and the respective cooperatives (agricultural, consumption, production, housing, to mention a few) after having also scrutinized the role which each has been playing with respect to social development. Participating in these seminars were cooperative organizations and government institutions which represented 15 countries in Africa, Asia and Latin America, among them the PRM and a socialist country. The seminars concluded, the participants carefully developed a final joint report which is to be presented to the International Cooperative Alliance (ACI) Congress to be held in Moscow this month. This congress, in addition to evaluating world cooperative activities in the 1970-80 decade, is going to draw up a projection of how the cooperatives are going to work until the year 2000, especially in regard to the support which must be given to the cooperatives in developing countries. IRREGULARITIES IN YOUTH ORGANIZATION--To observe at first hand the activity that young people have been conducting, to evaluate the young workers' degree of commitment to the process in progress, and to study with them new ways of motivating them and encouraging creative initiative, Zacarias Kupela, secretary general of the OJM [Mozambican Youth Organization], has begun a series of working visits to some manufacturing complexes and companies in the nation's capital. The official has worked with TEXLOM, FACOZA and FASOL, firms located in Matola. At TEXLOM, Kupela met with structures of the party and the mass democratic organizations and with members of the management. The purpose of the meeting was to make an exhaustive analysis of the work conducted by the OJM within the company. It was concluded that the organization was ineffective and that its leaders are ambiguous, "ambitious, shirk responsibility and lack methods for work, coordination and planning." To correct the situation at that company, and on the initiative of the party, an ODM commission was created, which has had great effect in overcoming the difficulties the OJM is experiencing at TEXLOM. After a close examination of all the problems, the OJM secretary general stressed the need to correct the situation. To this end, he called for an intensification of collective work and direct collaboration with the party structures responsible for the OJM. PAPER IS SANGUINE ABOUT WALDHEIM'S REPORT

[Editorial in column "Comment"]

[Text]

There is an Arabic proverb which says that peace comes from understanding, not agreement.

That is exactly what was achieved in the SWA talks in Pretoria last week.

It is either a blatant lie or absolute ignorance to say that the talks were a total failure, and it is being said widely.

The UN team headed by Mr Brian Urquhart went out of its way to attempt to meet the demands of the SA Government and the internal parties.

It also listened intently to their views and expressed considerable understanding of their problems.

More could not have been asked of the UN team acting under the mandate given to it by UN Secretary General Dr Kurt Waldheim.

True, differences do still exist on some of the major issues.

But equally, agreement was endorsed that UN Security Council Resolution 435 should not be inadvertently torpedoed. Such actions will serve nobody's interests and like a divorce, all the parties will be losers in the end.

Dr Waldheim now has to report to the Security Council and we suspect that his report will be favourable.

We hope furthermore that it will provide ground for the SA Government and all the political parties in the SWA dispute, including Swapo, to respond positively.

Progress along the road of Resolution 435 can only be to the benefit of each and every Southwester.

As SA Foreign Minister Pik Botha said on Sunday: "If there are people who do not fear the results of continued negotiations and the possibility of sanctions, they must ask themselves how matters will go if political power groups are allowed to reach their aims through the barrel of a gun and through threats and intimidation."

The options couldn't have been put more clearly.

AHTISAARI REVEALS SELF IN INTERVIEW

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 31 Oct 80 pp 12, 13

[Interview with UN representative Ahtisaari by editor Leon Kok]

[Text]

THIS INTERVIEW which Windhoek Advertiser Editor Leon Kok had with UN Special Representative on SWA, Mr Martti Ahtisaari, is somewhat tempered compared to what the Advertiser originally hoped to get.

Kok, who covered the UN-SA Government talks in Pretoria last week, was told by a UN official that Mr Ahtisaari felt strongly that a negative image of himself had been presented in SWA and that he was being used as scapegoat for the shortcomings in much of the negotiations.

Kok offered to correct the situation on the basis of a fullscale interview with Mr Ahtisaari, with no punches held.

Mr Ahtisaari agreed to the interview.

Kok formulated a number of questions which he admits were sticky, and presented these to Mr Ahtisaari.

Kok was later to be told that Mr Ahtisaari nearly choked when he went through them, but he was nevertheless happy to go ahead with the interview.

Mr Ahtisaari out of courtesy showed the questions to his team leader, UN Under Secretary General, Mr Brian Urquhart. He felt that it would be wrong to engage in such an interview without Mr Urquhart's permission.

Mr Urquhart objected vehemently to the questions and strongly advised Mr Ahtisaari not to engage in the envisaged interview.

Kok was then told by a UN official that Mr Urquhart had felt that the questions were provocative, even vicious and that they were framed in a way that would have given the impression of Mr Ahtisaari being brought under cross-examination in the dock.

Mr Ahtisaari accepted Mr Urquhart's advice but was reluctant to kill his commitment to Kok.

He told Kok that he would be happy to be interviewed but that the interview would have to take a different form. The interview as published on this page is what emerged. Mr Ahtisaari did however discuss a number of points with Kok off the record.

THE UN Secretary-General, Dr Kurt Waldheim's Special Representative on SWA, Mr Martti Ahtisaari, tells us in this interview a little about himself.

Mr Ahtisaari, a Finn, trained as a teacher, spent a number of years as a diplomat in Tanzania and reckons that he is far more a bilateral man than a multinational man.

His outside interests include reading, indulging in saunas and playing golf with his 11-year-old son.

He discounts the view that he might succeed Dr Kurt Waldheim as Secretary-General and talks about his name being bandied as Finland's Ambassador to Europe.

These excerpts from the interview:

LK: Mr Ahtisaari, how do you pronounce your surname?

MA: Achtisari (phonetically)

LK: Where were you born and bred?

MA: I was born in a city called Vyborg, it is part of the country that we lost during the war. My family then moved to the eastern part of Finland.

My father then moved to the north where he retired, and the rest of the family moved down to Helsinki.

LK: Did you spend a considerable period of your youth in Helsinki?

MA: No. Actually I was fairly grown up when I moved down to Helsinki. My younger years were primarily spent in Kuopio, in the eastern part of Finland. My wife also comes from that city. I was 15 when I left Kuopio for Oulu. From there we moved to Helsinki and that is where I eventually joined the foreign service.

LK: And your education?

MA: I studied at the University of Oulu. I did my BA there and studied education. I thereafter did a year of teaching.

LK: After that?

MA: I joined the Swedish Technical Assistance Programme and I worked for them for three years in Pakistan. After that when the Finnish Foreign Service set up a special bureau dealing with development assistance, I was recruited. That was in 1965.

LK: How did you land up in the UN then?

MA: The bureau developed into a department and I became deputy director. In that role I had to deal with bilateral assistance to developing countries and assistance my country was giving through the different international organisations. I became particularly familiar with assistance organisations that I now deal with through the UN. There was a sort of logical move in 1973 when the (Finnish) President appointed me as Ambassador to Tanzania because it was the biggest recipient of the Finnish Assistance Programme. It still is, I think.

LK: But how did your appointment in the UN evolve?

MA: I have become very fatalistic, because I have said that had I not been working in that part of the world at that point in time, I don't think I would have been asked to join the UN.

My appointment at the UN, I hope, was a reflection of the confidence that various governments had in me, that they asked that my government would release me. I was not a candidate of the Finnish Government. I was an African candidate. We made it clear from the beginning that my government would give me leave of absence.

LK: How did you land up in the Namibian issue?

MA: My first association with the country went back to my involvement with assistance programmes to Namibians. Later I was appointed by my government as its representative on the Senate of the UN Institute of Namibia.

LK: Did you have difficulty coming to grips with the issues in SWA?

MA: Yes. Not only in Namibia, but the UN's involvement with Namibia as well. Besides, I regard myself far more as a bilateral man than a multi-national man.

LK: How long have you been based at the UN in New York?

MA: Four years.

LK: Do you handle Namibian issues exclusively in your posts at the UN?

MA: Yes.

LK: What do you spend most of your time doing?

MA: It depends entirely on the emphasis of my work at a particular time. I have two separate offices in New York, both in different buildings. Overall, however, I basically follow developments about all the issues involving the Namibian question. I even follow your writings. I follow developments on the international scene and all the possible influences. There are furthermore continuous consultations.

There is also a lot of preparatory work for me in our discussions. But I would like to point out, as you can see from the composition of this team, I am not the only person dealing with Namibian affairs.

LK: I trust then that you are not the sole adviser to Dr Waldheim.

MA: Correct. I report to Mr Urquhart whose department (at the UN) deals with this sort of operation. I obviously also discuss matters with Dr Waldheim alone. But it is a very lengthy process sometimes before the Secretary General comes to a decision.

He consults his advisers and he also consults many outsiders. Very often it takes considerable time to come to some understanding ourselves. In the end however it is the Secretary General who makes the final decision and he does that alone.

LK: Are you happy that the channels of information from SWA are adequate?

MA: No, I don't think they are. I subscribe to all the newspapers possible. I would like to have a better idea of what the Afrikaans newspapers are saying. Nonetheless, I think we are fairly well aware of the events in the country.

LK: Do you meet many non-exile Namibians in New York?

MA: Yes, a number of people come to see me. My doors are open to all Namibians who come to New York and want to see me. I am always happy to see any member from any political party.

LK: Why don't you come to Namibia more often so that you can be in closer touch with the people there?

MA: My travels are primarily concerned with the negotiated process. Obviously if there is nothing happening on that front, there is no way open for me to visit that country. One also has to consider the financial factor.

LK: Mr Ahtisaari, I have information that you might be appointed an ambassador of your country to Europe?

MA: I am aware of the reports. Yes, my name was in the Finnish press during summer and autumn. It is true that my name was included inthe list of candidates. But there is no way that my government will withdraw me from this exercise (the SWA issue). I have been away from Finland so long that I feel out of sight and out of mind with developments there. My own desire is to take this exercise to its logical conclusion and return to my government. But I have no intention of withdrawing at the moment.

LK: I understand that you have ambitions of succeeding Dr Waldheim as Secretary General at the UN?

MA: I'm afraid that rumour arose when I visited Namibia the first time (August 1978). I question the motives of the people who spread that rumour. It is totally out of the question. I have never shown any interest in that particular post. My only reason for staying with the UN is to see the Namibian independence process concluded. I hope, jokingly, that when I return to Finland there will be an ambassadorial position for me to take up in the Mediterranean. The rumour is totally baseless.

LK: What are your personal interests outside your work?

MA: I do a lot of reading and I would like to do a lot more. I do a lot when I am travelling. I have even done a lot while I have been in Pretoria. I spend my summer holidays at my summer place (in Finland). I like to do work around my place but this usually suffers because of my reading. I would describe myself as a family man. I spend a lot of time with my wife and my 11-year-old son. I play golf with my son and he is now capable of beating me. We try to get away from New York on the weekends. I am a sauna freak. It is a sort of therapy for Finns.

LK: Tell me about your wife?

MA: She is a history teacher by profession. When I married her she became a museum curator near Helsinki. She had a very interesting job, so when I became a Finnish ambassador, she had to give it up.

LK: Has your wife been to SWA?

MA: Unfortunately not. I would have liked to have taken her in the past but it would have been a very costly business. When I come to Namibia, I will bring both of them. The question of schooling, however worries me. But they can certainly come for the long summer holidays.

LK: Is there anything in particular that you would like to say to the people in Namibia?

MA: Yes, we feel as frustrated about the Namibian question as all the Namibian political parties. The thing that keeps me straight is the realisation that the great majority of Namibians do want the implementation of the UN plan. I have never been in doubt about it it, not even after this week's round of talks. If I didn't believe that, I don't think I could put the effort into these negotiations that I do. Otherwise it would be a complete waste of time. Our track record shows that we are doing our utmost to find the solutions so that implementation can start as soon as possible.

LK: Are you going home with more confidence than when you arrived?

MA: I have always been confident of the desires of the Namibians, but I have never been unaware of the complexities of the solutions and I do hope that Namibia will become independent before next year.

THE STORY BEHIND THE STORY IN PRETORIA

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 28 Oct 80 p 7

[Article by Leon Kok]

[Text]

THE UN team arrived in Pretoria just over a week ago to discuss the SWA issue with the SA Government. It seemed at first that there would be a complete breakdown in the talks. The contrary however happened and a considerable amount of mutual understanding arose between the sides, even though some of the more serious differences were not resolved.

Windhoek Advertiser Editor LEON KOK sketches the background to that understanding in this article. The writer covered the talks in full last week and was in close contact with all the parties.

MANY Southwesters have developed an absolute dislike about the UN handling of the SWA issue, and not surprisingly so.

There has been ample evidence of a biased approach.

That said, however, behind the scenes talks in Pretoria last week gave me the impression that the overall situation has changed.

True, there probably still is a lot of bias towards Swapo and I imagine that that will remain the case.

But three things have clearly emerged:

- That part of the UN Secretariat dealing with SWA has become more conscious of the need to protect Western interests.
- It is felt by the "Western" wing of the Secretariat that if UN Security Council Resolution 435 collapses, the West could lose total control of the SWA issue.
- And because of the two aforementioned points, it is prepared to bend over backwards to meet the SA Government's demands (which was well indicated last week.)

This change has perhaps been most discernible since UN Secretary General, Dr Kurt Waldheim announced in June that the UN was prepared to concede to SA's demands that Swapo should not be allowed to set up bases in the Territory during the proposed seven-month run-up to a UN supervised election.

It has been felt by the Western wing of the Secretariat that SA has been playing right into the hands of the Soviet Union and it has urged that SA should readjust its approach.

These points perhaps featured more prominently in the private talks between the UN team and the SA Government delegation last week than any other factor. It probably also formed the backdrop to the position papers presented to the SA Government by the UN team last Tuesday.

The official talks were suspended on Tuesday for the SA Government to consider these papers and the talks were then resumed on Friday afternoon.

It is also conceivable that the question of Western interests and Soviet involvement in Southern Africa formed the basis of the private talks on Tuesday night between UN team leader, Mr Brian Urquhart and DTA Chairman, Mr Dirk Mudge.

The position that the UN team apparently took was that it would more than meet the SA Government's demands for UN Secretariat impartiality in the SWA issue if the SA Government would agree to an early ceasefire date.

The reason that the UN team needed to have this date was to show that progress is being made to implement the settlement plan so as to [illegible] criticism in the Security Council from the Soviet and other communist representatives.

The Soviets have apparently been waiting with glee for the implementation of Resolution 435 to fail and in fact they have been predicting all along that the SA Government would throw it overboard.

The immediate consequences would then be clear-cut:

- the Western Five will have to decide whether they are prepared to impose sanctions against SA or not, and if they decline to do so, they will lose considerable credibility with the African Bloc.
- and if the Western Five seemingly side with the SA Government, it is likely that Swapo and the Frontline States will turn to the Soviets for greater military aid and involvement against the SADF and the SWA Territory Force in SWA.

There is another dimension to the whole issue.

The Western wing of the Secretariat would like a solution to the SWA issue as soon as possible in the combined interests of the West and Angola.

Angolan President, Educardo Dos Santos is desperately trying to break the hold that the Russians have on him and as such he is in great danger of being overthrown by a Russian-backed coup 'd etat.

Dos Santos motives are both political and economic. He would like greater freedom to manoevre in the global context and he is keen to attract Western capital and expertise to develop the Angolan economy.

The Russians are apparently well aware of his thinking and have applied terrific pressure to prevent this from happening.

It is however only through a settlement in SWA that Dos Santos can request the Soviets, Cubans and East Germans to withdraw from Angola.

The Cuban and East German troops are there ostensibly to protect the MPLA from attacks by either the SADF, Unita or the FNLA.

It goes without saying that Dos Santos in wanting a settlement in SWA, is bargaining on a Swapo victory which will put paid to the Unita threat.

On the other hand there has been speculation that a deal could well be in the offing between Dos Santos and Unita's Dr Jonas Savimbi as an anti-Soviet move.

This however seems rather a bleak possibility at this point in time.

Besides, even if a deal did materialise, the Russians would insist that the Cubans and East Germans remain in Angola to protect the country from SA intrusions and in order to support Swapo.

Whatever the case, there are clearly new sides to the SWA issue, sides to which the SA Government and the people of SWA will have to give serious thought.

It would seem that SA Foreign Minister, Mr Pik Botha and DTA Chairman, Mr Dirk Mudge have already come to terms with the changed situation.

Mr Mudge refrained from jettisoning Resolution 435 last week, something that he might have been tempted to do before he arrived in Pretoria.

And, remarked Mr Botha during the weekend: "If there are people who do not fear the results of a breakdown of continued negotiations and the possibility of sanctions, then they must ask themselves how matters would go if political power groups were allowed to reach their aims through the barrel of a gun and through threats and intimidation."

FOR SWAPO THE ALTERNATIVE IS WAR

Windhoek WINDHOEK OBSERVER in English 25 Oct 80 p 10

[Text]

BONN:

Speaking in his hotel suite here early yesterday morning [Friday] to the Windhoek Observer, Mr. Sam Nujoma, the SWAPO leader, said that failure of the talks in Pretoria between the South African Government and a high-powered mission of the United Nations, would lead to a call on all Namibians who cherished their freedom and independence to join the war.

In the absence of a genuine settlement, that was the only alternative, he said.

An escalation of violence was inevitable. The war would not be confined to the northern regions only. It would spread throughout the country "including Windhoek where you are".

He said that his movement would press for economic sanctions against South Africa, which meant the invocation of Chapter 7 of the Charter of the United Nations, and equally Articles 79, 41 and 42, in order to further isolate Pretoria.

Mr. Nujoma said that his movement suspected all along what South Africa's plans were. She had misled the Namibian people. His movement had all along been clear on the issues. If his movement did not win through with a negotiated settlement, it would win through the barrel of a gun.

"We control our guns, and nobody can tell us what to do. We reserve the right to fight and to liberate our country.

"Whether racist South Africa wants it or not, the country will be freed. SWAPO will fight, no matter for how long.

"Foreign troops are not needed. From the foreign world political and diplomatic support is needed and, of course, guns — guns which will enable SWAPO to effectively oppose the South Africans", he said.

In New York, Mr. Peter Mueshihange, SWAPO's Secretary for International Affairs, said that a failure of the Pretoria talks was expected. In this event, there was no alternative but to continue and to step up the war. It must continue until South Africa realises the need and the importance of a peaceful settlement.

Mr. Mueshihange, like Mr. Nujoma, sounded very optimistic about the outcome of a prolonged bush war. SWAPO forces would be there as long as there was no settlement. He said that South Africa's claim of having destroyed SWAPO's military strength was nonsense.

The world had come to recognise SWAPO, because she was the only South West Africa movement waging war in order to force the South African occupation forces to leave, he said.

From Pretoria, our special correspondent reported that only a miracle could still save the talks from an entire collapse. He writes that the United Nations team was bent on taking back something concrete, but that has become a fleeting hope.

South Africa is to be blamed for this development. There was no doubt that all her reservations have been met, and the sudden hysteria about SWAPO being the sole and authentic representative, has also been taken proper care of when for once Resolution 435 for the holding of internationally supervised elections is implemented, all parties participating are at par, and this was a guarantee.

KALAHARI COAL COULD PROMOTE RAIL, IRON INDUSTRY

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 31 Oct 80 p 19

[Text]

THE ADVENT of large scale coal mining in the Kalahari would bring SWA one step closer to the extraction of its own iron and tin reserves and create the possibility of establishing an iron and steel industry.

The proposed Botswana Gobabis coal line would be proximous to the largest known tin fields in the world stretching from Uis to beyond Otjiwarongo, and to at least one known iron ore deposit in the vicinity of Rehoboth.

Depending on the capacity of the coal line to be loaded with extra traffic on a regular schedule, these ores could then initially be exported through Walvis Bay in a roughly processed form.

The development of a localised iron and steel manufacturing industry in SWA is naturally complicated by a host of obstacles, both natural and technical.

Water and capital are each the largest natural and technical limitations stemming the development of heavy manufacture based on local mineral resources.

Neither play an absolute role in Rehoboth which is well serviced with transport, and plentifully supplied with accessible artesian water.

The mid-western tinfields are less fortunate. Their exploitation would require considerable capital investment for extraction because of their low grade and wide geographical dispersion.

Together, the Waterberg artesian system and the southwards canalisation of Kunene water, lend a degree of feasibility to the mining of tin on a scale exceeding current extraction, that cannot be discarded out of hand.

For the moment, however, the operationalisation of the Botswana coal line gives food for thinking along the lines of exporting primary crushed iron and tin ores, at least.

A report carried recently in the Windhoek Advertiser revealed that the mapping of a major coalfield was underway from the Nossob river to the northern boundary of Aminuis by Consolidated Diamond Mines.

The geological formations in which these coal deposits occur are contiguous with those in which the Transvaal coalfields are situated and it was not possible to confirm the extent of coal prospecting in Botswana conducted by Shell Coal.

That the Advertiser report had hit upon a sensitive point is revealed in the fact that immediately following it, the SWA Broadcasting Corporation had carried a follow-up report quoting the Territory's Mining Commissioner as saying that coal-mining in the Aranos area could be expected to commence in the near future.

This was strongly denied by a spokesman for CDM in Windhoek.

It is clear that at present, the Aranos coal deposits are not determined as far as the mining stage.

Despite the present favourable indication pertaining to the SWA coal deposits in the east with reference to the conveniently located artesian water beneath the coal layers, and the sheer size of the coal occurences from south of the Nossob to Aminuis and up to the Botswana border, it is reasonable to suggest that once Botswana's coal starts flowing across the border, it would be superfluous to commence independent coal mining operations.

Obviously it depends on factors with which the mining houses are most intimately acquainted.

BRIEFS

MUYONGO FOLLOWERS--Lusaka--About 275 men loyal to expelled SWAPO Vice President, Mr Misheke Muyongo have been disarmed and separated from their former comrades to avert any bloodshed in the camps, according to informed sources in Lusaka. The guerillas have been disarmed and moved to a camp where they will live as refugees. The breakaway faction is not recognised by the Zambian Government. The sources report that similar precautionary measures have been taken in Angola where there is a large group of cadres in SWAPO camps loyal to Mr Muyongo's revived Caprivi National Union. Mr Muyongo revived CANU--which merged with SWAPO in 1964--after being expelled from the party together with eight other members of the central committee.--Sapa. [Text] [Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 30 Oct 80 p 2]

SWAPO IN DARK--A SWAPO spokesman has said that the liberation movement would seek information on who disarmed some of the guerillas loyal to expelled vice-president Mishake Muyongo. The spokesman said in Lusaka that SWAPO was not aware that about 275 dissidents had been moved from SWAPO camps to avert possible bloodshed, and doubted the possibility of such an action having been taken. ENGLISH IN OWAMBO--Windhoek--English would eventually replace Afrikaans as the medium of instruction at schools and teachers' training colleges in Owambo in northern SWA, the Owambo Administration disclosed here yesterday. According to a statement issued by the Owambo Administration, English would be introduced gradually at schools in the area from the beginning of the next year. Owambo would, however, still remain the medium of instruction during the Junior Primary school phase, up to std 2.--Sapa [Text] [Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 28 Oct 80 p 1]

SWAPO DEATHS--Windhoek--The SWA Territory Force and the South African Defence Force had killed 38 SWAPO terrorists during the past nine days in the SWA operational area, Major General Charles Lloyd, Officer Commanding the Forces in the Territory, disclosed in Windhoek. This brought the total for October to 102, excluding 28 SWAPO and Angolan Government soldiers killed in southern Angola, he said. On October 28 the security forces were following the tracks of 6 terrorists. They became aware of the security forces and fled. One terrorist was shot dead. The security forces immediately proceeded with the follow-up action and again made contact with the remainder, killing a further 2 terrorists. The rest fled in different directions. The security forces proceeded with the follow-up action and again made contact with 2 terrorists approximately 40 minutes later and both were shot dead. It is suspected that these 5 terrorists formed part of the group which infiltrated the Outjo district, and of which 8 were killed. [Text] [Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 31 Oct 80 p 2]

SWA IMPORTS AND EXPORTS--Windhoek--South West Africa will in future handle its own imports and exports, a task which was formerly carried out by the South African Government, according to a statement by the SWA Secretary for Economic Affairs. The statement said control over all imports and exports to the territory which was presently being enforced by the South African Director of Imports and Exports in Pretoria would be taken over by the SWA Department of Economic Affairs with effect from November 5. NEW POLITICAL PARTY--Mr Andreas Shipanga, leader of the SWAPO Democrats has reacted to the news that a new political party--to be known as the United Namibia People Party (UNPP) had been formed in SWA. The UNPP is mainly composed of ex-members of SWAPO-D. In the statement released to the Press on the formation of this new party there was no reference as to who the office bearers would be. Mr Shipanga consequently challenged these people to come forward. "Come out in the open," he said. "Who are these people and who are their leaders? Are they the Mafia? Who is their Godfather?" Mr Shipanga asked amusedly. Mr Shipanga said that he did not think much of the new party's chances. "It will be one of those just existing in name." Asked whether he knew who the people could be behind the new party, Mr Shipanga said: "Since they are faceless it is difficult to comment. But I suspect that they are four members who left SWAPO D. Two of them are working in the kitchens at the Kalahari Sands Hotel and the other two are unemployed. When they broke away from SWAPO D a big fuss was predicted. Nothing happened. It was good riddance." [Text] [Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 30 Oct 80 p 2]

DECLINE OF EMIGRATION TO FRANCE

Saint Denis TEMOIGNAGES in French 29 Sep 80 p 1

[Article: The Inevitable Failure"]

[Text] The number of male and female citizens of Reunion migrating to France in 1977 was 5727. In 1978, it decreased to 5066 and in 1979 to 4417. It will probably be lower for the year 1980. This downward trend contrasts strongly with the official goal of 8000 emigrants per year that was established several years ago. These statistics prove that the policy of emigration, a genuine transfer of the population of Reunion, which was developed and enforced by the colonial authorities, has run into a dead end and is an admitted failure.

For us communists, who have never stopped denouncing this policy, which is contrary to the interests of both the government and the people of Reunion, it is out of the question to rejoice over an easy victory. First of all, for 4500 of our fellow countrymen who are obliged to flee their country and are forced to "select" exile with all that this includes, particularly the uncertainty of some day going back to their native land, their families and their close kin and even the fear, all the time that they remain in exile, that they will never again be reunited with them, this is a bitter pill to swallow. Moreover, the failure of this official emigration policy, of expatriation of men and women of Reunion, added to the aggravation of the crisis that strikes the nation, including men, women, the young and the not so young in ever increasing numbers, creates a situation which would be wrong not to size up correctly. This situation forebodes even greater sacrifices and heavier burdens for all the men and women of Reunion.

However, it is difficult to observe this failure and to believe that it was inevitable.

In any case, it is an illustration of an abstinate and permanent refusal of the colonial authorities to take into account the realities of our nation, to take into account its real interests and those of the men and women of Reunion; but what else could be expected of the colonial authorities and of those who serve them, implement their anti-Reunion policy or make themselves their accomplices?

For many years, when faced with real problems, they did not fail to answer with phony remedies, whose ineffectiveness was known in advance. When confronted with the underdevelopment suffered by the nation to this day, thanks to the colonial domination which has been perpetuated, and when faced with the need for truly developing the country in the interest of the men and women of Reunion, the authorities did not fail to respond by maintaining and reinforcing this patch-up arrangement which, according to the colonial authorities, would permit the men and women of Reunion to live better and to embark on the path of progress.

The veil of words has now been lifted. In spite of the authorities two "remedies," the situation has continued to deteriorate beyond all reason. Today, in the midst of this aggravated situation, birth control, the first phase of the policy employed by the authorities, has reached and passed the alarm stage. The other phase of this same policy, emigration, because it has already been experienced in all of its severity by tens of thousands of our people and because, running afoul of the situation created in France by the serious consequences of the policy of the same authorities, it has arrived at an impasse and is meeting with failure.

We had predicted this from the beginning. This is the result of the alleged "solutions" of the authorities which aggravate and increase the burden of Reunion and its inhabitants. And, as we have said, this is so since every year of this policy that passes brings its share of additional burdens and additional sacrifices that the men and women of Reunion will have to bear.

Finally, and this statement is one which the communists have always made, the real solutions to the problems of our country will be those that only the inhabitants of Reunion, free at long last and masters of their destiny, will determine and implement on behalf of themselves and of their country.

This is the reason why we communists are waging a struggle, so that Reunion will finally belong to its citizens. The failure of the emigration policy shows that there is an urgent need to proceed towards this change which is being demanded by more and more people.

UNFAIRNESS OF MEDIA DISCUSSED

Saint Denis TEMOIGNAGES in French 29 Sep 80 pp 4-5

[Text] Some extensive excerpts from the interview granted by Louis Francius to QUOTIDIEN DE LA REUNION (Reunion Daily) and which appeared in the editions of Thursday 25 September and Friday 26 September 1980 are printed below.

This journalist of FR3-Reunion has been stationed in our country for 11 months. He has constantly and zealously exercised the job of holding back information assigned to the journalists of this station.

Like the others, he has continually used the airwaves of a public service to wage war against the communists and against Reunion. Furthermore, his interview in the publication QUOTIDIEN is sprinkled with many attacks against the "nuts," against paradisiacal autonomy, against Paul Verges, to whom FR3 would grant 30 percent of the electorate, against TEMOIGNAGES against which "any methods" would be "good to employ," etc.

Consequently, the situation is quite clear. Jean-Louis Rabou, editor-in-chief of QUOTIDIEN, several weeks ago pleaded for a limited liberalization of FR3 in order to fight the Reunion Communist Party more intelligently. Today, Louis Francius pleads the same cause.

This is why we stated in our editorial on Saturday that the confessions of Louis Francius are not sufficient. It is necessary to broaden the struggle everywhere in order to free FR3.

The recent resolution issued by the Central Committee of the Re Reunion Communist Party on this question is on the agenda more than ever before.

Louis Francius made the following remarks with regard to freedom of expression in Reunion: "I believe, as a journalist, that the remarks made by Paul Dijoud at Mayotte to the effect that freedom of expression (particularly pluralism on radio and television) should be the rule and should always be applied in Reunion."

Therefore, Louis Francius confirms that there exists no pluralism on FR3, that the basic rules of this public information service are not observed and that freedom of expression does not exist on radio and television here.

On Wednesday, 10 September, Paul Dijoud stated in Mayotte: "All of the political parties must be allowed to express themselves on radio. Public debates must be organized and must include all of the representatives of the political scene."

A few days later, during a press conference at Saint-Denis, Paul Dijoud had the nerve to say that these remarks do not apply to Reunion--upon which one of his faithful followers told him "Oh yes, it applies perfectly!" Paul Dijoud was indirectly called a liar. This was necessary but not sufficient. It is also necessary to change the situation!

According to Louis Francius, "FR3 is the most difficult station in my experience when it comes to disseminating the news since there exists no such thing as an editor's conference. Everywhere else, the news to be covered is dealt with in the morning at such a conference. The root of the problem lies in operation of the editing function."

How can a normal and honest broadcast of the news exist in a service which does not operate in the normal way? The news released by FR3-Reunion is probably the only one in the world which is not first subjected to an editorial conference. It is no wonder that even a journalist of the stature of Louis Francius finds himself disoriented. As for the inhabitants of Reunion, they only want the officials and journalists of FR3 to perform the work for which they are so highly paid, that is, to disseminate the news--that is all!

Louis Francius says "Every self-respecting editorial staff should be working on its newspaper right on the spot. Why doesn't this practice exist here? Self-criticism is not a policy that belongs exclusively to Mao Zedong. Actually, it is above all a democratic principle. Therefore, there exists an overall modus operandi which we have totally missed."

Yes, indeed, FR3 is completely off the beam. It is isolated from the truth, the reality of the situation in Reunion, the basic problems of our country and the solutions which are imperative. Why is this so? Simply because its mode of operation is not democratic. We must inject democracy into FR3-Reunion!

With regard to journalists, Louis Francius has the following opinions: "The consensus of opinion, no matter what be its political origin, is that the FR3 journalists are not journalists in the true sense of the word. For example, government officials refer to any of them as simply "the speaker." FR3 is off the beam. It is completely isolated from everyday life. We are no longer journalists."

The operation of FR3-Reunion is such that a journalist has confessed: "We are no longer journalists." But these ladies and gentlemen are quite well paid to serve as journalists (their starting salary is approximately 9000 francs per month). Therefore, what are they being paid to do? Moreover, what does the "editor-in-chief" do?

If the other employees are only "speakers" who are forbidden to participate in an editorial conference, what should we say about the censor who cuts up and slices away at the texts prepared by the journalists? Should not they be paid as an ordinary microphone bandit?

Here are some excerpts from the statements made by Louis Francius regarding censorship: "There is no direct censorship (Editor's note: It's worse than censorship). All cutting off of news occurs before it can get to the journalist. The item is simply not covered. You have a social conflict that arises. You call up the union to find out what is going on and the answer you get is "It's better if you say nothing about it." With regard to this farm strike, the editor-in-chief did not even say "We won't cover this matter." In fact there are basic errors which, provided there is no urgent legal action involved (editor's note: at department level) in a problem, result in reaching the conclusion that this means that there is no problem to be concerned with.

Direct censorship, indirect censorship, little phrases, pressures, hints, threats, basically invalidated operation,--these are the conditions under which the FR3 journalists work under the watchful eye of the master. Under these conditions how can a valid news report be issued?

According to Louis Francius "I've never seen any social conflict dealt with on television. I have been told that FR3-Reunion represented the voice of France. That is not true. It is not the voice of France but rather that of the Reunion region, which is not the same thing. Similarly, FR3 Alsace is the voice of the Alsace region and not the voice of France in Alsace."

When we know how the local news reports are generated, we realize that FR3 is the voice of French colonialism and not of the people of Reunion.

Some highlights of Louis Francius' statements regarding complicity of some fellow journalists: "I believe that my colleagues at this post think the way that I do. However, there are a great many factors which cause everyone to keep quiet. I know that I'm going to have my knuckles rapped for granting this interview."

Well, Agnes Hilmant, Gilbert Hoair and all the others, it appears that you all agree with your colleague Louis Francius in saying that "FR3 is off the beam." Why are you waiting to say so for the honor of your profession and for the credibility of your firm? Why are you accomplices in the permanent scandal of FR3? Will you have the courage to go further than Louis Francius, who has not said enough on the subject to change matters at FR3?

Louis Francius made the following statements regarding censorship and diversion of resources by the editor-in-chief: "It should be made known that determination of possible coverage of news is made by the entire editorial staff but under the guidance of the editor-in-chief. He is the one who makes the selection and who assigns the resources to a given journalist for a given subject. Resources which are insufficient but which do exist are usually employed for marine subjects or magazines and thus diverted from the burning issues of the day....The journalists are not in control of the resources."

Thus, as in the case of the famous Captain Crochet, the only petty officer aboard his ship, at FR3-Reunion there is someone who disposes arbitrarily of all the technical facilities of the station and exercises complete control of their use. This is the editor-in-chief. Can Jean-Vincent Dolor tell us who this man is? Can he tell us by what right this gentleman diverts as he pleases personnel and equipment resources from their statutory function? An end must be put to such diversion of a public service!

With regard to elimination of certain subjects from broadcarting by FR3, Louis Francius is quoted as saying "The primary question is the following: Are we running a regional information station or are we regularly spokesmen for the prefectorial administration of the majority (Editor's note: In point of fact, of the right-wing minority which leads the nation)? We constitute a public service and it is normal that we echo the big decisions which have been made....Do the words public service imply elimination of those who do not have the same opinions as this majority? I believe that censorship of radio and television broadcasting is an abnormal phenomenon. The law that controls our operations bars from broadcasting those individuals who constitute a threat to the security of the government. As far as I know, the Reunion Communist Party is not an illegal party."

TEMOIGNAGES has always maintained that FR3 is at the service exclusively of cliques within the department and we have been insulted for expressing this viewpoint. Mr Cohic has stated that this constituted personal attacks. Now, Louis Francius comes along and confirms everything that we said. Now he classes as "abnormal" the acts of barring from broadcasts that he had always practised with his superiors and colleagues. It is high time that this policy of exclusion be discontinued!

In his confession, Louis Francius goes on to deal with the dissatisfaction with FR3: "I believe that support of the conflict over a period of ten days deserves a different subject every evening treating a different aspect of the conflict and its evolution and we can very well handle this problem as a public service without favoring any particular union or political ideology. We have only dealt with one subject, which is not enough. Therefore, it is not surprising that there should be discontent with this policy."

Therefore, the inhabitants of Reunion are entirely within their rights in displaying their dissatisfaction when FR3 ignores the majority political party of the island, stifles and suppresses claims disputes, poisons public opinion and forbids the free expression of all currents of opinion.

Dissatisfaction of Reunion public opinion with FR3 is entirely justified. Even Louis Francius, a company man, has finally come to admit it after having denied it along with all the others and after having insulted the communists who have been in the vanguard of the struggle to express this dissatisfaction. Let this teach us a lesson, gentlemen,

Louis Francius ended his confession with the following statements: "Upon returning to the station, I told everything that I had on my chest. I repeated that we are headed the wrong way. Louis-Marie Cohic has promised that, when we returned, we would hold a big meeting dealing with the problems of coverage (or should I say non-coverage) of local information."

The demonstration at Petite-Ile as well as the one at Dos d'Ane and others which may be held in the future were therefore completely justified. They began to make the powers think hard. (What unsuspected power the lowly tomato has proved to possess).

Consequently, the act that Mr. Cohic put on with his three minutes of silence was a pure bluff, as we pointed out.

As for the "big meeting" announced for the "return to the job," what has happened to it? Has it already been held? What happened there? If not, when will it take place?

At this "big meeting," why doesn't FR3 schedule a big debate dealing with itself and including representation of all currents of opinion?

PRESS COMMENT ON PFP EAST LONDON BY-ELECTION LOSS

'THE CAPE TIMES' Comment

Capetown THE CAPE TIMES in English 24 Oct 80 p 10

[Editorial: "The PFP Dilemma"]

[Text]

Sceptical about reform

The PFP has been appropriately sceptical about the Botha reform. The party holds that the President's Council, without African membership, has little hope of achieving success. It is correct in this view. No constitutional scheme will be worth much in securing the peace which does not command the assent of authentic representatives of the African community. Right from the start, black participation is essential. For these eminently sound reasons, the PFP has stood aloof from the President's Council. Our own feeling at the time was that the Opposition might have considered the option of taking seats on the c ncil conditionally, relinquishing their membership if blacks had not been co-opted within 12 months. Had they done this, perhaps, the PFP would have been in a better tactical position to repulse the vicious "boycott" propaganda at present in circulation. Given the relentlessly partisan approach of the Nationalist press and the more subtly partisan thrust of the SABC, this smear propaganda might well have had some effect. Most reflective South

THE EAST LONDON election result is a disappointment for the PFP Opposition. In assessing their electoral fortunes, the PFP will no doubt consider all relevant factors, including the massive Nationalist support for the NRP, whose role in the election was to serve as a surrogate for the Nationalists. The PFP should not lose sight of the possibility that a section of the opposition-supporting electorate might have been persuaded that Mr P W Botha's proposed reform is worth giving a chance — and that the NRP is right to back the Botha proposals and accept seats on the President's Council. If this analysis is correct, the PFP is confronting the old dilemma of the parliamentary Opposition in South Africa. The Opposition, if it is to do its duty, must proclaim policies which answer the needs of South African society as a whole. The Opposition must at the same time seek parliamentary support in an electorate which consists of whites only. It is hardly surprising that the white electorate, for the most part, perceives the situation in terms of its own group interests and is at all times vulnerable to swart gevaar propaganda.

Africans would like to hope that change is really on the way and that the Botha administration will measure up to it.

If there is a measure of wishful thinking discernible in the East London poll, this does not make the PFP dilemma any easier to resolve. On the one hand, it makes no sense to support measures which fall so far short of what is objectively needed to save South Africa. The exclusion of blacks from the President's Council is a fatal flaw. On the other hand, the "boycott" cry, hollow as it is, could prove damaging to the PFP. The PFP will fade as an effective force if it is to suffer a steady erosion of its parliamentary base. Any gains for the NRP at PFP expense would be a boost to government rather than opposition. The NRP is of little account outside Natal and these days it is drawing steadily closer to the Nationalists. Meanwhile, the PFP would be betraying itself and South Africa if it led people to believe that South Africa's constitutional future could be secured by a white-coloured-Indian axis, ganging up against the blacks. Without blacks, plans for constitutional reform are idle. In the long run the PFP will be shown to have been correct. But this is not much consolation. In the short run, the Opposition must retain a significant presence in Parliament if it is to do its job. A counter to the vicious Nationalist propaganda of recent times will have to be found as quickly as possible.

[Editorial: "NRP Victory"]

[Text]

THE PROGRESSIVE Federal Party has had another defeat. This time in East London North. And its pretensions of being a possible alternative government, of being an effective Opposition, of being a party of relevance, lie shattered.

The PFP has now lost two by-elections in mainly English-speaking constituencies, Simonstown and East London North, the one to the National Party and the other to the NRP.

And if that isn't shattering, what is?

Bear in mind that in Simonstown everything was going for the PFP. It had the full backing of the PFP newspapers, the Argus and the Cape Times. It had a popular candidate in Springbok cricketer and Western Province captain, Eddie Barlow.

It had all the resources of the PFP in the Cape Peninsula and beyond. It used its whizz-kid organiser, Neil Ross, who had engineered the Edenvale victory with consummate skill.

It had its peculiar brand of advantage that if it fights one by-election at a time, it generally wins because it can call on the full support of the beautiful people, with fleets of cars, loads of cash and dozens of workers, some of whom are employed by organisations which fund the party.

Yet John Wiley, mercilessly attacked in the PFP Press and without having any English-language newspaper to support him, won the seat hands down.

That was as clear an indication as the PFP could possibly have that it is rejected by the majority of English-speakers because it is out of touch with political realities, with the mood of the electorate, and with the demands of the times in which we live.

It has always been the party of the well-to-do, the lovely people, but despite the calculated gamble of having an Afrikaner academic, a Supervan, at its head, it cannot break out of its strongholds of the wealthy and the privileged.

More than that, by its refusal to take part in the President's Council, it has given its opponents the opportunity to hang the label of "political wreckers" and "boycotters" on it.

Simonstown gave its verdict: Thumbs down on the PFP.

Now it has been East London North's turn to do so.

Here, the PFP candidate, Mr John Malcomess, had been the sitting MP before he switched from the NRP to the PFP. So he had a personal advantage of having represented the constituency, of knowing its constituents, of attending to their needs.

He also had the benefit of Neil Ross's organisational knowhow.

By a curiosity which has still to be explained, there were 2 546 postal and special votes (20 percent of the eligible voters), with the PFP having a lead of more than 1 000 of these votes. This, by normal calculations, should have been a sure indicator of a PFP victory.

The fact is that it was the NRP which won, with a comfortable majority of 1 352 votes.

Now the PFP is bleating that the Nationalists voted for the NRP, and that the NRP's previous majority was cut by almost 900 votes, which supposedly shows that the PFP is still advancing.

But these arguments won't do.

The fact of the matter is that the NRP in this seat was just as handicapped as Mr Wiley was, having no English-language newspaper to support it.

Also, the PFP Press has given the NRP the image of a losing party, a party which has no support outside Natal, a party which has no relevance, a dying organisation.

Yet with all its problems, among them lack of substantial financial resources and of a Press of its own, the NRP has shown convincingly that it can meet the PFP head-on in a mainly English-speaking, urban constituency outside of Natal and beat it.

It is true that in the wealthy areas of Johannesburg and environs and in the Cape Peninsula, the PFP has strongholds in which it cannot be beaten.

But no official Opposition worthy of the name can be confined to a couple of areas.

The NRP, on the other hand, controls Natal province and has, on average, 1 500 to 2 500 diehard supporters in platteland constituencies.

Its reverses, in the Transvaal and Cape, after the break-up of the old United Party, came mainly from a lack of identification stemming from its new name.

However, although it finished bottom of the poll in Edenvale (though more than doubling its vote), and failed to take Eshowe from the Nationalists, it performed, overall, better than the PFP in by-elections (the PFP losing its deposit in Swellendam and Randfontein).

Now the victory in East London North will give the NRP new heart.

And it should remain a force to be reckoned with in Opposition politics.

Meanwhile, as we have stressed repeatedly during the past few months, the political situation in general has become more fluid than it has been for years.

But one thing is certain:

The PFP is unable to broaden its base or provide effective opposition.

It is a party with limited appeal, and the more it identifies with Black aspirations, the more its role in White politics will be curtailed."

KOORNHOF ANNOUNCES BILLS TO GIVE 'NEW DEAL' FOR BLACKS

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 31 Oct 80 p 7

[Text]

THREE draft Bills, promising a major new deal for Blacks in South Africa, especially those in urban areas, are to be published in the Government Gazette today.

Explanatory information relating to the Local Government Bill, the Laws on Co-operation and Development Amendment Bill and the Black Community Development Bill were released in Pretoria last night by the Department of Co-operation and Development.

The Bills are primarily intended to update and to remove unnecessary and hurtful discrimination appearing in the legislation reviewed in the Bills to give effect to the accepted recommendations of the Riekert Commission, and to effect a certain measure of rationalisation of the legislation administered by the department.

Reform

Speaking at a Press conference during which the proposed legislation was discussed, the Minister of Co-operation and Development, Dr Piet Koornhof, described it as "a genuine attempt at reform" in the interests of all the country's peoples.

"It is a genuine attempt to remove hurtful discrimination as far as is possible in present times," he said.

Referring to the all-important question of influx control, Dr Koornhof said this was a very sensitive matter, but was necessary for the sake of stability.

Squatters' camps in urban areas and the unhygienic conditions arising from them could not be tolerated. It was necessary to maintain order and to ensure an increased standard of living for all.

The department points out that the Bills reflect departmental thinking only, and have not yet been considered by the Cabinet.

It also says that cognisance was taken of the accepted recommendation by the Riekert Commission to the effect that the labour function relating to Blacks is to be transferred to the Department of Manpower Utilisation, but that the "influx control" function is to remain with the Department of Co-operation and Development.

Consolidating

According to the draft Local Government Bill, the legislation is aimed at consolidating and amending the laws relating to local government by Blacks in townships outside the national states, to promote the development of such government and to define the functions of local government organs.

The department says this Bill provides for two categories of Black local government organs, with jurisdiction in their respective townships:

- Town councils, with full municipal autonomy, under the overall control of the Minister (and not of the Administrator), and village councils, with varying degrees of responsibility, superseding the former community councils.

Principles

Dr Koornhof emphasised that the Bill was based on principles embodied in the Transvaal Local Government Ordinance No 17 of 1939.

The department says that, following the system in the Transvaal, a director of local government, being an officer of the Department of Co-operation and Development, is to be entrusted with the responsibility of ensuring the effective implementation of the Bill on a country-wide basis, and generally to promote the advancement of local government in townships.

In terms of the draft Bill, an existing community council automatically becomes a village council, save where the Minister specifically declares such a council to be a town council.

The compositions of councils and the qualifications of candidates for election are to be prescribed in the regulations. The town council is to be chaired by either a mayor or a deputy mayor, and may also have its own management committee. The village council is chaired by a chairman or deputy chairman.

According to the Bill, the town council has all the rights, powers, functions, duties and obligations of a local authority under the Black Community Development Bill, of a local authority under the Slums Act, 1979, and the Housing Act, 1966, the Sorghum Beer Act, 1962, and the relevant local government ordinance and/or a community development board under the Community Development Act, 1966.

The village council is to be vested with specific powers and duties relating to certain local government functions.

Welfare

In addition, the town council or the village council may be entrusted with matters such as the promotion of family life and the moral and social welfare of Blacks in its area, the promotion of sound community development, the establishment of a community guard, the making of recommendations regarding transport services or regarding educational matters.

It may also make by-laws, but these are to be approved by the Minister and published in the Government Gazette.

Some four existing Acts are either to be repealed or amended by this Bill.

The proposed laws on the Co-operation and Development Amendment Bill either repeals them in their entirety or amends about 22 existing Acts.

According to this draft Bill's long title, it aims, among other things, to amend the Black Administration Act, 1927, so as to further regulate the prohibition of Acts intended to cause hostility between population groups.

Among the Acts to be substantially amended is the Black Affairs Administration Act, 1971, whereby administration boards are to be restructured as smaller development boards to hand over local government to local authorities in townships in due course as and when the townships become viable entities.

Development

The main object of such a board in a township is to plan for the development of the Black community with a view to such community's eventual self-determination on local government level. Outside the townships, the board must ensure that existing laws relating to Blacks are implemented.

The last of the three pieces of legislation — the Black Community Development Bill — provides for the development of urban and rural Black communities outside the national states and to amend and consolidate different laws affecting them.

Under the Bill some 36 existing laws are either to be repealed in their entirety or are to be amended.

It will provide for "influx control" machinery and also will regulate the presence of disqualified persons in rural areas, outside the national states.

Undesirable

In spite of the fact that the entire Urban Areas Act is to be repealed, provision is made in the draft legislation for the temporary continuation of the clause relating to idle or undesirable persons and of the section relating to curfew.

The legislation also provides for a Black community development and revolving fund, to be administered by the director-general of the department, to finance primarily community development projects.

No indication is given of the size of the fund.

A chapter in the draft Bill also provides for influx control machinery and also regulates the presence of disqualified persons in rural areas, outside the national states.

Grouping

In terms of the Bill, an administration area is to constitute the control area but there may in appropriate cases be a grouping of areas or an adjustment of areas.

The presence of a disqualified person in such a control area (outside a township) is regulated by the Group Areas Act, 1966.

Inside the township the Black is a qualified person if he holds the requisite authority to be there but outside the township he is a disqualified person requiring a permit to regulate his presence unless he falls within one of the exceptions, namely:

- A bona fide employee, that is one in or taking up lawful regular employment and accommodated in approved accommodation in a township;
- A bona fide dependant, which includes the person with a Section 10 (1) (c) qualification or, in the case of a rural area, the spouse of the employee on the land or, in the case of a township, the person dependant on the registered occupier in approved accommodation;
- A bona fide visitor, that is the case of a visitor to an urban area or a township, one who has obtained authority from a designated officer and is in approved accommodation in a township or, in the case of a visitor to a rural area, one who visits a resident on the land and has obtained the approval of the owner of the land.

RAW ADDRESSES NRP TRANSVAAL CONGRESS

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 3 Nov 80 p 9

[Article by Jaap Theron]

[Text] THE leader of the New Republic Party (NRP), Mr Vause Raw, at the weekend again pledged his party's full support for the President's Council, but at the same time he called upon the Prime Minister to give the assurance "That the council would be free and unfettered in its right to recommend any form of constitutional change."

Addressing delegates at the annual congress of the Transvaal branch of his party in Johannesburg, Mr Raw said he accepted the Prime Minister's sincerety in opting for change and progress.

There had been some progress regarding social and labour matters, he said but attacked the Government for concentrating on economic and labour reforms — the material things of life — and so avoiding the need for human and political progress.

He attacked the Prime Minister, who he said had proved himself a master of the art of yo-yo politics. The Prime Minister had started with a demolition job, awakening high hopes, but had then put human and political progress for the other races on a different time schedule — on a "some-time, maybe one day" timetable.

Mr Raw urged the Government to do more for pensioners and retired people living on hard earned savings.

There was a clear direction missing from the Government's President's Council package. This was a clear direction for constitutional change. But he believed the council must be given a chance and every encouragement to succeed, Mr Raw said.

"It is within the Prime Minister's power to make a major contribution to its credibility."

Not extention

Its members and all the peoples of South Africa must know that the council was not an extention of the Government or of Paliament.

It must remain an instrument for negotiation and debate between all population groups and must be totally free to seek answers or directions which may mean changing "Government policy and attitudes," he emphasised.

In a strong attack on the Opposition leader, Dr F van Zyl Slabbert, Mr Raw again declared open war on what he called his party's main opposition enemies.

Royal game

The PFP was not royal game, he said, and Simonstown and East London North had shown "that the time has come for the NRP to fight back."

Looking "at Super Van — the leader of the official opposition — one sees a man with all the intellectual ability, the organisation, the money and back-up support, plus a personality of charisma and friendliness.

"Why did he then fail as a political leader?" Mr Raw asked.

Lost control

"Because he allowed himself to become the tool of the left-wing of his own party which made him lose the control of the reins of his leadership."

Dr Slabbert at his own Transvaal congress a week ago had attempted unsuccessfully to reconcile the irreconcilable elements of his coalition party, Mr Raw said.

The "Super Van" had allowed some elements of his party to support the "Release Mandela" campaign, but had failed to state his party's policy on the issue.

He had further allowed his congress to adopt an amendment to a resolution by Mr

Harry Schwarz — who he said was well-known for his patriotism — which had sought to record the natural condemnation of most South Africans of violence — the known weapons of terrorists.

Mr Raw said the NRP unequivocally condemned violence in any form as a political instrument for change.

The main reason why the PFP has lost two MPs in recent crucial by-elections, was because "the electorate has started to see through the PFP's superficialness, its platitudes, its equivocation and evasions of policy."

The congress took place against the background of "starting to build grassroots support and to bring back those moderates who belong to this middle of the road opposition party."

The chairman of the congress, Mr Alex Anderson, said the NRP was the middlestream party for all South Africans.

In the same terms the Prime Minister has often used with regard to the National Party, he said the future of South Africa did not lie with either leftist or rightist radicals.

But Mr Anderson and a number of other speakers accused the present Government of being "a crisis government" and a government solving problems on an ad hoc basis without a clearly spelled out policy.

Taiwan dance

Mr Anderson said: "Charity begins at home and not by dancing in Taiwan."

He announced that the Transvaal NRP would appoint another full-time organiser to assist Mr Klaas Viljoen and made an earnest appeal to businessmen "to become more involved in NRP politics again."

Mr Harland Bell, who ousted Mr John Malcomess of the PFP in the recent East London North parliamentary by-election, told the congress how the party had obtained its goal.

The NRP had fought on principles and the PFP on the image of Mr Malcomess. The PFP had never flown its colours and had blatantly misused the postal and special vote system, he said.

At the same time the NRP had proved to the East London North voters that it "had a crystal clear alternative to the NP's policies."

The PFP was the party alleged to have the "money bags". But in East London North it was the NRP which has "received so much financial support that I almost felt ashamed of it."

He had even upstaged the PFP on election day by turning up at the various polling booths with a Rolls Royce.

CABINET SETS NEW GUIDELINES FOR HOMELANDS CONSOLIDATION

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 31 Oct 80 p 2

[Article by Jaap Theron]

[Text]

THE government has finally decided to give preference to the 1975 consolidation proposals of Black states and only to use the latest Van der Walt commission of Inquiry's recommendations regarding a more meaningful consolidation for negotiation purposes only.

The Cabinet made it clear in a statement issued by Dr Piet Koornhof, Minister of Co-operation and Development, yesterday that more land would only be transferred to Black states "provided that the extra land would be applied economically and productively".

The Van der Walt commission's recommendations have not been completely rejected as a solution at this stage and the cabinet has requested the commission to negotiate with the Ciskei on the basis of its own recommendations in view of the Ciskei's envisaged independence.

But also with regard to the Ciskei more land will be only considered in terms of the Government's new policy of which the economic use and the productivity requisites were fully met.

This statement by the Government not only makes nonsense of the Herstigte Nasionale Party's continuous accusations that the Government has already drafted charts showing how much of White South Africa would go to the Blacks.

But it also proved that certain charts published reflecting vast pieces of White land going to homelands, are incorrect.

Main Factors

Economic considerations and the promotion of the Prime Minister's idea of economic development are the main factors the quidelines for homeland consolidation proposals announced yesterday rely on reports SAPA.

Further consolidation of the so-called Black national states will be made subject to these new guidelines the Cabinet agreed to at a meeting on Tuesday.

Priority will be given to the finalising of the 1975 proposals as already published, but a condition will be that land which is transferred must be used economically and productively.

"As part of the Government's announced policy relating to economic development in the promotion of a Constellation of States in Southern Africa, it is recommended that alongside the political and security considerations in regard to the consolidation of the national states, the following guidelines in connection with the economic development aspect should be followed:

● Preference should be given to the finalisation of the 1975 consolidation proposals, with adaptations where necessary, as far as it related to and could be implemented with the Constellation idea, on condition that on the transfer of the land it would be run economically and productively.

● Such transfer of assets should take place in a way which would ensure that it was used productively and that cash expenditure was limited.

● The economic development needs of each national state should be examined.

● In regard to the additional consolidation proposals, over and above the quota to which the Government was bound in terms of the 1936 legislation, an analysis should be made to determine to what extent border changes and the possible transfer of land and related assets to the national states, would satisfy their most important development requirements.

Priority

Dr Koornhof, referring to the Ciskei's proposed steps towards independence, said the Cabinet had now decided to request the Van der Walt Commission to give priority to consultation with regard to their draft proposals for the Ciskei, subject to the new guidelines outlined earlier and to speed up their finalisation.

Dr Koornhof said the Southern Regional Committee, the Central Consolidation Committee, the Commission of Cooperation and Development and the Ciskei Government had reached unanimity on the draft proposals.

He wished to emphasise, however, the South African Government had not yet reached a final decision on this matter.

After consultation with the affected land owners and afterwards with the Ciskei Government, the draft proposals would be placed before the Government and then before the South African Parliament.

Dr Koornhof later told journalists at a luncheon he believed the bills and the consolidation proposals were "the right idea at the right time."

They would make South Africa the phenomenon of the 20th Century, just as the Industrial Revolution had made Britain the phenomenon of the 19th Century.

South Africa could have a great future, or it could have a very bad one.

"But I am an optimist. I believe we will succeed.

"And let me tell the sceptics — history has proved that the sceptics are always wrong."

KOORNHOF ANNOUNCES ALEXANDRA TOWNSHIP PLANS

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 1 Nov 80 p 3

[Text]

ALEXANDRA township yesterday received a "new deal" from the Minister of Co-operation and Development, Dr Piet Koornhof.

At a closed meeting with Sandton city councillors, representatives of the Alexandra Coloured and Black communities and other dignitaries, Dr Koornhof announced plans for the township after years of uncertainty over its future.

The deal includes permission for 543 Coloured families to remain in Alexandra for a further five years while their "ultimate position" is investigated.

Dr Koornhof said he had also given an undertaking that he would submit the question of the future planning and development of the undeveloped areas surrounding Alexandra to the planning branch of the Office of the Prime Minister.

He had also given permission in principle for negotiations between the West Rand Administration Board and the Johannesburg City Council for the acquisition of 102 ha of the farm Lombardy on the eastern banks of the Jukskei River. This land should be used in Alexandra's redevelopment programme.

Referring to the "turbulent" history of Alexandra, Dr Koornhof said the township had never been set aside as an urban Black residential area in terms of the Urban Areas Act "in the normal way".

"This aspect, however, has now been brought in line and I am happy to announce that my department is progressing rapidly towards the ultimate goal of local authority status for the area. This aim, of course, requires the co-operation of the liaison committee."

Dr Koornhof said the replanning of Alexandra was in an advanced stage. He had been informed that a draft master plan had already been completed and would shortly be submitted to planning authorities and ultimately to himself.

The area had been divided into units for planning purposes and detailed planning of the first unit had been completed. Rapid progress was being made in the planning of the second unit.

BUTHELEZI DENIES INKATHA WORKS AGAINST ANC

Capetown THE CAPE TIMES in English 21 Oct 80 p 2

[Text]

JOHANNESBURG. — The Zulu cultural movement Inkatha was not setting up offices in Europe to counter the banned African National Congress (ANC), the Kwazulu Chief Minister and Inkatha president, Chief Gatsha Buthelezi, said at Jan Smuts Airport yesterday.

He was addressing members of the organization on his return from Europe, where he had been invited to address the European Parliament. "I don't regard the ANC as my target, but Pretoria," Chief Buthelezi said.

In all the discussions which he and his party had had with members of the European Parliament, they (the Europeans) had expressed concern at the black-white conflict in South Africa and wanted to know whether there was still any chance for peaceful political change in the country.

He had told them that the blacks in South Africa were in an 11th-hour struggle, but that he had told his "brothers" that they should look at the logistical problems in gaining their freedom — as those neighbouring countries that opposed South Africa had found.

"Nobody, but nobody has pledged guns or identified themselves with our brothers, and even Mugabe (the Zimbabwe Prime Minister, Mr Robert Mugabe) has said he will not provide a base against South Africa.

"While I don't say violence may not happen tomorrow, I told parliamentary members that I believe we shouldn't sit looking at the horizon and doing nothing about the situation."

Chief Buthelezi told them that if European countries were interested in the problems which black South Africans encountered, the least they could do to "strengthen our arm" was to give humanitarian aid, "just like other developing countries which they assisted with that kind of aid."

He declined to say whether he had been successful in obtaining aid, but said that if money was forthcoming it would not be used for Inkatha but for all South African blacks.

It was important for blacks in South Africa to get assistance from outside. They needed financial aid for agriculture and food production. Asked when Inkatha would establish offices in Europe, Chief Buthelezi said the question was academic at this stage. "It's not a question of when; it's a question of who goes where." It was important for South African blacks to be represented abroad. At present there were only the external factions of the ANC and Pan-Africanist Congress overseas. It was important for Inkatha to set up offices in Europe but, he emphasized, they would not be used to counter the ANC.

"Whatever people say, the struggle will be in South Africa by the people of South Africa." — Sapa

'DIE BURGER' COMMENTS ON NUJOMA MILITARY SUCCESS CLAIMS

Capetown THE CAPE TIMES in English 23 Oct 80 p 5

[Translation from Afrikaans of DIE BURGER editorial: "Nujoma's Claims"]

[Text]

TO PEOPLE who are properly informed about what is transpiring in the SWA/Namibia bush war, the latest claims of Sam Nujoma could sound laughable. He contends that Swapo is in the process of winning the military battle and that it is already in control of large parts of this area. It does not matter much to Nujoma that these claims do not square with the facts.

More than 1 300 Swapo terrorists have been shot dead this year by security forces. To lose bush fighters in this type of warfare at the rate of a company a month decidedly does not point to military ascendancy for the terrorist organization.

And when you reach the stage where you have to use fighters aged only 13 years in the frontlines, serious misgivings arise about the reserves of such an organization.

However, Nujoma knows that he does not have to concern himself much with the facts. He has an all too-willing audience prepared to listen to his stories. Even if they have doubts, it does not suit them to air these doubts. Nujoma and his outfit comprise only one of the many pawns in their onslaught on South West and South Africa.

For this reason it would be wise for Southwesters and South Africans not to be blinded by the evident silly yarns being spun by Nujoma and his lieutenants.

No slackening in the battle in the forseeable future can be expected. It is essential that the high standard of preparedness be maintained and that the Swapo pawns still be hammered mercilessly. Fortunately there are abundant signs that the leaders in the security forces are aware of this.

CONSOLIDATION PROPOSAL DETAILS TO BE ISSUED SOON

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 1 Nov 80 p 3

[Text]

THE detailed and long-awaited specific consolidation proposals for homelands will be released "anytime now", Mr Hennie van der Walt, chairman of the Government Consolidation Commission, said in Pretoria yesterday.

The specific proposals will delineate new borders for the Black states and vitally affect border farmers as boundaries get redrawn.

The guidelines announced by the Minister of Co-operation and Development, Dr Piet Koornhof, emphasise economic considerations instead of straight land swops for consolidation.

Mr Van der Walt yesterday refuted a statement by Dr Koornhof on Thursday saying that the new guidelines differed considerably from his commission's proposals.

The Government had merely chosen one of the alternatives offered in the Van der Walt Commission proposals, Mr Van der Walt said.

"There is nothing in the statement made yesterday which harms my commission at all," he said.

"They have just opted for more emphasis on economic areas instead of land, but that was one of the alternatives we came up with.

"That is the Cabinet's right to choose an alternative," Mr Van der Walt said.

From the opposition side, the Government's new vision on consolidation was yesterday hailed as "sensible".

Mr Bill Sutton, MP for Mooi River and a nominee to the President's Council, said: "At last they have twigged that land is not the solution to the problems."

He said it was ridiculous for the Government to keep buying smaller and smaller parcels of land for more and more money instead of investing the capital in the area.

"They should use the existing tribal system.

"The headmen and chiefs now control the land and are loath to give it up because they are paid rental for allowing it to be used.

"The R30-million we spend buying land would be far better utilised if we paid the man some sort of 'quit' rent and allowed the farms to be used to better advantage," he said.

"It is an absolute disgrace that a place like KwaZulu cannot feed itself. For this, the present system should be blamed."

In the guidelines announced by Dr Koornhof on Thursday, the Government said it intended limiting capital expenditure for land swops as much as possible.

Land transfers from White to Blacks would have to be "utilised productively and on an economical basis."

Priority would be given to finalising the 1975 proposals and further land swops would depend almost exclusively on the economic development needs of each national state. — Sapa.

INDUSTRIAL SECURITY REGULATIONS BEING PREPARED

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 1 Nov 80 p 8

[Text] Certain South African companies which will fall under the National Key Points Act of 1980, will, among other things, soon be forced to employ highly-trained security guards.

According to the trade magazine, Industrial Week, the National Key Points Committee in Pretoria is busy formulating regulations which will govern the protection against terrorism of key businesses and installations throughout the country.

Another important factor of the new Act is that it will tighten up the activities of local security companies, ensuring for the first time that they will be forced to meet stringent operating conditions.

The more reputable security companies are welcoming the new Act.

Training

"I believe that Black security guards will, for the first time, be armed and that some installations are already training them in the use of firearms," said Mr Roy Macfarlane, managing director of Fidelity Guards.

A spokesman for the National Key Points Committee in Pretoria said that they were still busy with the regulations and were receiving feedback from, among others, the Security Association of South Africa, the South African Police and the Railways Police.

"Once the regulations have been formulated, probably within the next month or so, they will be gazetted and become law.

"Among other things, specified companies will be forced by law to employ security guards. Their definition and training will be laid down," the spokesman said.

He refused to say what kind of companies or what percentage could be expected to be affected by the new act.

GOVERNMENT TO ENCOURAGE, HELP SMALL BUSINESSES

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 28 Oct 80 p 2

[Article by Johan Kloppers]

[Text]

THE Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries, Mr Pietie du Plessis yesterday announced that the time was ripe for the Government to launch a comprehensive programme to give aid to the small businessman in South Africa.

Opening the National Federated African Chamber of Commerce congress at Jan Smuts Airport he said many other countries had comprehensive and thoroughly planned programme for stimulating small business enterprises.

Referring to the programme in overseas countries he said it had been introduced to enable small business enterprises to compete with big enterprises "and to assist them in those fields where they fall short as a result of their smallness."

He said the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, has said at the summit meeting between South Africa, Transkei, Bophuthatswana and Venda special attention would have to be paid to, among other things, special arrangements to encourage small business enterprises.

Mr Du Plessis said he had to emphasise that the Government did not envisage at this stage taking over or hampering the various activities of the more than 30 institutions involved in aid to small business enterprises.

"On the contrary, the Government hopes these institutions will be strengthened, assisted and stimulated by this programme so that they continue their good work and do better than ever before.

There were basically two legs of the programme now being launched:

- The support of small business enterprises by means of a budget for these concerns with the Department of industries, Commerce and Tourism. This budget supported assistance to small business enterprises by various approved institutions and initiatives.
- A small business development corporation which would give financial assistance to small business enterprises in lieu of such assistance to small business practices, but under very favourable conditions.

Referring to the development corporation he said it would be formed as soon as possible.

"Comprehensive deliberations have been held with the governments of independent national states and self-governing states and it will be a partnership undertaking between the private sector and the Government sector.

He said Dr Anton Rupert had in principle pledged R5-million on behalf of his group during the Carlton-Hotel conference and the Government had allocated R10-million in this year's Budget for such an undertaking.

Deliberations between the Government and the private sector "are curently in progress to bring about this corporation."

"The government is less concerned about who will have the controlling interest in this corporation — the private sector or the Government. But should the private sector prefer this, the controlling interest can be in their hands.

"The corporation is expected to begin with a share capital of R100-million and it is hoped the private sector will take up at least R50-million of these shares," Mr Du Plessis said.

The functions of the corporation would include the following:

- The financing of small business enterprises through temporary participation in share capital, and loans on the short, medium or long term.
- The guarantee of loans furnished by the private banking sector to small business enterprises. In this regard it was important to point out that it would definitely not be the purpose of the corporation to take the place of the banks — it would be supplementary to the banks.
- The provision of other remuneration services to small business enterprises should such enterprises not be in a position to do so themselves.
- Supplying after-care services in support of the corporation's own financing function.
- Providing certain basic services such as infrastructure aimed specially at the requirements of small business enterprises.

LATEST GAS FIND NOT COMMERCIALLY VIABLE

Capetown THE CAPE TIMES in English 22 Oct 80 p 11

[Article by Gordon Kling]

[Text]

INITIAL indications are that the latest gas show off the Southern Cape coast by the state-owned Soekor oil search venture represents between five and 15 percent of what could be considered a commercially viable find.

Conceding this yesterday sources at Soekor added that there were no signs of oil in the gas-producing zone.

Well ED 4, 148 km south-west of Mossel Bay, is producing about 14 000 cubic metres of gas a day at the surface. Signs of gas were observed during drilling over a length of 220m at a depth extending from 3 220m.

Three zones were selected for testing in this area, with the first failing to gain any recovery and the second producing the gas. The third zone remains to be tested. Results can be expected in two to three weeks.

A spokesman for Soekor yesterday described permeability of the second zone — the ability to obtain a flow of the hydrocarbons from the reservoir — as "better than usual" and more sophisticated techniques than those applied in the past were being used to improve it.

"We should stress that what we have so far is not indicative of an economic discovery," said Soekor's press spokesman, Mr Mike Leibbrandt. "We'll only be able to put the whole matter into perspective later when the tests have been completed."

The Minister of Minerals and Energy Affairs, Mr F W de Klerk, said in a statement that the find was the ninth show of gas in Soekor's prospecting area.

All exploration for oil and gas by foreign firms off the South African coast ceased several years ago after early disappointing indications.

Soekor's R60-million budget is, however, justified by energy authorities in the context that it represents only four days' turnover by Sasol, and on the adage "oil is where you find it".

MOTSUENYANE ON BUSINESS PROMOTION--Mr Sam Motsuenyane, president of the National Federated African Chambers of Commerce, called on the South African Government yesterday to open schools and trading areas to all races to speed up the country's development. He said countries without mineral resources were ahead of South Africa economically because their governments concentrated on educating all its peoples and gave financial assistance to small businessmen to get on their feet. South Africa with all her mineral resources could give a lead in this direction if only she could get all her peoples to be fruitfully involved with the development of the country. Mr Motsuenyane has just returned from a tour of the Far East, where he found countries without mineral resources had established major industries and export capabilities. He was speaking at a conference of the industrialist members of the African Chamber of Commerce. Mr Motsuenyane criticised South Africa's policy of separating races in the economic sphere, a practice, he said, that was hampering the country's economic development. In all the countries in the Far East and the one African country, Kenya, he had visited, education was free and compulsory. BAN ON PARENTS' MEETING--Port Elizabeth--The secretary-general of the South African Council of Churches (SACC), Bishop Desmond Tutu, has described the banning of a meeting of parents and pupils in New Brighton this week as "annoying". "It simply means that we are now sitting on the lid of a boiling cauldron," he said in an interview. Mr A.Z Lamani, programme organizer of the Port Elizabeth and Cape Parents' Committee, said that the banning had "simply served to kill all efforts to make pupils return to school next year". The police liaison officer for the Eastern Cape, Colonel G van Rooyen, confirmed yesterday that the meeting had been banned "in light of the unrest situation in the townships on Saturday afternoon". Buses and cars were stoned in the townships here in the excitement over Mike Weaver's boxing victory over Gerrie Coetzee at Sun City. Police in Kwazakele fired tear-gas to disperse stone-throwing crowds. One man was arrested. Bishop said: "I came here to give a report-back to the parents and pupils after having been asked to intervene by a joint delegation from the Cape as a whole."--Sapa [Text] [Capetown THE CAPE TIMES in English 29 Oct 80 p 11]

BLACK SASH OFFICER--The Black Sash no longer believes that peaceful change is possible--but still hopes for a miracle, Mrs R. N Robb, vice-chairman of the Sash's Cape Western Region, told a meeting of the Institute of Citizenship yesterday. Mrs Robb said the Black Sash had failed in its strivings to achieve change in South Africa by peaceful, legal means. "We have failed abysmally, but not through want of trying." For 25 years the Sash and many others had warned the government that their discriminatory and restrictive policies would lead to the sort of violence that had taken place in the Cape earlier this year. "Peaceful protest and reasoned arguments have failed and the young people today have lost their patience and resorted to what seems to be mindless violence." In a talk entitled "The Black Sash--25 Years", Mrs Robb said it was depressing to look back on their public protests in the first years of the Sash's existence and realize today they would not be allowed to stage a march or a convoy nor could they camp all night outside the Union Buildings. Today the Black Sash's most important work is done through their advice offices--to help victims of unjust legislation and to inform themselves and the public of the results of the implementation of influx-control legislation. "Today the anti-white attitude of young blacks, although not surprising, is very frightening," Mrs Robb said. "They are obviously tired of waiting to be given their rights peacefully and every year show more signs of being prepared to demand if not take what is rightly theirs. However, believing that 'for evil to succeed it is sufficient for good men to do nothing' we will, like the Institute of Race Relations, the Civil Rights League, the National Council of Women and the Women's Movement for Peace, go on bashing our heads against a stone wall hoping for a miracle." DISBANDING INDIAN COUNCIL--Pretoria--The Indian Council was to be disbanded at the end of the month, the Minister of Internal Affairs, Mr Chris Heunis, said last night. The minister said that the move followed representations from the council's executive and talks with the Reform and Democratic parties. He said that the election of new council members would be held early next year and the new council would again have 15 elected and 15 nominated members. The minister said that a notice dissolving the council would appear in the Government Gazette tomorrow. Last night's announcement had the advantage that the present members of the executive committee could continue with their duties till the next executive was constituted. Mr Heunis emphasized that the government remained committed to holding a general election in terms of the act governing elections for Indians, and said that the election would be held as soon as possible. The election for the next Indian Council, in terms of the system of electoral colleges, would be held early next year.--Sapa [Text] [Capetown THE CAPE TIMES in English 23 Oct 80 p 2]

JAPAN, TAIWAN SUGAR NEGOTIATIONS--Tokyo--Negotiations between Japan and both Taiwan and South Africa have begun for sugar supply contracts, Japanese trade sources said. They said yesterday Taiwan approached Japanese trade houses with an offer of 80 000 tons of raw sugar for delivery next year with terms and conditions the same as this year. The current three-year contract, signed in 1979, calls for the supply of between 100 000 to 200 000 tons of sugar annually with the delivery price set this year at the London daily price plus £0,50 per ton. The sources said, however, that Japan had rejected the price terms and asked for a reduction in the price of £2 which Taiwan in turn rejected though Taiwan added that it would consider a cut in the tonnage delivered. Meanwhile, talks are underway with South Africa for sugar deliveries for next January to May for the delivery of just under 80 000 tons. This compares with 132 000 tons in the January to April period of this year. The sources added that the price arrangements with South Africa were based on both the London daily price average and on the terminal market price.--Reuter [Text] [Capetown THE CAPE TIMES in English 22 Oct 80 p 13]

UNIVERSAL PRIMARY EDUCATION WILL NOT BE FREE

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 28 Oct 80 p 1

[Article by James Dlamini]

[Text] A spokesman for the Ministry of Education has told a United Nations congress that primary school education in Swaziland will not be free and compulsory even when government introduces what has been described as "universal primary education" in 1985.

The officer was speaking in the final day of a congress on the creation of employment, reducing dependence and fair distribution of incomes. It was [illegible] by the Jobs and Skills Programme for Africa, JASPA. She said what the ministry meant by universal education was provision of school places "for all those who wanted to go to school." She stated that it would not be free or compulsory.

First Indication

This is the first time that a spokesman for the Ministry has officially stated that "universal primary education being planned for 1985" would not be free and compulsory.

The seminar has strongly recommended that the Ministry should be careful not to raise expectations which may not be met in practice. The revelation by Mrs. Katamzi, a planning officer in the Ministry, came as a surprise as the public has been consistently made to believe that there should be free and compulsory primary school education by 1985.

The seminar has also recommended that mobilisation of funds and teachers should be accelerated in order to meet the required goals.

"While appreciating government desire and policy to provide universal primary education to all children of the relevant age group, it was urged that greater inputs be made of this policy in terms of funds, teachers and physical facilities should be worked out carefully before high expectations are raised," a paper produced at the seminar reads in part.

Double Shifts

In this respect, a suggestion was made that to meet the constraint of classroom facilities the possibility of using double shift in schools be explored. Another disturbing claim was made by a representative of the Central Statistical Office, who said that his department has discovered schools which the Ministry of Education doesn't know about.

Ministry Denial

However, representatives of the Ministry denied this. The Times will try to find out more about the details on the education plan for 1985 in order to clarify the position as the public has all along been made to believe that they would not pay for primary education from 1985 onwards. More details about the resolutions of the seminar will also be published later.

MUSLIM SUPREME COUNCIL ELECTION RESULTS REPORTED

Kampala WEEKLY TOPIC in English 26 Sep 80 p 1

[Article: "Victory for Democratic Forces in Muslim Supreme Council"]

[Text] At last the democratic forces in the Uganda Muslim Supreme Council (UMSC) have emerged victorious. A convention of representatives from every corner of the country held in the Makerere University Main Hall nullified all the dictatorial measures taken by the Interim Chief Khadi, Sheik Kassim Mulumba, elected a new Executive Committee, and appointed new office-bearers to run the affairs of the Council.

As Sheik Kassim Mulumba lay critically ill in Mulago hospital, Prince Badru Kakungulu presided over the convention that undid whatever he had strived to achieve by suspending the constitution of the UMSC and dismissing the Executive Committee that had appointed him as Interim Chief Khadi. His appointment was for a period that should have been only three months but turned out to be more than a year.

The first victory for the democratic forces was registered when the off-and-on Convention was successfully convened at Makerere, after being turned out of the International Conference Centre where they had made a comfirmed booking for "Committee Room B. Even at Makerere some unidentified person had unsuccessfully attempted to persuade the University authorities to withdraw the facility from the convention.

The convention unanimously elected Prince Badru Kakungulu as Chairman and Haji Asumani Mbuubi, from Bukedi, as his Deputy. Kakungulu was elected in absentia although he had earlier indicated that he would not stand for any office.

The Convention--the second since 1972 when UMSC was founded--elected 15 Executive Committee members (three from each District) who later nominated candidates to fill various posts in the Council. The nominees ratified by the Convention were: Haji Isa Lukwago (Secretary General), Abdu Juma Biramahire (Deputy Secretary General), Haji Ramathan Wesike (Assist. Secretary General-Housing) Mohamed Kazimbiraire (Assist. Secretary General-Education); Haji Magid Baagalaliwo (Treasurer) and Zakaria Risasi- (Assist. Treasurer).

The members of the Executive Committee are: Westren Region: Abdu Juma, Isaaq Magezi, and Ahamadi Kitakule. Northern Region: Haji Mpira, Zakaria Risasi, and Sebbi Longa. Eastern Region: Muluya Mustapha, Kamadi Mwanga, and Haji Kalange. Kampala: I. Seguya, H. Mabuya, and M. Katalaga. Buganda Region: Abu Mayanja, Haji Aziz Kasujja, and Dr. S. Kigundu.

Also elected were seven shiekhs who will together with the District Khadis constitute the College of Sheikhs. By the time we went to press the College of Sheikhs was due to meet to elect a new Sheikh Mufti, a chief Khadi, and their deputies.

It appears that the UMSC has reverted to the system followed by most muslim countries where they have a Mufti on top as the spiritual leader with a chief Khadi under him as the head of administration.

As the election approached, observers speculated that the battle for the post of Chief Khadi will be between Abdu-Obedi Kamulegeya, Sheik Ali Kivumbi and Sheikh Walukuli. Former Chief Khadi Abdalla-razaq Matovu, was tipped as the chief contender for the post of Sheikh Mufti.

LIMITED NUMBER OF CUBAN SOLDIERS EXPECTED TO ARRIVE SOON

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 20 Oct 80 pp 1, 16

[Text]

KAMPALA is in the grip of a crisis following a wave of bombings and killings which rocked the city at the weekend.

And Ugandan Military Commission chairman Paulo Muwanga warned local officials to brace themselves for further violence.

He told a hurriedly-called meeting of councillors and chiefs, headed by the Mayor and his deputy: "Anything can happen in Kampala, any day, any moment.".

The bodies of seven people, including a man in military uniform, lay near a small car which had been riddled with bullets in a Kampala suburb. And on Friday night eight explosions were heard.

Referring to the recent crisis in north-west Uganda, after an invasion last week by soldiers loyal to former dictator Idi Amin, Mr. Muwanga said: "You may believe the war is in the north-west. But it is in your hands, here in Kampala. We have people in Kampala poised to cause trouble."

Since Amin was overthrown in April last year, Kampala has experienced numerous murders, robberies, car thefts and lootings. Officials say more than 2,000 people have been killed in the Ugandan capital in this period, some by men in Army uniform.

Uganda is now seeking the transfer of Cuban soldiers from Ethiopia to train the Ugandan Army, say sources close to the military government.

The sources, who have been reliable in the past, said in interviews over the weekend that a limited number of Cubans were expected to arrive soon. They said the Cubans would not replace the 10,000 Tanzanian troops still in Uganda, who make up the country's strongest military force.

Official Ugandan spokesmen, as well as some Western diplomats, have rejected suggestions that the east-leaning Military Commission intendes to bring in the Cubans. But the sources described the 7,000-man Ugandan Army as poorly trained, split by tribal and regional feuds and badly in need of discipline.

When a band of Amin's exiled soldiers invoded north-western Uganda, the sources said, about 240 Ugandan troops were caught on a parade ground in Koboko, unarmed, and were killed. Other Ugandan forces in the area fled in panic.

Muwanga returned on Friday from meetings with Ethiopian defence and police officials in Addis Ababa. He also visited Cuba earlier this month.

Uganda has in the past year sent about 400 men to Cuba for training in intelligence operations, said reliable sources. Additional hundreds were reportedly sent to Algeria for military training.

Diplomats say Uganda has had no intelligence agency since Amin was overthrown and his notorious State Research Bureau disbanded.

Government officials say a lack of military discipline is partly to blame for the nightly bursts of shooting around Kampala.

Automatic weapons fire begins when the streets empty at dusk and goes on sporadically untill long after the 10 p.m. curfew.

On Friday night, the shooting in central Kampala was unusually intense and the city was rocked by eight explosions.

Meanwhile, Sudan has denied that Sudanese territory is being used as a springboard by pro-Amin forces to attack Uganda.

A statement issued at the weekend by the Sudan Embassy in Nairobi said Sudan was not involved in such attacks as was alleged by Kampala.

The statement also pointed out that Ugandan refugees had been granted asylum in the Sudan because they were "forced by the prevailing situation in their country to seek asylum".

MINISTER TELLS UGANDANS THEIR RIGHTS

Kampala UGANDA TIMES in English 18 Oct 80 p 8

[Text]

UGANDANS are free to live and work in any part of the country, the minister of power, posts and telecommunications, Mr Akena p'Ojok has said.

He was addressing a rally at Kasese where Batoro had been threatened by members of the Rwenzururu movement.

p'Ojok made it clear: "There is no law restricting Ugandan citizens from living and working in any part of the country."

The minister who has been in Kasese District studying the problems of the area appealed to the Batoro who had fled the area to return to their homes and places of work.

"After meeting the authors of the threat there is now no cause for alarm", he assured.

He condemned tribal killings and revenge. "Anyone found taking the law into his hands will be dealt with severely," he warned.

p'Ojok said while the UNLA soldiers were beating off Amin's gangsters in Arua, any internal confusion behind their backs would be treated as enemity.

The minister dismissed allegations that the UPC (Uganda People's Congress) was playing some role in creating problems in Kasese District.

"The UPC, does not condone disunity because the party symbol is of an open hand of peace and unity."

The minister directed the removal of "mayumba-kumi" road blocks between Kasese and Fort-Portal since they served no useful purpose. He said any illegal roadblock on that road should be reported to the security forces immediately.

Akena p'Ojok warned some people who were interfering in the district's registration exercise to stop it.

He called on people who had not yet registered to take advantage of the extension of registration which was announced on Tuesday. — UNA.

FIRST-HAND ACCOUNT BEHIND AMIN INVADERS' LINES REPORTED

Blantyre DAILY TIMES in English 30 Oct 80 p 7

[Text]

A sudden invasion of the north west corner of Uganda by ex-President Amin's soldiers living in Sudan and Zaire caught the Ugandan and Tanzanian armies by surprise. While the Ugandans were celebrating independence day the invaders swooped. Within days the Tanzanians and Ugandans had counter-attacked and won back the areas. Gemini News Service's correspondent went behind the invaders' lines and talked with the troops.

HUNDREDS of Ugandan government security forces posted to man military garrison border towns in the north western areas of the country were caught off-guard by the lightning attack mounted by former Amin troops who seized several small towns within hours.

The incursion came when most soldiers were either preparing or taking part in parades to mark the 18th anniversary of independence from the British on October 9,1962

At Koboko, Amin's village town, about 300 soldiers, all unarmed and already taking part in the festivities, were massacred at will.

Koboko is about six kilometres from the Zaire-Uganda border and about 10 from the Sudan-Uganda border. The invaders quickly surrounded Koboko and extended their grip to the south in a drive towards the Arua, headquarters of West Nile District and also a Provincial Capital.

At first a spokesman of the ruling Military Commission was quoted as saying that "they were only a handful of confused Kakwa tribesmen — Amin's own tribe." But they turned out to be about 3,200 experienced soldiers.

Investigations along the Uganda-Sudan and Zaire-Uganda borders earlier this year showed that about 10,000 ex-Amin soldiers commanded by Felix Onama, Defence Minister in the post-independence government of Dr. Milton Obote, were poised to attack Uganda.

The Ugandan and Sudanese authorities dismissed the report as false and aimed at wrecking cordial relations between the two countries.

In fact, Onama was training thousands of ex-Amin soldiers who had crossed last year with their arms intact into the jungles of the Southern Sudan in bush guerrilla warfare — apparently with the full knowledge of the Sudanese authorities in the South.

The Sudanese, for reasons best known to them, had failed to disarm Amin's men, who are now camping as refugees only a few kilometres from the Uganda-Sudan border. They staged raids into Uganda and made off with hundreds of cattle stolen from the nomad tribes in north eastern Uganda, mainly Karamojong and Karapokots.

Amin's soldiers had crossed the borders at the end of the liberation war. They had military jeeps, armoured personnel carriers, tanks, mortars, rocket-launchers, automatic rifles, machine-guns, sub-machine guns, grenade-launchers, artillery pieces etc. More than 6,000 are estimated to be living in the refugee camps, still with their weaponry. In Zaire, about 4,000 or 5,000 ex-Amin soldiers are believed to have crossed the borders with their weapons.

Amin himself is said to have visited both the Sudan and Zaire recently and talked with his former commanders. He is believed to have invited them to his hideout in Jeddah or Riyadh, in Saudi Arabia, where the plans to invade Uganda were hatched. The Saudi Arabian government is said to have offered limited military and financial support to Amin supporters.

I crossed the Ugandan defence line into the territories still being held by the invading force and talked to several rebel soldiers. Some claimed that they had become homesick and merely wanted to return to Uganda to rejoin their families.

Others said they hoped for an early end to the political squabbling in Kampala after the general election, earlier planned for September 30, but now postponed till December 10.

The refugees expected the elections to be over by now and a general amnesty to allow them to return home and take part in the building of the new Uganda. But nothing seemed in sight, so they decided to use force of arms to return home.

Most of the soldiers dissociated themselves from the so-called Uganda National Rescue Front chaired by Brigadier Moses Ali who has vowed to reinstal Amin.

The invaders also took advantage of the continued squabbling among the three major political parties in Uganda — the UPC led by Dr. Obote, the DP led by Paul Semogerere and UPM led by the Marxist Yoweri Musoveni.

The three contenders have been locked in bitter argument on how to transform the country democratically after 18 years of no elections since independence.

The invaders proved to be a force to be reckoned with. They drove Ugandan government soldiers, armed only with light weapons, out of half a dozen border towns within two days.

They had taken Koboko, Yambe and Arua and started driving south. They aimed to take over Soroti and Tororo and then seal off the lifeline of Uganda's economy, the mainroad linking the country by rail and road to Kenya in the east.

If the invaders held their ground and extended their grip to the country's only outlet to the sea by road overland through Kenya, then the Military Commission government in Kampala would have faced real trouble.

The invasion force was commanded by Amin's former Chief of Staff, Maj-General Isaack Lumago, himself a career soldier and a Kakwa by tribe, said to be a moderate who tried to persuade Amin to make peace with Tanzanian President Julius Nyerere last year, before he was defeated.

Lumago is a Christian from the north. Amin is a Muslim from the north. The invaders had the support of local peasants and villagers who had suffered a great deal owing to lack of adequate security and persecutions.

TELEGRAM FROM RUGUMAYO, OTHERS TO UPC, BIDANDI'S REPLY

Kampala WEEKLY TOPIC in English 3 Oct 80 pp 1, 8

[Text]

THREE of the four NCC members who were commonly known as the "gang of four", namely Edward Rugumayo, Dan Wadada Nabudere, and Omwony Ojwok (the fourth fourth is Yash Tandon) have accused the Uganda Patriotic Movement of having collaborated in the establishing of a dictatership in Uganda under the Military Commission. The accusation was made in a telegram the three men sent to the Secretary General of the Movement, Bidandi Saali, wherein they described themselves as "Chairman NCC-UNLF", "Secretary, Political and Diplomatic Commission NCC-UNLF" and "Secretary NCC-UNLF", respectively.

The full text of the telegram, believed to be the first communication the "gang of four" have made with anybody in Uganda since the Military Commission assumed power, reads as follows:

"We congratulate you on your firm stand in the face of the UPC-Obote dictatorial manoeuvres to further consolidate its dictatorship through the dictates of the Chairman of the Military Junta. Although your challenge to the Junta comes rather late after having collaborated with it, nevertheless your demands that the supreme political powers of the NCC be restored is a commendable one. You should not forget that it was only the UNLF arrangement at Moshi that stopped Obote's manoeuvres to recapture power in April last year using the Tanzanian Army to do so. The UNLF arrangement strengthened all the democratic forces to raise up their voices and committed itself to restoring democracy and freedom in our country. It was this foresighted arrangement that enabled your parties to emerge, having been banned in the past by UPC's Obote. You should never forget this. The unprincipled opposition to the umbrella arrangement in some quarters (which only went a long way to strengthen UPC-Obote manoeuvres to overthrow the UNLF with the assistance of the Mumanga/Oyite Ojok/Museveni militarist cliques) this arrangement offered the country the best way of resolving Uganda's problems in the shortrun while not foreclosing major constitutional discussions after the country had settled down after the elections. Your connivance in accepting the Junta's dictates weakened the people who had accepted this democratic arrangement. For this reason you can only retrieve yourselves by firmly defending the Front and its organs against the UPC—Obote dictators. You should not only boycott NCC meetings but should resign from the Junta's cabinet. Those who occupy positions on the Military Junta cannot at the same time pretend to speak on behalf of the people. Uganda today needs not a so-called clean government of dictators but a peoples government elected by them in conditions that assure them unity to resist the dictators and strengthen democracy in the country.

Stand firm under the umbrella of the UNLF and resist the dictators. A bird in hand under UNLF is worth two in the bush of so-called free and fair elections organised by the Obote-UPC Junta. Long live the UNLF and unity of the people of Uganda".

Replying to the telegram from the "gang of four", UPM Secretary General, Bidandi Ssali, had this to say:

"I have received your telegram of September 23rd, 1980. First of all, I note with bemused amazement your reference to some of us as collaborators with what you call the ruling Junta. I earnestly hope it is not the same collaboration as you (Dan Nabudere and Edward Rugumayo) were involved in with the Amin regime in the early seventies. However, I suggest that you stop playing the hero and come back here to fight it out along with us. Otherwise, shut up and wait until the political atmosphere is peaceful enough for you to return and advocate your abstract theories on democracy.

"It is my submission that Edward Rugumayo, as Chairman of NCC, has the lion's share of the responsibility for the suffering that Uganda is currently experiencing. Because of Rugumayo's cowardly attitude he failed to come to the rescue of the nation at her hour of great need. Everybody knows that if Rugumayo had flown back from wherever he was and summoned the NCC the present crisis in Uganda would have been on a totally different plane.

"Since some of us have stuck it out the way we have, kindly leave us alone so that we may accomplish the task you have timidly abandoned."

Bidandi concluded his reply with the following observation: "Incidentally, it is a strange coincidence that all of you – the self - styled "democrats" – were conviniently out of the country on the day the Military Commission assumed power.

ECONOMIC AGREEMENT WITH MADHVANI FAMILY CRITICIZED

Kampala WEEKLY TOPIC in English 19 Sep 80 pp 6-7, 10

[Article by M. Mamdani]

[Text]

AT MOSHI, the UNLF pledged to consolidate and safeguard Uganda's national independence. This pledge became one of the four "Moshi principles". In its context, the UNLF vowed to repudiate all unequal treaties between Uganda and any foreign interest.

That was the promise. But if we are to judge by the first major industrial agreement between the Binaisa administration and a private foreign firm, that promise was not even worth the piece of paper it was written on.

Here we analyze the draft "Memorandum of Agreement by and between the Government of the Republic of Uganda and Heirs of Jayant Madhvani", dated October 1979.

Signed only six months after Amin's fall, their Agreement covered six major industrial establishments in Uganda, listed in Schedule I appended to the Agreement.

A. Sugar complex known as Kakira Sugar Works, Kakira.
B. Steel factory formerly known as Steel Corporation of East Africa Ltd. Jinja.
C. Glass Factory formerly known as East African Glass Works, Kampala.
D. Oil Mill Complex, Kakira.
E. Soap Factory Complex, Kakira.
F. Sweet Factory, Kakira.

and "such other enterprises as may from time to time by mutual agreement of the parties be added hereto".

WHO IS THE AGREEMENT BETWEEN?

With any other agreement, such a question may be superfluous. But not so in this case. Let us see why.

The title claims the Agreement is between "The Government of the Republic of Uganda" and "heirs of Jayant Madhvani". The preamble spells out the heirs as four individuals, of whom one Jayant Madhvani is said to be a Ugandan.

But as we move down the provisions of the Agreement, the Madhvanis fade away and their place is taken by a foreign company. Section 4 requires the Government "to enable a single non-resident foreign subsidiary of the MADHVANI foreign trust (herein after also referred to as 'MADHVANI') to subscribe to and be allocated shares in the Companies incorporated as described in Schedules I and II hereof (herein referred to as the 'Company' or 'Companies') and to continue to do so throughout the term of this Agreement".

In Section 5 it becomes clear that this "single-resident foreign subsidiary of the MADHVANI foreign trust" is none other than "Madhvani International, S.A., a corporation duly organised and existing under the laws of Panama, having offices at Trafalgar House, 11 Waterloo Place, London S.W.1, England (herein referred to as 'MISA')".

The Agreement then is really between the Uganda Government and a foreign company, Madhvani International S.A. (MISA), incorporated in Panama and based in England.

THE PREAMBLE

The preamble, as in any agreement, states the general attitude of both parties to the contract. But what is different and surprising about this particular preamble is that there is no pretence that both parties have equal gains to make from this Agreement. On the contrary, the two parties are depicted in the most dissimilar terms.

Uganda, on the one hand, is portrayed as being in a most wretched, helpless and pitiful situation. In the words of the preamble, Uganda is entering into the Agreement because "as a consequence of the deterioration of the state of these industries, their lack of capital and management, there is vast unemployment, underemployment, underutilisation of resources and lack of productivity".

MADHVANI, on the other hand, is portrayed as powerful and desirous of conferring Christian charity on Uganda. For, says the preamble, MADHVANI wishes to "invest in" these enterprises and "to encourage the return of private foreign investment capital to assist in the reconstruction of industry and commerce in the Republic of Uganda".

In other words, Uganda is to be recipient and MADHVANI the giver, Uganda the beneficiery and MADHVANI the benefactor. And what is wrong with that, the reader with his eyes on our present economic situation may ask. At least two things.

The language of the preamble puts Uganda in a weak and MADHVANI in a strong position. This is even before the terms of the contract are stated. No wonder the attitude of the preamble is reflected in every provision of the contract.

When all is said and done, as we shall soon see, the contract prostrates Uganda (that is, its people and resources) before MADHVANI who is given every opportunity to satisfy its financial appetite. The preamble really inverts the reality. For the fact is that the sole beneficiary of this Agreement is MADHVANI, allowed to operate without let or hinderance. And the sole loser are the Ugandan people.

OWNERSHIP WITHOUT CONTROL

Section 3 stipulates that Government shall have majority ownership (51%) in the steel and sugar industries, whereas MADHVANI is given a minority ownership (49%). In the remaining four industries, MADHVANI is to be the majority shareholder, while the exact percentages are to be worked out later.

Section 4 gives the majority shareholders the right to elect a majority of directors on the board.

Now, one would think that with a majority of shares and directors, the government would exercise substantial control over the sugar and steel industries. But not so. These majorities are simply a fig-leaf to hide a reality which is the opposite.

That reality is contained in the provisions of Section 5. Here, the government agrees to "vest full, sole and exclusive management responsibility and control in MISA for the planning and implementation of the rehabilitation and continuing production and sales operations of the Schedule I enterprises".

That is, it matters little whether the government has a majority of dicrectors on the board or shares in hand. In all these industries, without exception, it is MISA which is given "full, sole and exclusive" control.

Why, we may ask, is MADHVANI to be given "full, sole and exclusive" control? Is it because it promises to bring mountains of cash into the country to rehabilitate these industries? Or perhaps because MADHVANI promises to invest all proceeds from its activities within the country? Let us see.

CONTROL WITHOUT FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITY

The preamble boasts of MADHVANI's wish "to invest" in Uganda. But no sooner do we enter the fine print of this Agreement than the wish is quickly lost sight of. Instead, it is the government of Uganda, so helpless in the preamble, which emerges as the real investor.

The most explicit statement of this is to be found in Section 5, subsection II, Clause A. It is worth citing this provision in its fullest:

"Goverment shall:
To the extent that funds of the Schedule I enterprises are insufficient, and MISA is unable to procure or cause working capital funds to be lent to the companies, place sufficient funds at the disposal of MISA to meet all direct identifiable, operational costs of management, including the salaries and other personal costs of all personnel retained to manage and operate said industries, their travel and re-location costs, all consulting fees, professional fees, rents, rates, telephone and telex costs and such other expenses, costs and charges incurred by MISA within and outside the Republic of Uganda as are directly related to its activities pursuant to this Agreement". (Stress added).

Could a Shylock have done better? Nothing is left out; not even "the salaries and other personal costs"! Furthermore, the government is responsible for all costs "within and outside the Republic of Uganda", in local currency or foreign exchange.

And what, we may ask, is MADHVANI's responsibility? Section 6, Clause F, clarifies: "MADHVANI will actively seek out international credits and long-term development loans to finance said plan". Mind you, only "to actively seek out" credits and loans; no investment is promised.

But even in this "seeking out", the government is to be the really responsible party, not MADHVANI. Section 8, Clause O, spells this out: "As and when requested by foreign governments, government-sponsored and international credit and lending institutions, after due consideration on a case basis of the necessity thereafter, GOVERNMENT and/or Bank of Uganda shall issue guaranties of repayment of principal and interest in respect of loans taken by the companies in which GOVERNMENT holds shares ...." (empasis added).

And what if MADHVANI's efforts to "seek out" foreign credits and loans fail to secure sufficient funds? In that case, there is Section 7 of the Agreement: "...to the extent that financing, cash flow and self-financing is inadequate, GOVERNMENT undertakes to finance or cause to be financed the shortfall through GOVERNMENT's lending institutions or by means of GOVERNMENT's guarantees to private lending institutions.

In a nutshell, the government of Uganda in the last resort promises MADHVANI-controlled companies every shilling, pound or dollar they may need.

OTHER GOVERNMENT RESPONSIBILITIES

Legal agreements are notorious for being dull. But that is no excuse for ignoring any of the provisions. For this is not a fictional thriller. On the contrary, every responsibility the government assumes in an agreement with a foreign company is yet another load on the heads of the working people of Uganda. To weigh this load accurately, we need to look at two other provisions of the Agreement. The first is contained in Section 8, Clause E.

"GOVERNMENT shall assume full responsibility for all liabilities incurred by the industries prior to the agreement and transferral of the assets thereof and shall defend, indemnify and hold the respective companies harmless from any liability whatsoever to prior creditors, lienors, mortgagees, litigants, claimants and shareholders in respect of the assets assigned and transferred;" (Stress added).

Now, has this section simply been added out of a concern for thoroughness? Or could it be that the new machinery installed at some of these industries - like at the Kakira Sugar factory - by the Amin regime has yet to be paid for? Or could "shareholders" possibly refer to the brothers of Jayant Madhvani who are known to have begun legal proceedings for they argue they are no less "heirs" to the Madhvani empire in Ugandan than the signatories to this Agreement?

The second provision can be found in Section 8, Clause H:

"All essential services including without limitation, electricity, water, telephone, telex, effluent and sewage disposal, road and rail facilities, shall, upon application evidencing the need therefor and demonstration of the necessity thereof, be provided each of the said companies and the cost of construction to reach battery limits of said companies shall not require any contribution thereto by said companies" (Stress added)

Clearly, so far as MADHVANI's demands are concerned, the sky is the limit. But that should not be surprising. What is disturbing, though, is that even the Government's desire to oblige MADHVANI seems to know no bounds.

MADHVANI'S RIGHTS

Above, we have looked at those sections of the Agreement that spell out the Government's responsibilities. Now we turn to the remaining sections, which outline MADHVANI's rights. For that is the real nature of this Agreement; essentially, it is a listing of the government's responsibilities and MADHVANI's rights!

The most important weapon the Agreement gives MADHVANI is the right to freely export money out of Uganda. Section 4 stipulates the consents the Government is required to give:

"Said consents shall include the right to receive and remit in freely convertible currencies all dividends, whether in cash or kind, interest, capital, and proceeds from the sale of said shares, as well as assignments of shares within the MADHVANI group of companies, without any limitation, delay, restriction - or conditions imposed thereon and for so long as the investing MADHVANI companies shall remain shareholders of the companies" (Stress added)

Even in their wettest of dreams the sharks of finance could not possibly desire any more than this right "to receive and remit in freely convertible currencies all dividends", "without any limitations, delay, restriction or conditions", and that too "for so long as the investing MADHVANI companies shall remain shareholders of the companies".

As if to leave no doubt about it, the same stipulation is repeated in Section 8, Clause I. And, to ensure the maximum loot, there is even a clause which exempts these monies from Ugandan taxes! Says Section 8, Clause P:

"Exemption shall be granted from all withholding taxes and taxes at source levied on dividend, interest and payments made to non-resident shareholders, technical consultants and creditors of the companies contemplated by this Agreement".

Nothing is left to interpretation in this section. Clause S in the same section is addressed to the Government:

"Foreign exchange shall be made available without undue delay with respect to all foreign remittances contemplated in this Agreement, including without limitation, loan principal and interest, dividends, management forces, foreign employee savings and charges and purchases of necessary goods and services from abroad not available in Uganda".

The last two provisions in detail spell out yet two more clauses. Section 8 Clause N deals solely with the right of expatriates employed by MADHVANI to import duty free "all household goods, personnel effects and baggage" and to "remit their savings abroad". Section 8 Clause 6, on the other hand, requires that "all import licences will be granted promptly as and when required by said companies ... to rehabilitate and maintain continuous operation of each company throughout the term of the Agreement ... "

The cat is out of the bag. The real reason for MADHVANI's wanting to enter into the Agreement is not that it wishes "to invest" - for the Agreement doesn't require MADHVANI to invest even a cent. What the Agreement does give MADHVANI is the right to control these companies and to export local funds overseas without let or hinderance. It is the legalization of a daylight robbery!

A SOP

This, perhaps is the right place to turn to Section I of the Agreement. For Section I states that it is "expressly agreed and understood" that this Agreement in no way deals with the question of compensation (obviously referring to the 1972 takeover).

And it is further stated: "nor shall MADHVANI seek to raise the issue of claims for such compensation under this Agreement".

Now if someone gives you free beer (or Kakira sugar, for that matter) to swallow poison, would you thank him for it? Things, they say, must always be understood in their proper context.

A MATOKE REPUBLIC?

Such then is the nature of the first major industrial agreement signed by the UNLF Government with a foreign company. All that MADHVANI really commits itself to is a statement of good intentions and pious declarations. The Uganda government, on the other hand, is bound hand and foot to Madhvani's greed.

The truth of this comment is most obvious when we examine Sections 4 and 8 of the Agreement.

Referring to the government's undertaking to give MADHVANI a free hand in transferring dividends abroad, Section 4 stipulates:

> "The foregoing lawful consents, authorisations and waivers, shall include, without limitations, all Exchange Control, Treasury and Bank of Uganda consents and the consents of any other Ministry or Ministerial or Administrative body having jurisdiction over the companies. GOVERNMENT covenants that the undertakings set forth herein shall prevail and be honoured by Government without exception for so long as said MADHVANI companies remain shareholders of the companies" (Stress added).

In other words, even the Ugandan parliament (NCC) does not have the power to question MADHVANI's right to transfer funds unhindered "for as long as said MADHVANI companies remain shareholders of the companies!"

And that is not all. Even more explicit on the omnipotence of MADHVANI and the importance of the GOVERNMENT is section 8, sub-section A:

> "All requisite and necessary lawful consents, authorisations, waivers and approvals will be issued, given, granted, maintained and consented to from time to time by relevant authority as and when requested by the applicable company and/or MISA and in good and sufficient time to enable the applicable company to operate normally, efficiently and without hinderance of any kind"; (Stress added).

But sub-section B goes even further, specifying that MADHVANI need not even wait for GOVERNMENT approval before putting its will into effect:

> "None of the companies, their respective branches and subsidiaries shall be subject to any penalties or restraints in carrying out their respective business operations in a normal way if, to maintain said operations management elects to take necessary action prior to the formal issuance of the authority therefor, as requested by any of said companies; (Stress added).

Even water could not be clearer! Even the blind can see and the deaf hear. So obvious is the meaning of these words.

They say about banana-producing neo-colonies in Central America that foreign companies have such a hold on their central lifeline that it makes a mockery of their claim to republicanism and sovereignity. So they call these Central American countries "banana republics".

Now, no two phenomenon in nature or society are exactly alike. But should the Madhvani Agreement become the guideline for contracts between Uganda Government and foreign corporations, what would one say about our sovereignity? In that case, would a commentator be wrong in referring to this country as a "Matoke Republic?"

DEATHS IN KAMPALA UNREST--Kampala--Seven bodies, one of a man in military uniform, lay sprawled in a Kampala street on Saturday morning after a night of heavy firing and unexplained explosions in the Ugandan capital. They lay near a small car which had been riddled with bullets. People living in the same area of old Kampala said a number of houses had been broken into and looted during th the night curfew, which begins at 10 pm. Residents at the Imperial Hotel said three civilians were shot and wounded when an army patrol entered the hotel while a late-night discotheque was in progress. Tension in the city has increased as preparations begin for Uganda's first parliamentary elections since 1962. The elections are due to take place on December 10. Radio Uganda announced that 14 district commissioners, in different parts of the country, had been suspended for security reasons. It gave no details. Government officials, asked about the announcement, said allegations of inefficiency or disruption of the programme for registering voters, which began recently, had been under investigation.--SAPA-REUTER. GENERAL STRIKE CALLED--Ouagadougou, 6 Nov (AFP)--A 2-day general strike call issued by the four main Upper Voltan labor organizations has not been heeded in the way that labor leaders had hoped for, observers said here on the second day of the movement. The national work stoppage was called in sympathy with the teachers union, SNEAHV, which has been on strike for the past 6 weeks to demand the reinstatement of two members transferred following an earlier strike and the recall of four student teachers sent to France on courses. An information meeting at Ouagadougou's labor exchange this morning was attended only by the Voltan Confederation of Unions (CSV) to which the main teachers' union is affiliated. More policemen than usual were on duty outside public buildings in the capital today, but Ouagadougou and Upper Volta's other main towns were all reported quiet. Work was going on normally in some sectors. [Text] [AB061016 Paris AFP in English 0709 GMT 6 Nov 80]

REFUGEES IN FRANCE INCREASE--The number of Zaire nationals granted political refugee status in France rose from 10 in 1978 to 500 last year. According to provisional estimates, the figure could double during the current year to about 1,000. Meanwhile, French Foreign Ministry sources said that consular officials had been ordered to tighten up on the issuing of three-month visas to Zairese nationals coming to France, in a move to cut down illegal immigration from the Central African state. The sources described the exercise as a "limitation" on visas rather than a suspension and noted that similar restrictions had been placed on nationals from several other countries, including Pakistan and Sri Lanka. COUNTRY'S POLITICAL TURMOIL SEEN COMING TO SURFACE

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 2 Nov 80 p 10

["Muongorori's View" Column]

[Text]

EXACTLY what is happening in Zambia now is difficult to judge — but there is something decidedly ominous about the disclosures by President Kenneth Kaunda that a gang of armed dissidents had tried to overthrow his Government.

It is now 16 years since Zambia's Independence, and President Kaunda, a devout Christian and peacemaker, has meticulously built an impressive international reputation for his country and himself as a statesman of unassailable credentials.

Indeed, Zambia has, over the years, played host to such important gatherings as the historic non-aligned summit of 1973, lately, the epochmaking Commonwealth Conference at which the Lancaster House talks were mooted and, not least, that country's frontline role as a buffer zone for nationalist activity during Zimbabwe's liberation struggle.

On the home front, President Kaunda was the very epitome of hope in the emergence of an African brand of socialism through his much publicised humanism works. Seen against this background, current events in Zambia seem strangely out of context. Or could there be more to it than meets the eye?

What seems obvious is that Zimbabwe's Independence, hailed as a dream come true for Zambia, has also brought into sharp focus the undercurrents of internal political turmoil overshadowed for years by the country's involvement in the liberation wars of Southern Africa.

But perhaps the real problem in Zambia is the seemingly intractable economic difficulties characterised by frequent shortages of essential consumer goods, and guarded opinion among the educated Zambians of Lusaka and the industrialised copperbelt blames Dr Kaunda for what they see as unrealistic economic policies.

The crucial question that must be asked is whether Zambia will be any better off without Kaunda. The answer to that is a matter of conjecture. What is no guessing matter is the grave implications of the present political upheavals to the future of that country.

Faced with a staggering balance of payments deficit running virtually into billions, a rising crime rate and stagnation in economic growth, Zambia can ill afford the "luxury" of a coup. Needless to say, the cost of such an event to Zambia could well spell an economic catastrophe.

All things considered, Zambians themselves can not be without blame for the problems their country is facing. For instance, widespread indolence among the rural peasants has virtually reduced formerly white-owned farms into unproductive wastelands with little or nothing growing on them.

In the peri-urban areas around Lusaka and the Copperbelt, some wealthy Zambians who purchased farms turned them into residential mansions where they could hold exclusive parties to entertain relatives and colleagues.

Coupled with the penchant for easy living and luxury, a kind of "get rich quick" fever seems to be sweeping through Zambia like an epidemic.

The discovery of rich emerald deposits in the country's copperbelt province seems to have aggravated the ordinary Zambian's desire for wealth and the result has been the growth of a lucrative black market trade in the precious gems.

Admittedly, there maybe some among those opposed to the President's leadership who feel bitter about his failure to halt rampant corruption, and dereliction of duty in the civil service, as well as the quasi-state institutions. Others feel the President has not been firm enough in dealing with those of his lieutenants who fell out of line.

Critics of the President have also been known to decry the country's electoral system which gives the central committee of the only political party, the United National Independence Party a special right to approve or disapprove parliamentary nominees after primary elections.

Whether there is any substance in these grievences is again a matter for Zambians themselves to judge.

But it is clear from what reports are available that, despite the measures imposed by the President in enforcing the dawn-to-dusk curfew in most parts of the country, and the arrest of some of the dissidents, the political crisis in that country is far from over.

While the security forces have things under control, the Zambian Government has an opportunity to launch a full scale investigation in order to get to the root cause of the problem.

South Africa has a record for sponsoring subversive missions, but the fact that some prominent Zambians are involved puts a new dimension to the problem.

SENATE CHIEF CALLS FOR BAN ON IAN SMITH

'Nauseating Outbursts' Criticized

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 2 Nov 80 p 1

[Text]

FORMER Prime Minister Mr Ian Smith should be banned from Zimbabwe if he continued his "nauseating outbursts" denigrating this country and its people while on overseas trips, said the Leader of the Senate, Senator Joseph Culverwell, yesterday.

He said he and most of his fellow senators felt strongly that Mr Smith should stop talking this "obnoxious rubbish". They intended to suggest to the Government that Mr Smith should be extended the same facility afforded to General Walls (who was banned from Zimbabwe in September) if he failed to do so.

Similar action should be taken against other "Rhodesian Front recalcitrants".

He said: "We are slowly but very surely becoming weary, appalled, disgusted and nauseated by some of the inferences, innuendos and utterances made by a few extremist Rhodesian Fronters outside the country."

MERITOCRACY

Senator Culverwell was commenting at a Salisbury Press conference on an overseas report of a speech made by Mr Smith in Toronto during his Canadian tour last week. He had checked the report at source for accuracy, he said.

He quoted Mr Smith as saying that he "deplored" one man, one vote for all countries, including Canada.

Mr Smith had said that he believed in a "meritocracy" with restricted voting rights. To give the vote to everyone irrespective of merit or qualifications and to allow "inefficient and corrupt people" to vote a government into power resulted in "chaos and madness", Mr Smith was reported as saying.

This was a deleterious reference to Zimbabwe and its citizens, said Senator Culverwell.

"We are getting pretty tired of all these sayings by Smith and company.

He also quoted Mr Smith as saying in London that he did not regret one iota of his action in declaring UDI.

"Mr Smith said that if he had not taken that step we would all have starved in this country," said the senator.

"Not once has this man regretted all the hardship he and the Rhodesian Fronters caused in this country. He seems to forget that they were largely responsible for the deaths of 30 000 of our people and that they had, in fact, 63 discriminatory laws, including the Land Tenure Act which was worse than the Land Apportionment Act."

Asked why Mr Smith was still allowed to take part in the political system, he said it was magnanimous of the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe to allow it.

"But that does not mean a return of the status quo. Unless this sort of thing stops we will have to think of some way of doing so. The utter hypocrisy of these people, saying they are part of the government and then decrying everything we do or say, is appalling.

"This very disgruntled man, besides other things, even had the arrogance to suggest to the Canadians that they would have been better off if they had abandoned the principle of one man, one vote — and he defends South Africa."

Senator Culverwell said: "I think this thing will be discussed and the Government itself will have to decide what to do. Smith is basically a racist and we do not need any form of racism in our society."

● Angry callers, both black and white, telephoned the Sunday Mail office last night immediately after ZTV screened a news conference held by Senator Culverwell.

Many whites complained about the attack on the former Prime Minister, Mr Ian Smith, by the Senator. But most black complainants said that Mr Smith should not be allowed to re-enter the country after hearing his reported comments against one man, one vote.

All said they could get no satisfaction from ZTV when they were asked to complain directly to the studios if they disagreed with the screened news special programme.

PRESIDENT BANANA warned last week that traitors and undesirable elements will not be tolerated in Zimbabwe. A nation has the right and duty to protect itself from those who would do it harm, or seek to do it harm, but it is the way in which it protects its sovereignty which is all-important.

Our Government rightly places great store on human rights, dignity and freedom — they were among the things it fought for — but let us not reach the stage where disagreement with, or criticism of, Government or party policy means condemnation and banishment.

Traitors and other undesirables. They are both seen as enemies of the State — people the country can do without. One is easy to define, the other not.

Allegations of treason can, and must, be brought before the courts but who is to judge who is undesirable — and why? Many of those who now lead the Government were once branded as undesirables: are they to perpetuate something they regard as evil and unjust? True, they have inherited a great deal of repressive legislation from previous governments but they also have a Constitution which is particularly strong on fundamental rights and freedoms.

The country already has one example of instant banishment since the new Government came into office — that of General Peter Walls. Now comes a call from the leader of the Senate for action against former Prime Minister Ian Smith who has been shouting his mouth off overseas.

Mr Smith's remarks were certainly provocative, many will say deplorable, and could harden attitudes here at home among both those who resent criticism and opposition and those who are genuinely working for reconciliation and understanding.

The temptation to say "Pack your bags and go" or "Do not return" must sometimes be strong but let it not become the easy way of getting rid of people who differ or who do not necessarily fit in one hundred percent with the new order of things.

POLITICIZATION OF LOCAL ELECTIONS HIT

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 30 Oct 80 p 3

[Text] Gwelo--There was a very real danger that town and city councils could fall under the control of central government with the introduction of party politics into local government, the president of the Local Government Association, Alderman G. A. Sulter, warned yesterday.

He stressed this was his own view, saying: "With councils' independence of political parties there is a healthy and desirable counter-balance between party policies and parochial interests.

"This free expression od fivergent opinion could be lost in an all-embracing politically controlled environment.

"Government by the people should be a two-way communication from the people through their locally elected authorities, with their parochial interests, to central government, with national interests and policies, and not a communication between central government and local party cardes."

Asked for the LGA's views on the postponement of nomination day for the elections Alderman Sulter replied: "The LGA is naturally anxious that the (elections) that will introduce majority representation on councils will be conducted as efficiently as possible.

"Also, that there will be adequate provision for the electorate to assess the calibre of the candidates and to be able to record their votes without pressure of any form to ensure the election of the best and most suitable candidates.

"While the postponement of nomination day to November 7 might assist the nomination of candidates, the reduction of the time between nomination day and the polling days will affect adversely the ability of the electorate to assess the candidates--and that is apart from the additional pressure that will be experienced by election officials in finalising election arrangements in a shortened period."

The Mayor of Gwelo, Councillor Roy Futter, said he was not happy with the postponement of nomination day.

Gwelo had worked to the original dates set down and it had a good response.

"Even in Wards 1 and 2 (the former municipal area) we have a total of 15 candidates and this is good for it shows that people are showing an interest," he said.

"I don't know what the postponement will achieve apart from perhaps helping those who were not on the ball. I believe that everybody had time to get their nominations in."

The Mayor also expressed his disappointment at the entry of politics into local government.

"We will not necessarily get the best men for people will now vote for a party rather than for the man," he said.

COURT RULES MNANGAGWA EXCEEDED AUTHORITY

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 1 Nov 80 p 5

[Text]

JUDGES of the Appellate Division of the High Court in Salisbury have termed "arbitrary and illegal" the action of Mr Emmerson Mnangagwa, Minister of State in the Prime Minister's Office, in arresting and deporting Mr John Mandirwhe to Mozambique.

The comment was made in a detailed judgment handed down recently listing the reasons for the court's decision in September that it did not have jurisdiction to decide whether the Minister had breached the Declaration of Rights in the Constitution.

The Chief Justice, Mr Justice Fieldsend, and Mr Justice Lewis, Judge of Appeal, agreed with the other Judge of Appeal, Mr Justice Baron, when he said that although the court did not think it had the jurisdiction, this did not mean it treated the matter lightly.

Saying the court took a grave view of Mr Mnangagwa's "arbitrary and illegal" conduct, Mr Justice Baron added: "We can only hope that, particularly since the rule nisi was prematurely discharged, some further administrative action will be taken to restore Mr Mandirwhe to this country and to make some amends for the wrong done to him."

The arrested man, Mr John Mandirwhe, was the subject of an action brought in the General Division of the High Court by his relatives in August.

The action brought by Mr Daniel Mandirwhe, his brother, was that a writ of habeus corpus be issued against the Minister, compelling him to produce Mr John Mandirwhe to the court by August 15.

The court heard that Mr Mandirwhe, also known as John Makomberedze, was arrested by members of Special Branch in Highfield on the instructions of Mr Mnangagwa. Mr Daniel Mandirwhe told the court in an affadavit that he had been told by the police that his brother had been arrested for allegedly recruiting people to overthrow the Mozambique Government.

On the instructions of Mr Mnangagwa and by arrangement between him and the Mozambique authorities, Mr Mandirwhe was handed over at the Machipanda border post on July 12.

On August 15, the last day of the time limit allowed the Minister to produce Mr Mandirwhe, Mr Mnangagwa said in an affadavit that he did not think there was anything further he could do in the time available to him to return Mr Mandirwhe to Zimbabwe.

In the affadavit Mr Mnangagwa said he had had talks with the Mozambique Deputy Defence Minister, General Sebastian Mabote, who indicated that the return of Mr Mandirwhe would be difficult.

The judge who heard the matter said that in view of this, he would have no option but to discharge the writ against the Minister.

Mr Justice Baron said: "With respect to him, I think the learned judge came to the conclusion prematurely. The fact that the respondent was not able to comply with the court's order by the time of the return day did not require that the order be thereupon discharged."

He said he thought it would have been proper in Mr Mandirwhe's case to allow the Minister a further period in which to try to get the deported man back to Zimbabwe.

On the point of the judge's decision to refer the matter to the Appellate Division to decide whether the Minister had breached the Declaration of Rights, Mr Justice Baron said that because this decision was unnecessary for the habeus corpus writ he should not have referred the matter to the Appelate Division.

MUGABE: GOVERNMENT TO SEIZE SOME WHITE-OWNED FARMS

No Compensation Offered

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 2 Nov 80 p 1, 2

[Text]

THE Government was to take over some white-owned farms without compensation, the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, announced yesterday.

The decision had been taken because Britain had reneged on its pre-independence promise to pay white farmers for land needed by the Government, he said.

Mr Mugabe told a Mount Darwin rally that white farmers would be asked to surrender some of their arable land to the Government resettlement programme.

But they would have to look to the British Government for compensation "because we have no money to pay them and do not feel inclined to pay for land plundered from the indigenous people by the colonialists".

The British had said they had no money to pay the farmers, "and we also say we do not have the money", he said.

Mr Mugabe told the rally, attended by an estimated 3 000 people, that the land to be seized from the white farmers would be allocated to Zimbabweans presently living on reserves and other less fertile parts of the country.

He said his Government was committed to satisfying the needs of the people, "and I know one of your most urgent needs is land on which to grow crops. It is our priority to ensure that you get it."

Earlier, addressing farmers at the Mount Darwin Primary School, Mr Mugabe announced far-reaching measures designed to turn Zimbabwe into the food granary for Africa, and ensure the full participation of black Zimbabweans in the country's agricultural revolution.

The measures will include:

- A comprehensive resettlement programme to ensure that every able-bodied Zimbabwean has sufficient land on which to grow enough food for home consumption and export.
- Provision of agricultural requisites such as fertiliser, seeds, ploughs and tractors.
- The amendment of conditions of agricultural loans to make them more accessible to blacks.
- The establishment of an efficient agricultural extension service to operate on a non-discriminatory basis.
- A significant increase in maize producer prices as an incentive for farmers.

The Prime Minister regretted that only a handful of white farmers had turned up for the meeting, and disclosed that plans were afoot to ask some of them to put their tractors at the disposal of the Government for use by the black farmers.

He said that although offers of tractors had been made by several countries abroad, the short time left before the rains had made it imperative for the Government to seek alternative means to help the farmers.

Conditions

And because the local tractor assembly plants could not meet local demand, "the Government plans to ask those who have them to contribute to the national effort to produce more food".

Mr Mugabe said the appropriate authority in the Government was already studying the current conditions of agricultural loans to farmers.

"If there are banks lending money to white farmers, they must now extend that service to the blacks."

It was the Government's intention to ensure that assistance formerly given only to white farmers was also given to their black counterparts.

With immediate effect, there should be only one farmers' association representing all farmers, whether black or white.

"Our farming organisations must reflect the changed situation," Mr Mugabe said.

The Prime Minister also called on farmers to go into joint farming ventures in order to pool their resources to productivity.

Mr Mugabe was accompanied by his wife, Sally, the Minister of State in the Prime Minister's Office, Mr Emmerson Mnangagwa, the Minister of Labour and Social Services, Mr Kumbirai Kangai, Education and Culture Minister, Mr Dzingai Mutumbuka, Youth and Sport Minister Mrs Teurai Ropa Nhongo and several Deputy Ministers.

He told the farmers: "Zimbabwe has the potential to feed herself as well as exporting. It is up to us all to prove that we can do it by working hard on the land."

Mr Mugabe also said his Government would not tolerate employers who continued to flout the Minimum Wage Act.

He described black employers as the "worst culprits" in paying their workers low wages and urged all Zimbabweans to strive for better living standards for all.

He had also received reports that some white farmers had sacked their workers after the Government announced the $30 minimum wage.

"Their excuses of low producer prices or soaring overheads are unacceptable because they do not reflect the truth of the situation."

Statement Clarified

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 3 Nov 80 p 1

[Text] The Government has not taken a decision to acquire land without compensation, according to sources yesterday.

But it could be forced to seize vacant and unused land if the international community failed to respond to its plea for money to buy land on which to resettle the war-displaced, refugees and peasants, they said.

The question of asking some farmers to surrender some of their arable land voluntarily and without compensation was not a measure being considered by the Government as a solution to the massive resettlement programme, said the sources.

Clarifying a statement by the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, in Mount Darwin at the weekend, one senior Government official said: "The position is that the Government might be put in a position where it may have to take some vacant and unused land owned by absentee landlords without compensation because of lack of funds."

The response by the international community to appeals for funds to buy land for resettlement has not pleased the Government which now blames Britain in particular for "reneging" on an undertaking made during the Lancaster House constitutional conference.

According to another source present at Saturdays meeting, Mr Mugabe was actually making another appeal for funds to enable the Government to acquire much-needed land constitutionally without resorting to seizure without compensation.

A paper released by the British Government when the Lancaster talks were deadlocked over the land issue said Whitehall assumed that, after a political settlement, there would "inevitably" be a need for a substantial land development and settlement programme.

Agency

"They (the British Government) will be ready to contribute to such a programme, and to encourage other countries to do likewise."

The paper went on: "If the Government of Zimbabwe were to decide to set up an agency to organise and finance agricultural resettlement and development, including land purchase, the British Government would be ready to contribute to its initial capital."

The Zimbabwe Government still needed more land and more funds with which to acquire that land, Mr Mugabe told the Senate recently.

"The position has not yet changed. The Government is still appealing for more financial assistance to buy more land for resettlement," said the source.

In London yesterday the Foreign Office refused direct comment on Mr Mugabe's statement that his Government may have to seize white-owned land because Britain had reneged on pre-independence pledges of financial aid, Iana-AP reports.

"During the Lancaster House conference, no figures were bandied about at all," a Foreign Office spokeswoman said.

She also declined to comment on whether Britain would take any action if Mr Mugabe's Government confiscated land.

The Foreign Office spokeswoman said that £20 million of British aid was due to be used, along with an equal contribution from the Zimbabwe Government, for land resettlement schemes.

At Lancaster House, Britain avoided both giving specific financial pledges or tying any promise of aid to "buying out" white farmers on the grounds that it envisaged Zimbabwe developing as a multiracial country.

GENERAL WALLS BUYS CAPE REAL ESTATE

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 2 Nov 80 p 4

[Text] The exiled former military supremo, Lieut.-General Peter Walls, has bought a seaview plot at St Francis Bay, a select resort in the Eastern Cape.

The general paid $7 000 for the plot, according to divisional council records at the administration centre of Humansdorp.

A South African Sunday newspaper which reported the transaction said the record listed the sale to G. P. Walls, with an address as P.O. Box 128, Highlands, Zimbabwe.

Two years ago it was claimed in South African newspapers that General Walls had bought two seafront flats at Umblanga Rocks, north of Durban, which he intended to have converted into one. He denied being involved in the deal.

However, he owns houses in Salisbury and Inyanga, valued at more than $100 000.

In true military fashion, the general apparently did a personal "reece" before deciding to buy at St Francis Bay.

He and his wife, Eunice, are understood to have spent a week at the home of St Francis Bay resident, Mrs Eva Taylor, a family friend who acted as agent for the deal.

It certainly paid off--the 1,731 m^2 plot, registered in the general's name on August 27, is reckoned to be now worth three times what he paid.

The area would satisfy one of the general's pasttimes--sailing. St Francis Bay has its own marina.

Mrs Taylor refused to confirm that the deal had gone through.

Controls

But newspaper sources said: "He came here a couple of years ago and when he decided to buy he came back for another look because he fell in love with the place."

There are strict controls on the design of house which the general will be allowed to build. The homes of the retired executives and other top people who have moved in are valued at nearly $10 million.

The Walls's plot has a fine view of the sea.

The general took leave at the end of July, pending his retirement at the end of the year as commander of Joint High Command.

At a news conference on July 18, called to explain his retirement, the 54-year-old general denied rumours that he had property outside Zimbabwe to which he intended to retire.

The storm over his criticism of the conduct of the independence election which led to him being banned from Zimbabwe blew up on August 12, and on August 23 the Prime Minister said there was no room for the general in the country.

ZANU (PF) TO AVOID 'WHITE' WARDS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 30 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] ZANU (PF) will not nominate candidates in most of the 13 former white wards in Salisbury for the November local government elections, the party's director of local government elections and Minister of Lands, Resettlement and Rural Development, Dr Sydney Sekeramayi, said yesterday.

The party was, however, putting forward candidates in all the 23 wards in the recently incorporated former local government areas and was hoping for a clean sweep in them, he said.

Speaking in an interview, Dr Sekeramayi said it was not the party's deliberate policy as such not to stand in the former white areas, but a decision was taken after an assessment of the chances of the party winning seats in wards which were predominantly white occupied.

"If we had some white people associated with the party who had reasonable chances of winning in the elections we would put their names forward," he explained. "But as things stand we feel we have no chance in these areas."

ZANU (PF) was, however, sponsoring candidates in three of the former white areas, Wards 5, 7 and 8 representing Greendale, Braeside and Eastlea, and Waterfalls respectively.

Speaking at a meeting attended by about 800 delegates in Harare on Tuesday evening the Minister said it was the responsibility of ZANU (PF) members to choose candidates whom they knew were best suited for the job of a city councillor.

"Besides choosing people whom we know to be party members of long standing," he said, "we also want people who are capable of the position of a city councillor. We do not want councillors who will be yesmen to the white councillors."

Speaking at the same meeting Mr Eddison Zvobgo, the Minister of Local Government and Housing, said in the five district elections held so far ZANU (PF) had swept all the seats. The party was likely to win most of the seats in the districts, he said.

"We may lose some seats in the former white wards in the cities, but this should not happen in the former local government areas," he said.

"Among you here tonight could be the future Mayor of Salisbury," he said, "and we want a mayor we will be proud of."

Our Bulawayo correspondent reports that in Bulawayo four councillors have been returned unopposed in Municipal Wards 1 to 8 inclusive.

Eleven candidates will contest the remaining four seats in the former Bulawayo municipal area.

● Municipal and other local government workers could not stand as candidates in the forthcoming urban council elections, a spokesman for the Ministry of Local Government and Housing said yesterday.

Civil servants could stand for election if they had the permission of their Minister, acting on the recommendation of the Public Service Commission and subject to the approval of the Minister of Local Government and Housing, the spokesman said.

REPORTAGE ON INCREASING INTERNAL UNREST, PARTY SQUABBLES

Deaths, Injuries

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 30 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] Four people died and 16 were injured in a grenade and smallarms attack on a Dzivaresekwa funeral gathering on Wednesday morning. Five other people were injured in two other grenade incidents on Tuesday.

A senior police spokesman said that at about 12.30 a.m. yesterday a grenade was thrown and smallarms fire was directed at the funeral party for a ZANU (PF) supporter.

A spokesman for the Andrew Fleming hospital, where the injured were taken, said some of them had been injured "quite severely".

Mr Antonio Dumingo, of Staycro Street, Dzivaresekwa, at whose house the incident took place, said the attack was launched just after midnight.

He said more than 40 people were at the funeral of his brother-in-law, Mr John Gwarimbo, who was killed in a bus accident on Saturday.

Mr Dumingo was next door at the time of the raid and did not see the attackers. He said he could not find any motive for the attack.

Three of his children were injured. Two of them suffered leg injuries and the third was wounded on the forehead.

Mr Luka Chaparadza (22), one of the people at the funeral, was badly injured in the right shoulder, his brother, Cain, said. He was not sure whether his brother had been hit by a bullet or shrapnel.

"The attack lasted about 15 minutes and after it had stopped Luka and the other mourners were covered in blood. Some of the people in the house were also injured, but three of those died instantly," Mr Chaparadza said.

Mr Benzai Nyandoro said a man had been at the house earlier and had started a heated argument with one of the mourners. He said the man had returned and claimed he was a "comrade" but refused to identify himself.

"After he left, the attack started," Mr Nyandoro said.

The police spokesman added that at about 5.30 p.m. on Tuesday a grenade was thrown at a passing army truck by "unknown persons", near the clinic in St Mary's, Salisbury. Four men in the vicinity were injured.

At about 1.45 that morning, a cyclist travelling towards Rimuka, Gatooma, was injured when an explosive device, thought to be a hand-grenade, detonated next to him. The man was taken to Gatooma hospital, the spokesman said.

Manyika Wounded

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 3 Nov 80 p 1

[Text]

THE Deputy Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Mr Robson Manyika was wounded, and a Salisbury man, Mr Suleman Abdul Mahomed, was killed in a shooting incident outside the Queens Hotel in Salisbury last night, police said.

In a separate incident yesterday two people were killed, a further two injured, and two police officers assaulted in St Mary's, Salisbury.

Squads of armed police blocked off the Queens Hotel after the shooting there at about 7.25 p.m.

A police spokesman said; "The Deputy Minister arrived at the hotel with his bodyguard when he was confronted by a man.

"He accused the Deputy Minister of supporting the UANC. An altercation took place between the two, and the man, after walking away, stopped, allegedly drew a pistol, walked back and fired a shot at the Deputy Minister.

"The Deputy Minister's bodyguard then shot the man who died as a result of his injuries. He also fired a few shots in the air.

"The Deputy Minister was wounded in the forearm, though not seriously."

The spokesman said a Mr Boniface Kanyenzi was wounded in the buttocks, "but the wound was not serious.

"Both he and the Deputy Minister have been taken to the Andrew Fleming Hospital."

At the Nyatsime Beerhall in St Mary's, two policemen were stopped by a crowd at about 4 p.m., the police spokesman said.

The vehicle in which the patrol officers were travelling was overturned and both men assaulted one severely.

Elements of the Police Support Unit and the Zimbabwe National Army were deployed to the scene to assist the police. On their arrival they were fired upon by an unknown gunman.

The spokesman said the national army had retaliated in self-defence. Two people were killed and a further two injured.

Police Rebuffed

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 2 Nov 80 p 1

A POLICE chief yesterday called on ZANLA commanders to hand over the 250 guerillas who swarmed out of an assembly camp last week and mounted seven ambushes.

Mtoko member-in-charge Inspector Rob Riedy has held several talks with commanders in a bid to have the men brought in.

But guerillas who murdered two policemen in August are still inside the Assembly Point X-ray, despite repeated promises by ZANLA chiefs to root them out.

One man died and two other people were injured in the spate of ambushes on Wednesday.

A ZANLA man was shot dead by soldiers.

"I've asked for the men responsible for the attacks to be handed over to me," said Inspector Riedy.

Camp commander Mr Chihombe Madala refused to discuss the outbreak of trouble — the third big breakdown in discipline in three months.

He would only say: "I am in constant communication with the police."

Questioned about the ambushes, he replied, "What ambushes? Opened fire on civilians? When?"

Deputy ZANLA commander Mr Josiah Tongamiri went to Mtoko, 120 km north-east of Salisbury, on Friday in a bid to defuse the situation.

Inspector Riedy said: "The situation is now calm. There have been no more incidents since Wednesday's trouble."

The latest trouble erupted when a group of ZANLA men began beating up a lone, unarmed policeman in Mtoko village.

They were stopped by soldiers from the Zimbabwe National Army. The mob became angry and a soldier fired a warning shot into the air.

The guerillas then ran off, saying they were going to fetch their weapons.

The guerillas then mounted seven ambushes on civilian motorists on the main Salisbury-Mtoko road.

One of the two people injured in the attacks, farmer Mr Rodd Addams, was yesterday "satisfactory" in Salisbury's Andrew Fleming Hospital.

He was hit in the leg.

The guerilla was shot dead by soldiers as he opened fire on an army truck while sitting on top of a moving car.

Mugabe Blames ZIPRA

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 2 Nov 80 p 1

[Text]

THE Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, has blamed ZIPRA elements for delays in the formation of a unified national army.

Apparently referring to the Minister of Home Affairs, Mr Joshua Nkomo, Mr Mugabe said: "ZIPRA still consider themselves under a different national leader, and this is causing the delays in our efforts to form a unified national army."

The Prime Minister was answering a questioner after he addressed about 200 farmers at Mt Darwin primary school yesterday.

One of the farmers had asked the Prime Minister whether it was the Government's intention to maintain two separate armies.

The Prime Minister replied: "In fact, we have three armies at present, ZANLA, ZIPRA and the Zimbabwe National Army incorporating elements from the two former guerilla movements and those from the former Rhodesian Army."

He said that so far the unification exercise had reached a stage where the country now had five battalions while the target was nine battalions by the end of the year.

Later Mr Mugabe said the shootings at Chitungwiza were started by ZIPRA elements firing on ZANU (PF) supporters.

He warned that his being silent on the matter did not mean cowardice. "I am warning those responsible for the troubles at Chitungwiza to stop immediately because when we act we act decisively."

Nkomo Refutes Charge

BULAWAYO.

THE Prime Minister's allegation that ZIPRA forces were responsible for the shooting at Chitungwiza was inconsistent with known facts, the Minister of Home Affairs, Dr Joshua Nkomo, said here.

The Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, was yesterday quoted as saying shootings at Chitungwiza were started by ZIPRA elements firing on ZANU (PF) supporters.

Mr Mugabe was also said to have told Mount Darwin farmers that ZIPRA elements were to blame for the delays in the formation of a unified national army.

"To say that ZIPRA fired at ZANU (PF) supporters is far from the facts as they are known," said Dr Nkomo. "ZIPRA is not given to going about shooting people."

The Patriotic Front leader refused to be drawn on whether he was satisfied with the pace of the integration exercise.

"There is no time when he (Mr Mugabe) has said ZIPRA is holding back the exercise. I reserve my judgment on the allegation until I get it straight from him," said Dr Nkomo. Asked whether he was to seek a meeting with the Prime Minister to get a "clarification", Dr Nkomo said: "We always meet and discuss things."

SUCCESS OF REFUGEE REHABILITATION HAILED

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 2 Nov 80 p 11

[Article by Nigel Adlam]

[Text]

ZIMBABWE is teaching the world a thing or two about helping refugees to help themselves.

Foreign visitors from economists to agronomists, from Congressmen to aid officials, have been thoroughly impressed at the massive rehabilitation programme.

They have found the scheme efficient, practical . . . and honest. No one is dipping into the till.

There are 250 000 refugee families. The average Zimbabwean family has seven members, which gives an estimated total of 1,75 million.

The ambitious rehabilitation programme is being spearheaded by Devag, the Department of Agricultural Development.

It is handing out a staggering 300 000 seed packs weighing 53 tonnes, plus basic farming tools.

The task is enormous.

"Nothing like this has ever been done before," said Devag chief agronomist Harry Howden. "A lot of countries and foreign agencies have sent officials here to see how things are going.

"And they've been very impressed.

"They can see that it is being run efficiently and honestly.

"There is none of the corruption that has dogged aid programmes in other parts of Africa."

It is estimated that 30 percent of all aid to the Third World is siphoned off by corrupt bureaucrats and politicians. In Uganda the figure is believed to have reached an astronomical 70 percent.

But Zimbabwe's aid is being strictly controlled by the Finance Ministry.

"Aid donors can see that their money is being used properly in this country," said Mr Howden.

Pundits believe Zimbabwe's experiment could be a blueprint for other rehabilitation plans throughout the world. It could be simply the way ahead.

But we have one big advantage — the refugees are returning to their own country and usually have a plot of land waiting for them on tribal trust lands.

All they need is the means to get started again.

The rehabilitation scheme is really a "back to normal" campaign — with a difference.

The refugees are being put back on the land with their seeds and hoes — and also being taught how to farm properly.

Refugees receiving seed packs have to sign an undertaking that they will attend "good farming" courses being run by Devag training officers.

"We're putting the refugees back in business, helping them to get started again," said Mr Howden, who is in charge of rehabilitation.

"We're giving them self-respect, a chance to stand on their own two feet again, a chance to feed themselves."

The Farmer, the official journal of the Commercial Farmers' Union, summed up the philosophy behind the project with a simple catch phrase:

"Give a man a fish and he will return for more — but teach him how to fish and he will trouble you no more."

Experts believe the Zimbabwe road to rehabilitation is infinitely better to many schemes in other parts of the world where refugees are confined to miserable camps.

The rehabilitation project, which was only launched at the end of June with $28m. in aid, also embraces families from protected villages.

They are considered "displaced persons" because they were forcibly herded into PVs to stop them helping guerillas.

Mr Howden stressed that all the refugees were voluntarily returning to the land.

The 1,5m. refugees are being fed by social services at a cost of $3m.-$4m. a month until they lift their first "rehabilitation crops" from the land next year.

By then at least $18m. will have been spent on food handouts.

"The feeding programme can be cut off when our rehabilitation scheme begins to bear fruit and the refugees are feeding themselves," said Mr Howden.

"Millions of dollars will be saved.

"Our project is a one-off thing which will end the need for free hand-outs."

There are several other spin-offs from the rehabilitation programme:

- The aid money for the project, which was donated by many countries, was given in valuable foreign exchange, which is crucial for an up-and-coming nation like Zimbabwe.
- The scheme provided work for hundreds of people, such as blacksmiths, fertiliser compounders, seed packers, insecticide manufacturers, transporters, drivers and seed growers.
- If there is a good season with adequate rainfall, there could be increased sales of such basic foodstuffs as maize, sorghum and groundnuts, and the cash crop, cotton.
- An estimated 250 000 families will have been taught better farming techniques, which bodes well for the future use of the country's land.
- More than one million people will have been put back on their land with a headstart. Many of them could have joined the drift to the cities, only to swell the squatter camps. Only 0,5 percent of Salisbury's population are squatters — the figure is more than 50 percent in many other African capitals, like Kinshasa.
- Foreigners have seen that the rehabilitation programme is being run efficiently and honestly. They will report back to their governments and agencies . . . the word will get round that Zimbabwe is a well-managed nation . . . investment will be more likely.

The rehabilitation programme is six-pronged — a winter vegetable package, a summer crop package, agricultural tools, tillage aid, irrigation package and training courses.

The project is backed by Britain, America, Australia, Holland, Sweden and Denmark.

PATRIOTIC FRONT SUPPORTERS SLAM TV BIAS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 3 Nov 80 p 3

[Text]

BULAWAYO.

ABOUT 1 200 Patriotic Front supporters gathered outside the Bulawayo studio of ZTV yesterday to protest at what they called discrimination against their party by the service.

The demonstrators said that instead of being a television service for all Zimbabweans, ZTV had been turned into a ZANU (PF)-only station with anything constructive about PF being virtually banned.

A Bulawayo police spokesman said the protest had been "on the whole, peaceful" with no arrests reported.

The Minister of Information, Dr Nathan Shamuyarira blamed the Patriotic Front president, Dr Joshua Nkomo, and the leader of the Rhodesian Front, Mr Ian Smith, for the demonstration.

"Two weeks ago I wrote to Dr Nkomo in his capacity of Minister of Home Affairs to seek police protection for the ZBC studios in Bulawayo," he said.

"He assured me that police protection would be provided but when the demonstrators arrived there were no policemen on guard."

Dr Shamuyarira said the allegations of the demonstrators were "groundless and mischievous".

Mr Smith and Dr Nkomo had "persistently attacked the ZBC and encouraged their followers to do the same", he said.

He said that ZAPU songs were played on the ZBC, and these songs could extol the virtues of Dr Nkomo and other leaders in the struggle so long as they did not claim they were the only leaders of Zimbabwe.

"Surely the only leader of Zimbabwe today is the Prime Minister, Mr Robert Mugabe," he said, "and none of his ministers can pretend to be."

PASSPORT OFFICES FLOODED WITH TRAVEL APPLICATIONS

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 2 Nov 80 p 4

[Text] Passport offices in both Salisbury and Bulawayo are at full stretch dealing with a post-independence flood of applications for travel documents.

The main rush is at the Salisbury passport office, which last week was struggling under a backlog of 6 500 passport applications. Applicants face a wait of up to 10 weeks.

The Bulawayo office has a backlog of 1 500 applications with passports taking anything up to six weeks to process.

The Registrar-General for Passports, Mr R. B. Oliver, said much of the demand came from young Zimbabweans who had returned since the end of the war and had been offered places in educational and training institutions in other countries.

Office staffs had been increased slightly since last year but were not big enough to cope, he said.

"Last year in Salisbury we were processing an average of 1 500 passports a month; now its 4 500 a month," he said.

The Bulawayo office was now handling 1 400 applications a month.

An application had been made for more staff and this was under consideration by the Public Service Commission.

The demand for passports was too big for Salisbury and Bulawayo to handle alone.

"We already have plans to increase the number of passport offices," he said. "We particularly want to get closer to the rural population but much will depend on what progress is made in computerising passport records and procedures.

"Discussions are still going on about this."

BIG DEMAND

Mr Oliver said there was a big demand for passports for holiday and business purposes. The possible introduction of short-term travel documents for visits to neighbouring states was under examination.

His department was also dealing with 1 600 existing passports a month — renewals, the addition or deletion of children and name changes.

Passport staffs were doing a "tremendous job in face of a demand that could never have been anticipated", he said.

EAST GERMANY TO OPEN EMBASSY

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 2 Nov 80 p 3

[Text]

ZIMBABWE and the German Democratic Republic have agreed to establish full diplomatic relations, exchanging representatives at ambassadorial level.

The decision to establish relations was made after talks last week between a three-man delegation from East Germany, the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, the Deputy Prime Minister, Mr Simon Muzenda and other Government officials.

The German delegation, led by the East German Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr Bernhard Neugebauer, arrived in Salisbury last Monday.

The agreement was signed in Salisbury yesterday by Dr Witness Mangwende, Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs and Mr Neugebauer. It opens the way for the first official representative in Zimbabwe of the German Democratic Republic, which during the war was one of the strongest supporters of the Patriotic Front.

No date was set for opening the embassy.

Dr Mangwende said: "This agreement is a clear demonstration of the Government of Zimbabwe's policy of positive non-alignment. The Government of Zimbabwe has long stated that it would establish relations with countries in both the socialist and capitalist world.

RESPECT

"In reaching the agreement to establish diplomatic relations the Government of the German Democratic Republic and the Republic of Zimbabwe have based their decision on the respect for the independence, national sovereignty, territorial integrity, full equality and non-interference in the internal affairs of the two countries."

Dr Mangwende said the two governments had also agreed to exchange teams of technical experts to examine future co-operation in trade, science and technology and sharing of experience in communal policies.

Both Dr Mangwende and Mr Neugebauer said their countries were pledged to solidarity in opposing colonialism, neo-colonialism and racist oppression in Africa.

Relations were being established, Mr Neugebauer said, on the clear understanding that peace would be strengthened; political, economic and cultural co-operation promoted; and the legal government under Mr Mugabe supported.

The East German delegation was due to leave Salisbury by air last night.

INTEGRATION OF HOSPITALS 'IN PIPELINE'

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 30 Oct 80 p 6

[Text]

BULAWAYO.

LEGISLATION aimed at integrating Zimbabwe's hospitals is in the pipeline.

The new laws — details of which have not yet been released — would change the face of the old "open" and "closed" hospital system, the acting secretary for health Dr Louise Westwater, said yesterday.

It could be some time before the final details are worked out — but doctors in charge of hospitals have been urged in the meantime to use their commonsense in the integration of wards.

The Matabeleland hospital at Filabusi began moving patients to different wards this week to alleviate overcrowding.

All sections of the hospital can now be used by all patients.

Dr Westwater said one of the problems faced at Filabusi was the distance between the two wings of the hospital.

She said the aim was to integrate the hospitals — but this had been easier to achieve where formerly African and European wards were under the same roof.

"The old laws governing the open and closed system of running hospitals is stil in existence — but there is new legislation in the pipeline which will change this. I cannot say yet just what the new laws will entail.

"We are all in support of the Minister (Dr Herbert Ushewokunze) in his policy of integrating the hospitals. That is our intention — although it has been difficult communicating with all hospitals everywhere to help instruct them on what to do."

Dr Ushewokunze criticised Filabusi Hospital on a weekend visit saying the staff had been lagging in their attitudes towards patients and he accused the staff of a deep-rooted colonial mentality.

INQUIRY COMMISSION EXAMINES JOBS, WAGES

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 30 Oct 80 p 11

[Text]

Will Zimbabwe lose its skilled workers if a radical redistribution of wealth is enforced through drastic changes in wage scales?

This is one of the major issues facing the Commission of Inquiry on Prices, Incomes and Conditions of Service, according to Mr Pete Harris, an economist and researcher with the New Zealand Combined State Unions and the commission.

He said a number of problems had been inherited from Zimbabwe's past.

"A primary problem is that of lifting inadequate wages and improving living standards without having higher salaries cut," he said.

Mr Harris said higher-paid workers should be prepared to discard some of their riches in the interests of creating a more broadly-based and stable economy.

"Otherwise the grievances among the lower-paid groups will find forms of expression . ." he warned.

"The wage packet has its value in the buying power it produces.

"In the past we could get cheap food, domestic workers and clothing because all the people involved in these sectors were being underpaid. This cannot endure," Mr Harris said.

He felt that relative advantages had to be scrapped and this could be done through the steady introduction of "strict price control measures".

"But people who could be affected by any of the commission's proposals to the Government for a more equitable society should now realise fully the wide disparity in wages and living conditions, particularly when the standards of the lower-paid have always been inadequate and not sustainable socially and politically.

"The path towards a more stable economy and political situation consequently requires deep-seated reappraisals," he said.

REALISTIC

He stressed that unless more realistic wages were paid and stricter price control introduced "we cannot have fair redistribution of the country's wealth".

The threat of inflation was a fact of life Zimbabwe would have to learn to live with.

"Tax alterations could also be introduced towards a better social service on a more equal basis," he added. Reforms were needed to resolve the massive backlog in housing, the lack of schools, the inadequate coverage of health care, the inaccessibility of social service facilities — vital aspects of living conditions.

"So the commission deals not only with the petty racial issues of the past but tries to dig up substantial ways of creating a fairer society ... a more stable and sustainable economic order for all.

"For example, it won't ask what a black or white accountant should be paid, but rather looks at an alternative wage-packet structure which will be fair to the whole community.

"In the end the commission will recommend an appropriate structure," he said.

Mr Harris said there would have to be increased worker participation.

There were only 40 registered trade unions with 78 310 members by September this year. They represented only 8 percent of the wage-earning work force.

On the other hand, there were at least 71 unregistered unions with an unknown membership which fell outside the framework of the negotiation machinery of the Industrial Conciliation Act.

Besides, said Mr Harris, workers' committees created after independence still had no defined status in industrial law.

"This shows the lack of unionisation in the country," he said.

Another problem was that most of the population had never had the opportunity to acquire skills.

"So, for the commission there are a number of complexities in trying to solve these problems of the past," Mr Harris said.

Commission Covers All Types of Jobs

The focus, scope and purpose of the Commission of Inquiry on Prices, Incomes and Conditions of Service is to investigate "the need for a greater deal of equity in all aspects of work".

Commission chairman, Mr Roger Riddell, said his team was looking at ways of improving the living standards of the poor and reducing the gap that existed in sections of the working community.

He said the commission's aim was to make work more democratic and participatory. To meet the challenge the terms of reference were wide.

- Pay, working and living conditions of the labour force.
- The gap in wealth and income distribution.
- The economic, social and legal implications of increasing worker participation in the economy.
- Suitability of the present industrial conciliation machinery.
- The role of trade unions in collective bargaining.
- The price structure of basic foodstuffs, rents and public transport charges.
- Determination of a yardstick with which to determine the claims for adjustments to maintain real incomes.
- The possibility of introducing national pension and social security schemes, taking into account the Government's plans for expanding social services.

The commission starts its last round of formal meetings to gather information on these aspects in Salisbury next week.

"The terms of reference are wide because when we look at the country's labour force it includes all categories of work — peasants, commercial farm labourers, domestic workers, industrial and commercial workers — beyond the definition of wage employees," said Mr Riddell.

The commission would also investigate living conditions, including health, transport, water and access to education.

Would the commission give details of its recommendations for improving aspects of work and living standards for the poor when it reported to the Government?

"The level of detail is going to be determined by the amount of time needed for the production of the commission's final report," Mr Riddell replied.

He said the commission might look at some aspects in detail and set up systems to deal with them immediately.

The commission can do this because it has been granted permission to release interim reports.

Wages Policy Is 'Vital to the Economy

THE problem of restructuring wages in Zimbabwe is more vital to this country's economy than anywhere else in Africa.

This is one of the early conclusions of the research team of the Commission of Inquiry on Prices, Incomes and Conditions of Service.

The commission has gathered evidence throughout the country on its terms of reference against the following background:

- The total population in the country is estimated at 7,5 million.
- About 20 percent of the population derive their income from urban employment.
- Of the total population, half is under the age of 15.
- At least 1 million people are wage earners.
- The maximum potential work-seeking population is about 3,25 million.

The research team points out that some children are working in factories and on the land.

According to the head of the research team, Mr Pete Harris, a third of the people were working in the commercial agricultural sector.

"It is the biggest and lowest-paying employing sector of the economy," Mr Harris said.

Labourers in commercial farming earn $22 in cash and $8 in kind a month.

SAME RATE

The next biggest employer is domestic services, which pays the same rate since minimum wage levels were laid down by the Government. There is no deduction in kind from domestic workers.

"There are 112 000 privately employed domestics who are paid very low wages," Mr Harris said.

Altogether 45 percent of all workers — 450 000 — are employed in these low-wage sectors, according to research data.

Others work as peasants in the tribal areas and the informal sector includes hawkers, vendors, and pirate taxi drivers.

Peasants in the TTLs are the worst off in the country. Their income levels are the lowest.

In the city higher wage levels exist, but against a background of inequality.

In wage sectors of the cities — such as mining, manufacture, construction, transport and distribution — average wages were higher, "but are unevenly distributed", said Mr Harris.

In mining the range between the highest and lowest paid could be 100:1.

But since the Government introduced minimum wage stipulations of $70 a month for workers in industry, wages in the low-pay bracket have increased considerably from between $43 to $50 a month.

Mr Harris said there was also a desperate sector of urban unemployed and displaced people returning to the TTLs.

"Reasons for this position are both historic and attributed to the inadequate development of training facilities," said Mr Harris.

CURBING OF UNNECESSARY STRIKES URGED

Salisbury THE BUSINESS HERALD in English 30 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] Industrial relations had tended to be chaotic in recent months, and unless something was done immediately to tell workers to follow the right procedures when voicing their grievances, there would be more "unnecessary" strikes. Chamber of Mines chief executive Mr Ken Vanderplank warned this week.

In an interview, he said the failure by the workers to follow the right channels of putting across their complaints, had contributed to many work stoppages in the mining industry.

Industrial relations had deteriorated in many cases and normal procedures were not being followed.

"Many of the strikes have taken place before any discussions between the workers and management," he said.

Mr Vanderplank said some workers had downed tools on matters which did not concern the mines. "It is very destructive and in most cases unnecessary", he said.

He cited an example of a mine where workers had gone on strike following the arrest by police of a party official for allegedly having conducted a kangaroo court.

"The strikes are seriously affecting production in the mines and the country's economy."

Mr Vanderplank said said in order to avert a spate of unnecessary work stoppages, it was important for workers to follow the right negotiating machinery.

"He would like to see a complaint fully discussed. Legitimate complaints can usually be rectified after discussion."

He suggested that the Ministry of Labour and Social Services makes a strong appeal to workers to follow the procedures laid down by the Industrial Relations Act.

Employees should raise their complaints through the local branch of the trade union which will negotiate with management.

If the grievance concerned a purely domestic matter not covered by an industrial agreement, the workers' liaison committee was the right channel.

Mr Vanderplank regretted that the moment the Minister Mr Kangai and his deputy found th mselves running all over the country in addition to their busy schedules.

ZCTU PLEA TO STOP STRIKES REPORTED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 30 Oct 80 p 4

[Text] The Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions yesterday appealed to workers not to take strike action before consulting their union representatives about their grievances.

"Workers should put their grievances to their respective trade unions before taking strike action."

The publicity secretary, Mr E. Soko, said in a statement yesterday that if this was done most strikes could be avoided "in the interest of the country's economy".

Mr Soko attributed the recent wave of strikes to the lack of communication between workers and management.

He said there was a need at "this time in the history of the country" for employers and workers to work together for the good of the economy and the nation.

Strikes were not helping the country at all.

"We should all work together to boost the economy which has been damaged by sanctions.

"We must produce as much as we can to repair the damage. We cannot do this by striking. Each time we down our tools, we are ruining the economy of our country. There are proper channels that must be followed before striking. Strikes are a last resort."

Mr Soko blamed employers for being intransigent when dealing with workers' grievances.

He said in many ways the strikes had been caused by the employers' failure to look impartially into their workers' grievances.

"Some employers become very arrogant towards their employees when trying to solve their problems.

"At times they even ignore the workers' committees. This is a bad attitude."

He said it was essential for employers in Zimbabwe to co-operate with the workers committees and trade unions.

Mr Soko said that once there was a good working relationship between workers and employers, "I definitely foresee real peace in commerce and industry throughout the country".

"Let's work to achieve this for the benefit of all in Zimbabwe."

TRADE UNIONS SEARCH FOR A FUTURE ROLE

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 30 Oct 80 p 4

[Text]

BULAWAYO.

A FEW recent developments and pronouncements on trade unions by some prominent Zimbabweans have raised a number of questions about the future role of trade unions in the country.

A call by the Labour and Social Services Minister, Mr Kumbirai Kangai, to all trade unions to belong to a central organisation, came hard on the heels of the resignation of veteran unionist, Mr Phineas Sithole, from the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU), formed on Mr Kangai's initiative seven weeks ago.

Mr Sithole, who is general secretary of the United Textile Workers' Union (UTWU), had been asked by Mr Kangai to be the ZCTU's vice-chairman.

He said one of his reasons for resigning was the role played by the government and Mr Kangai in settling labour unrest thoughout the country. He said the Minister was over-stepping his functions by getting involved in "petty" labour disputes.

A couple of days after Mr Kangai's call for union-registration, Home Affairs Minister, Dr Joshua Nkomo — himself a former trade unionist— told a Salisbury mass rally that trade unions must be free from political interference.

Dr Nkomo did not, however, specify who had interfered in trade union matters. But his observation could be seen as a reference to Mr Kangai's call for trade union registration.

Mr Kangai is on record several times as being in favour of a central organisation under which all labour bodies in the country could fall.

The advantages of this, he says, would be to stop individual unions from having relations with and receiving funds from international organisations outside the country, a practice which he believes could compromise the unions' independence and sovereignty.

There are three international trade union movements to which some national organisations are affiliated, either as full members or as observers.

The organisations are the socialist, Prague-based World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU), the Brussels-based, Western-orientated International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), and the All-Africa Trade Union Congress (AATUC) based in Accra, Ghana.

Mr Kangai's approach is that a Zimbabwean central trade union organisation would be responsible for establishing relations with international workers' movements under government guidance.

It was for this reason that he encouraged the creation of the ZCTU whose interim executive of 20 included Mr Sithole and was to organise individual unions for a national congress to accept or reject the ZCTU.

Just before the ZCTU was formed, there were moves by five "trade union centres" to merge into a national centre. The Centres — the African Trade Union Congress (ATUC), the Zimbabwe Federation of Labour (ZFL), the National Trade Union Congress (NATUC), the Zimbabwe African Congress of Unions (ZACU), and the Trade Union Congress of Zimbabwe (TUCZ)—had agreed to form the United Trade Unions of Zimbabwe (UTUZ) when the ZCTU's formation was announced, and trade union leaders were invited to join and lead it.

One trade union movement had, however, refused to go along with the UTUZ. It was the Zimbabwe Trade Union Congress (ZTUC) led by Mr Alfred Makwarimba who was later appointed chairman of the ZCTU.

The five union centres that had agreed to form UTUZ were due to hold a national congress attended by their respective member-unions on September 21 when the formation of ZCTU intervened.

Mr Kangai's call for union-registration was not meant to create another body different from ZCTU as some workers' leaders might have believed, but to strengthen the possibility of turning the ZCTU into a legal reality (which it is not at present) at a national congress still to be held.

One of the country's problems in trade unionism has always been the multiplicity of organisations claiming to represent workers — even in one industry. Some, if not many, of these are unregistered.

To register, a workers' organisation must meet at least four criteria:

- Its total membership-register must reflect such a degree of representativeness as to make it a viable movement in the registrar's view.
- Its minutes must show the serious nature of the body's discussions.
- Its financial statements must be up-to-date and professionally done.
- Its constitution must satisfy the registrar as to its aims and objectives.

The conditions for registration, as stipulated by the Industrial Conciliation Act, have in the past been found to be rather difficult to fulfil by many nascent unions, some of which have had to continue unregistered while others have faded.

DUNLOP SHARE ISSUE, WORKERS' TRUST REPORTED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 1 Nov 80 p 7

[Article by Deric Bardo]

[Text] A $9 million share issue, the largest yet in Zimbabwe, goes on offer to the public on November 3.

Five million Dunlop Zimbabwe Ltd shares will be offered for sale at $1.80 each by its British parent, Dunlop Holdings Ltd.

A further 900,000 shares will be set aside in a trust for the benefit of the 1 300 workers employed in this country by the Dunlop group.

It is planned that Dunlop Zimbabwe's shares will be quoted on the Zimbabwe Stock Exchange from Monday, November 24 and by that date 21 percent (5 000 000 shares) will be held by the public, about 4 percent (900 000) by the workers' trust and the balance of 75 percent (18 100 000 shares) by Dunlop Holdings Ltd.

The prospectus mailed to stockbrokers yesterday shows Dunlop Zimbabwe to have a net worth of more than $19 million and a net tangible asset value of 80¢ a share.

Profits are forecast to be $3,6 million (15¢ a share) for the year ending December 31, 1980--interim results to June 30 show 50 percent of this to be earned already--and $4,3 million (18¢ a share) is forecast for 1981. Last night the company announced that results to the end of September were running ahead of forecast.

Dividend payments are forecast to be 5¢ in April 1981 for the final half of the 1980 financial year; and 5¢ in September 1981 and 7¢ in April 1982 for the 1981 trading year.

The bulk (85 percent) of Dunlop's income presently comes from goods manufactured in its Bulawayo tyre and rubber products factory, with the balance being contributed by its 10 subsidiaries and associated companies engaged in the property, timber, flooring and fashion businesses and acquired during UDI years to employ surplus and blocked funds.

Fair Assumptions

These forecasts are based on the usual general assumptions to be found nowadays in profit estimates, namely "continuing stability and economic growth with the maintenance of existing Government policies on prices, taxation, import controls and foreign currency allocations."

Specific assumptions made by the directors in calculating the 1981 forecasts are a gross domestic product growth from 5 percent to 8 percent, an inflation rate of not more than 15 percent and no major loss of skilled employees.

The assumptions upon which the forecasts are based seem fair ones and with Dunlop's worldwide connections the caveat regarding skilled labour is not worrying, whereas another assumption, that the U.K. parent body will help with export business development, is most encouraging.

Profit results have shown a fluctuating trend in recent past years; $2,9 million (12 cents per share) in 1975, $2,4 million (10 cents) in 1976, about the same in 1977, $2 million (8 cents) in 1978 and $2,8 million (12 cents) in 1979.

Rapid Recovery

From the foregoing one can see that sanctions and the war situation obviously played havoc with Dunlop's trading but that there has been a rapid recovery since settlement day.

The prospectus reveals a total absence of lean capital borrowing and a current ratio of 1,4:1 (current assets $25 million, liabilities $17 million). This indicates clearly the financial strength of the Zimbabwean group and its ability to fund the planned expansion and modernisation programme for 1981 of $3,8 million. Furthermore, the figures show that dividend payments will be comfortably funded from within.

All of the above, together with Dunlop's international image, the good interim results, preliminary dividend payment in April, the promised earnings yield of 10 percent and dividend yield of 6,7 percent for 1981 combine to point to the share offer being at least 100 percent oversubscribed by the closing date of November 13.

GOVERNMENT WILL NOT GIVE CHRISTMAS BONUS

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 2 Nov 80 p 1

[Text] The Government will not be giving a Christmas present to shoppers this year.

Last year the Ministry of Commerce and Industry allowed an extra $3 million in foreign cash to businessmen to buy festive goodies.

But a Ministry spokesman said last week that no additional allocations could be made this Christmas because of the shortage of foreign exchange.

Consumer goods are low on the Government's list of priorities as the nation grapples with a massive rehabilitation programme.

But Zimbabweans are still in for a good yuletide.

Mr Neil McRoberts, spokesman for a Salisbury department store, said: "There'll be few luxuries — but no shortages.

"Businessmen have spent the limited foreign exchange allocations wisely. Many have saved up, literally.

"Our currency allowances are the same as last year."

He added that imported goods — including perfumes, toys and clothes — were coming in every day.

"It's going to be a good Christmas, I'm sure," he said, "practical and wholesome."

Another store spokesman, Mr Ron Hodds, said: "I'm optimistic that there will be enough goods for everyone."

He said his shop was importing fine glassware, china and kitchen gadgets.

"Christmas will be about the same as last year," he predicted.

A toy shop manager said that the ultra - modern, electronic games being sold in Britain and America would not reach Zimbabwe this year.

"They would take too big a slice of our foreign exchange allowance," said Mr Alex Lee.

A Salisbury music shop has hoarded foreign currency this year to buy six of the world's best guitars from America for Christmas.

Sales manager Mr Joe Gobie said: "We're sure they'll go as soon as they arrive."

He added that the "fantastically increased" spending power of blacks would revolutionise this year's Christmas shopping.

"Africans have had luxuries dangled in front of them for so long without being able to buy," he said. "Now they are getting pay increases and are spending the money on the good things of life."

ILLEGAL EMERALD MINING, MARKETING TARGETED

Salisbury THE BUSINESS HERALD in English 30 Oct 80 p 1

[Text]

THE Government has clamped down on illegal mining and marketing of emeralds throughout the country, Secretary in the Ministry of Mines and Energy Resources, Mr Christopher Ushewokunze, said this week.

He said the Government had tightened security on illegal trafficking of the gem in a bid to save the country from being swindled by smugglers.

"We are working on a scheme to stop illegal emerald dealers and encouraging local people with claims to register and peg them. They should also tighten security around their areas."

Although Mr Ushewokunze could not say the exact figure of how much the Government was losing through smuggling, it is believed to be in millions of dollars every year.

"There are many claims in the TTLs which are being exploited illegally. Certainly we are losing a lot of money."

Mr Ushewokunze said the Government scheme which includes tight control on smugglers, had reached an advanced stage. "Part of the scheme is being implemented," he said.

The Ministries of Mines and Home Affairs were at the moment busy discussing ways and means of controlling smugglers who are said to be actively involved in the illegal transactions.

Companies already engaged in the emerald business would be encouraged to cut the gem locally and only export finished products.

The African Business Promotion Association, whose members are involved in emerald mining and have claims all over the country, has asked the Government to give amnesty to all those who illegally possess emeralds for a limited period of about six months to enable them to sell them to the legal authorities.

The organisation's national secretary, Mr Pollant Mpofu said buying offices should be set up in both Fort Victoria and Shabani where people would be allowed to sell their emeralds.

"It should be made clear that selling emeralds in places other than in these offices would be committing an offence."

Mr Mpofu called on the Government to investigate prospectors who had registered claims by fraudulent means.

MANA POOLS SEEN THREATENED BY NEW DAM

Wildlife Endangered

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 3 Nov 80 p 4

[Text]

"HOW can anybody wreck all this by building a damned dam?" The words were spoken by Mr Norman Dennett, editor of Zimbabwe Wildlife, the magazine of the Wildlife Society of Zimbabwe. But the sentiments expressed echoed those of the group of us standing on the banks of the Zambezi at Mana Pools last week.

His remarks were yet another shot in a new war being waged over the national park. In earlier years the bullets were real as the Parks employees found themselves at the frontline of the war and lived for most of the time in a fort.

Now the battle by conservationists is to prevent a hydro-electric power dam being built downstream at Mupata Gorge.

What makes this park different from the many others in the country and arouses such passionate feelings in conservation circles?

National Parks officer Mr Tony Ferrar, a qualified ecologist, explains: "Mana Pools is unique. It represents the only park which is based on the Zambezi flood plain and the alluvial soil is particularly fertile."

The giant acacias provide food at this time of the year when grazing is in short supply. Their peculiar seed pods, which look like dried apple rings, are constantly sought by the hundreds of elephant who roam all over the woodlands.

The trees themselves actually stand in water, sending their roots right down to the water table.

"The elephant come down from the sides of the escarpment when the grazing is sparse up there and rely on these trees to keep alive," Mr Dennett said.

"If these trees are drowned by the dam the elephant and other animals will have nothing to eat.

"The new waterline will be in country which cannot support them for months of the year."

The list of animals that would face almost certain extinction at worst and become endangered at least, is comprehensive.

During a two-day visit Herald's chief photographer, Jack White and I, saw among others: elephant, buffalo in herds of more than 200, bushbuck, waterbuck, impala, hippo, lion, baboon, monkey, crocodile and a host of birdlife including the beautiful carmine bee-eater, fish eagle, Egyptian goose, Spurwing goose, egrets, plovers and a host of others.

What we didn't see because we were fast asleep at the time were hyena whose spoor we found in the morning a few yards from our camp.

Equally we didn't see several of the other animals that inhabit Mana Pools, although undoubtedly they watched us grind past in our vehicle. Animals such as the rare nyala, rhino, leopard and cheetah.

The latter are not common but one ranger on a recent game count got the shock of his life in a clearing when one of these beautiful animals took an impala almost in front of his nose.

In fact, game is so plentiful that Mr Ferrar, who is a keen photographer, wryly complained: "The trouble with Mana Pools is that you can't just take a photograph of the scenery.

"Every time you develop a negative there's either an elephant or a 'buff' lurking in the background."

But that is one of the attractions of Mana Pools: the ease with which a visitor can watch the more common game and the expectancy for the more patient of seeing the less observable ones such as the nyala or cheetah.

Drilling Started

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 2 Nov 80 p 7

[Text] The Central African Power Corporation is about to begin exploratory drilling in the Mupata and Batoka gorges, an essential step in evaluating the feasibility of hydroelectric power stations at the two Zambezi River sites.

A spokesman for CAPCO said last week that its budget this year had been increased by $1 million to finance the exploration.

Similar drilling has been underway for several months at Kariba's south bank power station, where the installation of two additional generators is being considered. The process involves the drilling and removal of cork cores which are then tested to determine the characteristics that would affect the stability of a dam.

"At the moment we are trying to identify projects, checking their feasibility and their costs. Unless you investigate them very carefully you find yourself facing pitfalls later," said Mr E. M. Shepherd, the corporation's general manager.

A third potential dam site, at the Devil's Gorge at the headwaters of Lake Kariba, would be investigated in the next financial year, Mr Shepherd said.

Dam development on the Zambezi has been controversial for several years because the site being considered in the Mupata Gorge lies downstream from the Mana Pools National Park, one of the richest wildlife habitats remaining in Africa. A dam in the gorge would flood the heart of the park area.

Conservationists and wildlife enthusiasts have argued that the loss of Mana Pools as a game reserve would not be worth the 500 MW of power the hydroelectric station would generate.

They have asked that a full environmental impact study of the proposed dam projects be made before a decision is made on the Mupata Gorge site.

No one disputes that additional sources of power are needed. With a peak demand of about 1 000 MW and a maximum production capacity from the Kariba power station and terminal power plants of about 900 MW, Zimbabwe is already forced to import power--$20m. worth of it a year--from Zambia.

The nation's annual growth in power demand is projected at 10 percent. Official estimates put the peak demand in 1990 at 2 700 MW.

With lead times for dam construction falling between seven and 10 years it is unlikely that a new power facility can be put on the Zambezi before 1989, CAPCO spokesmen say.

So regardless of what decisions are reached the increased power demand of the next few years will have to be met from other sources.

The largest portion will probably come from the 1 600 MW thermal power station now being planned at Wankie. The Kariba south bank extension--which could be completed by the mid-1980s if it proves feasible--would provide an additional 300 MW.

DAIRY SHORTAGES NEXT YEAR PREDICTED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 30 Oct 80 p 2

[Article by Angus Macmillan]

[Excerpt]

THERE will be enough dairy products over Christmas, but in the new year, supplies of fresh milk, cheese and butter could be short and may even have to be imported.

This was the message from the Dairy Marketing Board's general manager-designate, Mr Eddie Cross, in Salisbury this week.

Zimbabwe's dairy situation has changed dramatically over the last year, from a surplus of 15-20 000 tonnes of fresh milk to a present shortage which has also resulted in a cut-back on the production of by-products.

With the cessation of hostilities following independence and the influx of refugees, the rural areas have needed more and more fresh milk to cope with a growing population.

Distribution of milk and other dairy products in outlying rural areas has increased markedly from a monthly consumption of about 400 000 units at the beginning of this year to the present average of more than one million units per month.

"In 1979 we were able to export to Zaire, Botswana and one or two other countries, but at the moment we are hard pressed to satisfy the domestic market," said Mr Cross, who will succeed Mr Lesley Bacon as general manager on December 1.

He is now going through a transitional stage of finding his feet at the DMB and relinquishing his previous position of chief economist of the Agricultural Marketing Authority.

Expanding on problems facing the DMB Mr Cross said urban areas have also become more heavily populated with the influx of rural dwellers into the cities and towns in search of work.

This has caused an increase in fresh milk consumption in these areas and has also accounted for an increase in the sales of by-products such as butter, cheese and yoghurt.

However, the main reason for this nationwide increase in the consumption of milk and other dairy products, says Mr Cross, has been the introduction of minimum wages which has increased the buying power of a large proportion of the population.

The biggest growth in sales has occurred in the high density housing areas, where the board delivers fresh milk twice a day.

With five dairies and 45 distribution depots throughout the country, the DMB has the most extensive distribution network in Zimbabwe, employing about 3 500 people.

Demand, however, is beginning to outstrip production and the board has had to limit the amount of fresh milk that is allocated for the production of cheese, butter and other by-products.

The short term answer to dairy shortages would be to import from surrounding countries, but the position is not likely to get that serious for some time.

Skim milk powder is being imported, however, but a lot of it is entering the country under the reconstruction aid programme.

Gatooma's new cheese factory has also suffered from the shortage of fresh milk and is only operating at about 40 percent of its capacity.

A longer term solution would be to increase the national herd and to increase the consumer price, which at 26c a litre, is one of the lowest in the world.

BRIEFS

SUPPORT FOR IAN SMITH'S BANNING--Umtali--Hundreds of placard-carrying demonstrators marched from Sakubva to the Government buildings in Main Street yesterday to tell the Minister of Labour and Social Services, Mr Kangai, that they wanted the Government to see that Mr Ian Smith did not return to Zimbabwe. The protest began outside the Beit Hall in Sakubva where Mr Kangai was holding a meeting.--Herald Correspondent. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 3 Nov 80 p 1]

ELECTION DELAY AIDS ZANU (PF)--Bulawayo--The local election process had been manipulated to give ZANU (PF) an advantage at the polls, a Patriotic Front MP, Dr Callistus Ndlovu, said yesterday. Dr Ndlovu said in a statement that such action might mean that the PF would no longer co-operate in the running of the national front Government. Postponement of the nomination deadline for the local elections was intended to give political advantage to ZANU (PF) at the cost of law and reason. "This blatant disregard of the feelings of non-ZANU (PF) members by the governing party is a travesty of the spirit of co-operation in the national front Government," he said. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 30 Oct 80 p 3]

SITHOLE HITS GOVERNMENT--Widespread intimidation throughout the country was suppressing the freedom of the individual and making a mockery of the country's independence, the Rev Ndabaningi Sithole told a meeting of ZANU leaders in Salisbury yesterday. The country was passing through a stage where its independence was becoming meaningless and endangering the people for whom it had been won, said Mr Sithole. People were losing their freedom of movement, freedom of association and assembly and the freedom to choose the political parties of their liking. "I refuse to accept that those who fought and died during the war did so that our people may continue to slaughter, abduct, intimidate, humiliate, torture and persecute one another," he said. The ZANU leader also condemned kangaroo courts, which he said had never been intended to serve the people but to terrorise and confuse them. If the Government was to honour the country's independence, he said, it had to stamp out intimidation and lawlessness and seek to establish genuine freedom and law. NEW BANK--The Government and EC [letter indistinct] Holdings of Luxembourg yesterday signed an agreement to establish a joint venture bank in the country. The new bank will be called the Bank of Credit and Commerce (Zimbabwe) Limited, the Deputy Minister of Finance Dr Oliver Munyaradzi, said in a speech on behalf of the Minister Senator Enos Nkala. He said the Government would carry a "significant

"shareholding" in the enterprise, whose total paid-up capital would be $6 million. The Minister emphasised that the bank would not receive favoured treatment because of its association with the Government. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 30 Oct 80 p 1]

WEST GERMAN GRANTS--A technical, vocational and professional education training programme offered to Zimbabwean students by West Germany was fully subscribed, a Ministry of Education and Culture spokesman said yesterday. It had been impossible to reply to all the applicants because of the overwhelming response to a news item about the offer. "Those applicants who are being considered for the training grants have now been asked to appear before a selection committee. All other applicants have been unsuccessful," he said. KABBAJ'S SPEECH POINTS OUT SIMILARITIES BETWEEN HASSAN II, HOUPHOUET-BOIGNY

Casablanca MAROC SOIR in French 8 Oct 80 p 3

[Text] Following is the address delivered at the Seventh PDCI-RDA Congress by His Majesty the King's ambassador to the Ivory Coast, Taofiq Kabbaj, special envoy from Hassan II of Morocco:

"Mr President of the Republic of the Ivory Coast, Honorary PDCI-RDA President, Honorable Members of Congress, Ladies and Gentlemen,

"It is a privilege which gives me great pleasure to take part in the sittings of the PDCI-RDA Seventh Congress as a special envoy of Hassan II, King of Morocco.

"I shall first of all discharge the duty of conveying to Mr President Felix Houphouet-Boigny, the Sage of Africa, a friendly message of deep fraternal esteem from his confrere Hassan II.

"His Majesty has also asked me to convey his fraternal greetings to one and all and on his part as well as that of his people united around him in his national political organization to express every best wish for the success of your undertakings and the realization of our Ivory Coast fellow people's most earnest aspirations.

"His Majesty, King Hassan II, his government and his people are following with keen interest and deep admiration the Ivory Coast Republic's spectacular advance along the road to development and progress within the framework of stability and national unity. He proudly cheers the Ivory Coast's commitment to the way of renewal and democracy.

"The fact that the theme chosen for your party's Seventh Congress is renewal and democracy bears witness, if need be, to the profound wisdom of His Excellency, President Felix Houphouet-Boigny, his far-sighted political acumen, his love for his people and especially for youth. It also goes to prove the vitality and dynamism of the PCDI-RDA which, over the 30 years of its existence, has succeeded in safeguarding its cohesiveness, its own particular spirit, and to prove its realism.

"In any case, it is giving us the opportunity to ascertain with the greatest pleasure that throughout the various forward movements through which the respective political organizations of the Moroccan Kingdom and the Ivory Coast Republic have gone, the same measures, the same choices and objectives have inspired the activity of our two outstanding heads of state. This makes it evident that the friendship which indefectibly unites them, especially since the never-to-be-forgotten visit of His Excellency, President Felix Houphouet-Boigny to Morocco in September 1973, is no idle word. In fact, it gives proof of the existence, between His Majesty King Hassan II and His Excellency, President Houphouet-Boigny of a similarity of views and a perfect kindred spirit in the analysis of the problems which beset our two countries, as well as on both the national plane as on the international scene.

"In fact, the Moroccan Kingdom, like the Ivory Coast Republic today, has already embarked on the road to democratization. Representatives of the Moroccan people enlisted in their various political organisations, as well as in their northern provinces and the retrieved Saharan provinces, are actively and directly engaged in local, regional and national representative institutions in promoting the development and progress of the Moroccan nation.

"In Morocco as in the Ivory Coast, priority is given to economic growth through the promotion of agriculture, the building of big dams, the erection of large economic units. Very special attention is also being given first and foremost to the educational problem which constitutes the key to our progress.

"Lastly, in Morocco, like His Excellency President Felix Houphouet-Boigny in the Ivory Coast, His Majesty King Hassan II is just as strongly committed to his country's independence, its unity and territorial integrity as he is to the achievement of peace, justice and recourse to dialog.

"Adding his remarks on these principles, His Majesty one day said: 'I am an ardent disciple of the Moslem School of Politics. My ancestor, the Prophet Sidna Mohammed, taught us to talk first and foremost, to continue talking, and to talk always before taking up arms.'

"Likewise motivated by this sense of justice and the desire for peace, His Majesty Hassan II served as chairman of the Al Qods Committee, and like His Excellency, President Felix Houphouet-Boigny, is working for the achievement of peace in the Middle East by recognizing the legal rights of the Palestinian people, the return of occupied Arab territories, including the Holy City of Jerusalem.

"Both our countries, therefore, under the enlightened leadership of His Majesty King Hassan II and His Excellency President Felix Houphouet-Boigny, and motivated and encouraged by the same ideals, the same desires for peace, justice and development, are also instruments in strengthening still more the time-honored ties which unite us.

"Once again, I wish you every success in your undertakings and ardently ask God to grant a long life to His Excellency Felix Houphouet-Boigny and His Majesty King Hassan II.

"Long live the Ivory Coast!

"Long live the Moroccan Kingdom!

"Long live the Ivory Coast-Moroccan friendship!

"Long live African unity!"

CONDITIONS ON EVE OF TWELFTH ANNIVERSARY OF INDEPENDENCE NOTED

Libreville L'UNION in French 6-8, 10, 11-12 Oct 80

[6 Oct 80 pp 1, 7]

[Text] 1. An Ethnic Rebalancing of the Government

Next 12 October Equatorial Guinea will celebrate the 12th anniversary of its independence, the second one after the blow for freedom of 3 August 1979 that ousted the dictator, Macias Nguema Biyogho and brought the Supreme Military Council to power. Equatorial Guinea seems to have emerged from a top-to-bottom metamorphosis that is having repercussions both on economic structures and on people's attitudes.

The ousting of Cap Salvador Ela Nseng from the governing team, even while sanctioning a reprehensible attitude, provided an opportunity for a fundamental ethnic rebalancing of the government, in the direction of stability.

Positively, Salvador Ela Nseng represented a singular force. His intransigent nationalism earned him the notice of Macias Nguema, but it later led to an opposition movement being formed by the women of Ebebeyin, who were discontented with the dictator's demands; this earned him his disgrace.

At the time of the coup d'etat of 3 August 1979 Cap Ela Nseng was stagnating in a prison cell. His brothers in arms rescued him, to make him the Number Three man of the CMS [Supreme Military Council], basing the move on his having the halo of a persecuted person.

Negatively, it is probable that interrogations of the former director of Blackbeach Prison had revealed actions involving Salvador Ela Nseng that were incompatible with his vice presidential post. In any case the major factor in his being shunted aside, ostensibly for diplomatic representation in Peking, is more likely to be financial misappropriation.

They say in well-informed circles in Malabo that, taking advantage of Col Teodoro Obiang being abroad, Ela Nseng requisitioned the management of a commercial company for the benefit of a relative. The CMS president, informed of the affair on his return, temporized at first, and finally ordered an audit that revealed a financial deficit of 8,000,000 ekweles (7 edweles = 10 CFA francs).

President Teodoro Obiang offered his subordinate an alternative: the verdict of the military court with shameful publicity, or removal. Salvador Ela Nseng chose exile in Peking.

The Supreme Military Council took advantage of that opportunity to have a Bubi accede to the vice presidency, Maj Eulogio Oyo Riquesa, who was recently military governor of Bioko Island, with the ministerial portfolio of Labor as a bonus.

This kind of sprinkling is vital for a country that too often suffers from Fang hegemony. We should remember the first Bubi revolt in 1898 in San Carlos (which is now called Luba, and which recently was still sheltering the Soviet fishing fleet). In 1910 a second Bubi revolt broke out, one that lasted several years: worried about the Fang preponderance, the inhabitants of Bioko (or Fernando Po) systematically dissociated themselves from the Rio Muni, preferring to remain loyal to Spain, even in the thick of the republican war, whereas the Rio Muni went over to the Republican Front government, which afterwards earned it a chastisement dealt by the Spanish fleet, based in the Canaries.

Florencio Maye Ela, the former military governor of Bata, who rallies his putschists by coordinating the Rio Muni operations, holds onto the first vice presidency and Foreign Affairs. He makes no secret of his preference for the Spanish friend and promotes his implantation.

With the ousting of Salvador Ela Nseng President Teodoro Obiang has not, for all that, reached the end of his worries. One day, calling in an African diplomat for a friendly conversation, he mentioned to him the name of a close associate who had tampered with some thick envelopes from a Spanish oil company.

Ethnic balance gives two other ministerial portfolios to the Bubis: Tarsicio Mane Abeso (Education, Culture, Youth and Sports) and Cristino Seriche Bioko (Public Works, Housing, Urbanism and Transportation). But the key ministries remain in the hands of Col Teodoro Obiang: Defense, Information, Commerce and incidentally Tourism, while Internal Affairs reverts to a man of confidence, Felix Mba Nchama, with the physique of a centurion, a close-cropped skull and a curving mustache.

[Text] 2. An Omnipresent Spanish Friend

The enthusiasm that the Equatorial Guinean people had for the old colonizing power is slowly dimming, in spirit and letter. In fact, although Spain is avoiding a paternalistic attitude toward its little African partner at any price, it cannot help steamrolling in all areas of economic and social life, causing an involuntary rejection phenomenon.

The cooperation agreements between Malabo and Madrid, according to the new ambassador, Jose-Luis Graullera, embrace three basic sectors: education, health and administration. In reality, the Spanish authorities are playing a primary role in reestablishing the currency and in the country's oil future.

Nearly 120 teachers have been sent since 3 August 1979 to the insular and continental provinces, while 200 Guinean holders of scholarships for university or technical-professional training are getting ready to cross the ocean for the academic year 1980-1981.

In the health sector, 40 doctors and as many nurses are working to rehabilitate the hospital institutions; sometimes, it seems, in a rather disorganized way, since clashes are bursting out with the cooperants from the European Economic Community on the subject of two hospitals that normally fall within European jurisdiction.

In the administrative domain, the third wing of the Spanish triptych, one should mention the joint drawing up of texts of laws and regulations, especially ordinances having to do with the budget and the functioning of the administration.

The Supreme Military Council is also selecting young policemen and soldiers to take training courses on the peninsula; since the advent of the new regime Spanish officers, their number later doubled by Moroccan soldiers and police, are staffing the Equatorial Guinean army as instructors and advisers. The Guinean police have received the benefit of sophisticated materiel and the armed forces are not being outdone. Armored cars, amphibious vehicles, anti-aircraft guns, light equipment and helmets recovered from the Civil War--of German manufacture--paraded in the National Stadium at Malabo on Sunday 3 August 1980, to ovations from the crowd.

The Soviet stores were invisible, relegated to the barracks or in the hands of the troops billeted in Rio Muni. The air potential is still weak: one Antonov and one Yakoblev jet, swamped by the noria of the Casa 212 and the large jets of the Spanish air army, unloading from their full cargo holds merchandise straight from Spain.

Among those shipments are food products, for which a distribution network has been organized, including a whole fleet of Land rovers, Seats and Colts from the Spanish Technical Cooperation, for various uses and thanks to the fact that two semi-public companies have been formed.

Several government-owned stores have been opened, contrasting with the desperately empty shops of Macias Nguema's time, which are buried in dust.

Petroleum exploration, for which two Spanish companies, GEPSA [expansion unknown] and CEMSA, hold the permits, is giving way to silent, underground, implacable fights. Since February 1980, Ambassador Jose-Luis Graullera told us, technicians of Hispanoil have been conducting a seismic campaign that has already resulted in concrete proposals to the Equatorial Guinean authorities. So progress is being made toward creating a semi-public company for prospecting and exploiting Gulf crude.

[Text] 3. The Magic Petroleum Faucet

The promising petroleum gold mine is causing huge interests to enter the lists. Perched on the Gulf of Biafra, the island of Bioko as well as the coast of the Rio Muni should logically be concealing petroliferous layers, since from Nigeria to Cabinda, by way of Cameroon and Gabon, the subsoil abounds in black gold.

Former prospecting, in Macias Nguema's time, was carried out off Point Mbenda, Rio Ekupo and Rio Campo. Gulf Oil was brought in by a diplomatic action on the part of Washington, while Amoco Oil, which was prospecting around 1965, has picked up again.

When the dictator fell the dossiers of the French companies Total and Elf-Aquitaine for their part were already in a good position on the desk of Ambassador Hubert Cornet, a former colonial administrator lost in that forgotten Equatorial Guinea who continues publicly to show his admiration for the "legal methods" of Macias Nguema.

When the minister of Cooperation, Robert Galley, made an official visit in October 1979, the day of the celebration of independence, he strengthened with his Guinean interlocutors the Elysee's interest in this new African partner. Occasional but steadfast, the French presence materialized again last 3 August with the visit of Martin Kirsch, adviser to the presidency.

According to our information, Elf has not yet ended up with agreements and the arduous negotiations continue to go their own sweet way. Would Hispanoil, a Spanish company also working in Gabon, offer a minor role to a French partner to counterbalance the formidable financial and material power of the United States? Nothing is impossible.

The stakes are so sizable in a country where everything remains to be done again. In this whirlwind Cameroon and Gabon look like poor relations and Malabo has not hesitated to challenge the oil agreements signed at the time of President Teodoro Obiang's visit to Libreville in December 1979. Foreign Affairs Minister Florencio Maye Ela would be no stranger to such a "heartbreaking revision."

No doubt it is better to work blow by blow like the French private contractors, Razel and Dragages, using an Aid and Cooperation Fund loan to renovate the port of Bata, or Castel (the owner of SOBRAGA [expansion unknown] in Libreville), which is putting up a brewery with a capacity of 100,000 hectoliters of beer, on six hectares.

Would racketeering take possession of a country that has been sinking for 11 years into the bloodiest prehistory? At present neighboring Cameroon is also becoming aware of the interest of this Equatorial Guinea which until recently boiled down to several tens of thousands of refugees, to be treated adequately but no more than that.

One fact is certain: Yaounde wants to remain at the head of the African pack, if there is a pack. Rightly or wrongly they are saying that Prime Minister Paul Biya was designated at the last moment to represent Cameroon at the festivities of 3 August 1980, after it became public knowledge that the Gabonese vice prime minister, Georges Rawiri, was coming. One rung higher.

But the most conspicuous confrontations have already exploded at the level of Spain and the EEC, to earn the favor of a country that produces cocoa, coffee, wood, while waiting for the magic faucet of oil and mining resources.

[10 Oct 80 p 5]

[Text] 4. To Restore the Value of the Edwele

In the combat area of competitive interests, the IMF and the EEC are playing a moderating and intermediary role.

The program presented by Administrator Samuel Nana Sinkam stipulated a total of $25,000,000 (5,000,000,000 CFA francs) which was to be a third section of credit, to be drawn upon successively over eight years with a four-year deferred payment.

As technical assistance the IMF sent the Guinean Finance Ministry (responsibility for which reverted to Teodoro Obiang after Salvador Ela Nseng went into exile) two assistants for expenditures and tax revenues.

To the Central Bank the IMF sent an adviser for the governor and a cooperant to hold the balance of payments; these associates were paid by the Fund but answerable to the Equatorial Guinean government.

The Fund's most spectacular action was the devaluation of the ekwele, which was recommended by a report and supported by the Spanish experts. In fact, Nana Sinkam explained to us in an interview in Malabo, since the departure in 1975 of the Nigerian agricultural workers (most of whom had fled the Biafra war in 1968), the cocoa sector's yield was too low; the hard labor that Macias Nguema decreed for the over-15 population did not solve the problem.

So it was necessary to return to the workers on these plantations a pecuniary motivation; the plantations had become 80 percent privately owned after the coup d'etat. To double agricultural wages at a time when the budget had all but run dry came under the heading of financial acrobatics.

The third economic aspect, the total liberation of imports in a country where all of the most elementary products are lacking, was the equivalent of quadrupling the nominal wage, that is to say giving every agricultural worker $150 a month.

Now, the government's available funds did not permit such an operation; also, it was necessary to devaluate in search of two results--to reduce the level of nominal income to $100 a month, and increase the value of export income as well as taxes on the products. All of this to be done while preserving the investment volume, for up to that point the fiscal sector was producing virtually nothing.

According to the new provisions announced in a speech by President Teodoro Obiang on 21 June 1980, the parity of the ekwele was changed so that 1 ekwele = 0.00634765 grams of fine gold, or 2 ekweles - 1 Spanish peseta, or 140 ekweles = $1.00.

By doubling wages and returning the plantations to the private sector, the Guinean economy took a new turn. In addition to the Central Bank, whose modern edifice is out of keeping with the surrounding ruins, several banks have opened their branches, attracted by the flood of multilateral assistance.

The Credit and Development Bank, the Foreign Bank of Equatorial Guinea (GUINEXTEBANK) will tap the credits that are indispensable to economic readjustment. From Madrid, 20,000,000 original pesetas (66,000,000 CFA francs) have been swelled since the visit of Juan Carlos I to make a river of 3,000,000,000 pesetas (10,000,000,000 CFA francs); and the Cortes (Spanish Parliament) is expected to approve this December an extraordinary credit of 1,200,000,000 more pesetas.

The EEC for its part did not want to be idle: it mounted a substantial aid program of 6,300,000 units of account, or $9,000,000 (1,800,000,000 CFA francs), of which $3,000,000 were allotted to rebuilding the electrical system of Malabo, a city that has been without light since the time of Macias Nguema.

These considerable sums are in addition to the emergency aid that had been released at the time of the coup d'etat--300,000 units of account ($420,000); the EEC had stopped all intervention that would benefit the dictatorial regime.

[11-12 Oct 80 p 7]

[Text] 5. Assistance: European and Chinese

Robert Scheiber, EEC delegate based in Yaounde, and Danko Bakovic, a resident of Malabo, indicated to us that the EEC defined four vectors for readjustment. To craft fishing, public works, agriculture and health respectively, $1,000,000 to $1,400,000 were allotted.

For example, $700,000 will enable a local public works unit to be equipped with machines and vehicles for repairing roads in poor condition, while another $700,000 will be used to repair five bridges on the island of Bioko and two bridges on the Rio Muni which constitute the principal access to villages whose agricultural production must be removed.

In the health field, a sum of over $1,000,000 was to be used to put back into operation two hospitals that were seriously damaged by age and lack of maintenance. The European action, very curiously, clashed with the zeal of the Spanish cooperants who landed in these places and began laboriously to bring in water and whitewash walls, without first informing the Guinean authorities. A protest from the EEC: the Spanish painters and plumbers lined up their tools and made up the costs.

Another confrontation between the EEC and the Spanish cooperants shows up in the electrical repair projects. As a darkened capital Malabo had rediscovered the blessings of the incandescent lamp, thanks to several generating sets offered by the Gabonese government and transported and installed by the Gabon Power and Water Company (SEEG) in October 1979.

These repair groups were scrapped, chiefly for lack of spare parts, as was the wheezing Chinese generating set that breathed its last. Meanwhile, the city had received two powerful "Deutz" units of German manufacture, 750 kilovolt-amperes each, a gift from Madrid.

During this time Brussels decreed an overall program for repair of the archaic lines which sometimes dated from 1935, with $3,000,000 of support. At the end of July Robert Scheiber signed a contract for the work with the Electromechanical Company (CEM), a French branch of the Swiss company, Brown-Boveri. Cooperation with Equatorial Guinea, as may be seen, often assumes the aspect of a hydra-headed monster that was pulling in several directions at once.

The exemplary assistance of the People's Republic of China in this country should be mentioned; it is all the more lively because the Soviet colony packed up in the space of a few weeks, the inequitable fishing agreements having been denounced; the Societ presence is currently being resumed with a few diplomats.

The festivities of Sunday 3 August 1980 had a great moment with the inauguration of the Malabo Telecommunications Building in the presence of Mme Luo Shuzhon, the Chinese vice minister of Telecommunications. A brand new building, equipped with 1,500 lines which will enable President Teodoro Obiang to speak directly with President Omar Bongo in Libreville.

The 300 Chinese technicians who stayed until the first quarter of 1980 also built a telecommunications building in Bata, with a 1,000-telephone capacity. Shortwave radio stations were put up, as additions to a central radio station in Malabo, which was equipped with two 50-kilowatt systems.

Definitely very generous, China will supply a 3,200-ton ship for tourist rambles and transporting merchandise. Professional training, however, has not been forgotten: three Guinean students, to begin with, have jumped the Great Wall of China for a technical course.

While the Western countries and Peking are climbing in the Equatorial Guinean firmament, Cuba and Moscow are going through dark days. About 20 Cuban teachers at the very most are still in Guinea, but are not making waves; the former Soviet allies have lowered the flag.

PLAN WILL USE ARMED FORCES IN AGRICULTURE

Accra DAILY GRAPHIC in English 18 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] The Ministry of Defence is to set up a limited liability company to be known as Ghana Armed Forces Enterprises (GAFE) soon to undertake agricultural and other commercial ventures.

Announcing this in Tamale on Thursday, the Minister of Defence, Mr S. K. Riley-Poku, said feasibility studies had almost been completed.

He said the company would undertake agricultural activities to include rice, maize, groundnut and vegetable cultivation as well as poultry and livestock breeding.

Other ventures envisaged under the scheme include bakery and laundry services.

The Minister said the enterprise would consist mainly of a civilian working force under military management but military personnel who opted to go into farming would be free to join it.

Mr Riley-Poku said the rationale behind the farming venture is to produce enough food to feed the armed forces while any surpluses would be sold to the public.

Speaking to the press after inspecting a number of farms belonging to the Ghana Armed Forces Farm Services at Nantong, Savelugu, Liga and Nyankpala, the Minister said the services would be dissolved and the new company would acquire large stretches of land for its operations.

He declared "we don't want to mix the farming enterprises with armed forces organisation hence soldiers would not be involved".

He hinted that if the GAFE succeeds similar organisations would be established for the Ghana Education Service which has the largest number of mouths to feed.

The Minister who was accompanied on a three-day tour of military establishments in the region by Brigadier I. K. Amoah, Army Commander and Colonel Dan Prah, Commander of the Second Brigade of Infantry, have since returned to Accra.--GNA.

[Article by Jean-Pierre Aye: "Electrification in a Rural Environment, An Ambitious Program at More Than 3 Billion Francs per Year"]

> [Text] Have you ever heard of Tingrela? Maybe so, and maybe not. However, what you certainly do not know, and what is surprising to think about, is that the inhabitants of this distant frontier town in the Grand Nord (about 1200 kms from Abidjan) are privileged. Very privileged. They have permanent electricity in their town. And, like their fellow citizens in the cities, they only have to push a switch to turn the lights on or off.
> At first sight, electricity in a town may appear quite ordinary. And, though it is, in fact, for a European or an American town, it is not necessarily so for a town in Africa, where this modern magic has not yet illuminated some towns, and even some cities, at least not continuously.

This African reality explains a certain surprise when one travels through the Ivory Coast at night and discovers public lighting in a village far from the urban centers; homes where electricity maintains the light of day in small localities. Of course, the hurricane lamp remains queen of the night, but its reign is shrinking from 1 year to the next before the formidable effort at rural electrification which, undertaken cautiously following independence, has made great strides since 1970. And, in the field, there are results which speak for themselves.

When, in 1960, the Ivory Coast attained national and international sovereignty, aside from Abidjan, only seven cities in the interior had electric power. These were, moreover, each in its own way, urban centers of a certain importance: Grand Bassam, Bingerville, Bouake, Dimbokro, Gagnoa, Daloa and Korhogo. The small number of cities in the interior to have the benefits of electricity at this time shows quite well how the colonial powers valued only the centers of exploitation where their interests were at stake. And it would have been a shame if, when inheriting the power, the Ivory Coast Government had not corrected this great weakness by implementing a policy of development which, while favoring electrification of the cities or economic centers, did not victimize the towns or production centers.

Of course, the gap between the cities and the towns is a reality, but the efforts made daily to reduce this imbalance are great, and in the area of rural electrification, the results obtained to date are encouraging.

In 1960, seven cities in the interior had electricity; in 1965, 40 cities and towns were included; in 1970, there were 106; in 1975, 300 cities and towns; and in 1980, to date, 523 back-country localities know the joys of electricity, which, in the agricultural regions, is a new element directly affecting modernization of agricultural methods for improved production.

We must also add that the policy of electrification of the interior is an additional opportunity offered to certain regions which the present policy of decentralization of industry would predispose to play a central role in development.

500 Million Francs per Year

How has the Ivory Coast been able to complete electrification of 523 cities and towns in 20 years [type missing and out of sequence].

In truth, before 1970 the "movement" for electrification of the back-country was rather cautious, because this significant and costly operation was financed completely by the EECI [Ivory Coast Electric Power Company]. In 1969, a fee for rural electrification was created by means of a surcharge applied to the unit price (0.60 Francs) per Kw/h of low voltage power consumed, and 900 Francs per kwa purchased and per year for high voltage consumption.

The proceeds derived from this fee, approximately 500 million Francs per year, are allocated exclusively to the electrification of the towns in the interior. The use of this fund, subject to the control of the Minister of Economy, Finance, and Plan, has a certain number of goals:

-to enable each region of the country to have its share of electricity;

-to favor the application of the economic and social policy in rural areas;

-to enable the harmonious development of the electrification policy without compromising the financial stability of the EECI.

But, however large this fund appears, it is proving insufficient to cover from one year to the next, the cost of studies and projects completed for the interior; thus, every year the EECI releases a budget which varies depending on the company's results. It serves to finance the diesel power plants which supply certain towns, as well as to maintain and extend the distribution network. In all the localities which have already been electrified, the EECI is involved again in extending the networks when the development of the town or village requires it. In 1981 alone, the EECI will spend about 3 billion in the rural electrification program.

These are investments which define the size of the task. And today the towns which remain to be electrified are more numerous by far than those which are already equipped. The EECI files note about 2,500 localities which are waiting to be equipped.

Center of the Web: 35 Billion

And, not a day goes by when the management of the EECI does not receive 10 to 15 letters from these towns or their political or administrative heads, claiming "their share of electricity." It is thus that it is apparent that the budget devoted to rural electrification and derived from both the fee and the EECI contribution is insufficient and limits the action of the national company, even for the villages which fulfill the requirements for electrification.

To circumvent this difficulty, the new policy established in 1977 should enable future rapid electrification of several areas at a lower cost. This new policy is based on a regional study showing the large scale rural electrification projects profiting from the extraordinary expansion of the transportation network.

The first illustration of this new policy is the "center of the web" project which involves Man, Seguela, Odienne, Boundiali, Ferke, and Korhogo on an equal basis. It involves creating supply sources (large diesel power plant or high voltage station) at these important centers, from which the surrounding villages can be supplied.

This project, whose cost is estimated at 35 billion Francs, will enable electrification of the North, the Northwest, and the West of the Ivory Coast between now and 1985. It will be jointly financed by the World Bank, the ACDI [Agricultural Cooperative Development International], and the KFW [Reconstruction Credit Bank]. The contracts are in the process of being negotiated.

Concurrently with the studies of this important project, other studies are being conducted for the electrification of the rest of the country; and those on the equipping and supplying of electricity along the Man/Ferke axis will be completed between now and the end of the year. In general, for the research bureaus, it is more and more a matter of pointing out other large scale projects whose completion could be made possible by cooperation between the Ivory Coast government and international financing organizations.

The goal of the Ivory Coast, via the EECI, is to reach electrification of almost all towns in 1990. This is a goal which could seem unrealistic, but the attention that the Ivory Coast government focuses on the development of the interior, a sine qua non condition today for maintaining the pace of growth and development in the Ivory Coast, allows us to believe that the entire country could be electrified by the year 2000. But, first, in 1985, 1000 towns and villages will be electrified.

Low Prices for Peasants

What purpose will these efforts at development and electrification serve if the peasant world cannot profit from them? The policy for electrification of the backcountry does not aim to serve public buildings only: schools, hospitals, administrative offices. It also aims to serve the peasant. Therefore, in any newly electrified village, the connections for the people are free for the first three years. The bills will rarely exceed the 1500-2000 Franc maximum from then on and every two months. A rate system worked out as a function of average peasant income will enable the rural beneficiaries of the electricity to feel privileged without regretting catching up with development. Furthermore, the state did not want to leave the bill for public lighting to the communes or villages as is usually done. It is covered by the general budget.

If a visit to the Ivory Coast outside of Abidjan is convincing evidence of the efforts made these past years to appreciably reduce the imbalance between Abidjan and the interior, between the city and the town; in the area of electrification, the results in the field are eloquent. They are the happy consequence of a bold policy that the figures convey very well: 1960, 13,000 customers; 1979, 260,000 customers; 60% of the customers are in the interior.

MAGAZINE ARTICLE SUMS UP MOI'S FIRST 2 YEARS

Nairobi THE WEEKLY REVIEW in English 10 Oct 80 pp 4-6, 9, 11, 12, 15, 17

[Text] If his first year in office was one of rapid transition, President Daniel arap Moi's second year as Kenya's head of state which comes to an end on October 14 has been essentially a year of consolidation, a year in which against many odds President Moi has tried to put a personal stamp on all major aspects of government policy and establish a regime of his own which is different from that of his predecessor, the late President Jomo Kenyatta.

The first months of Moi's accession to the presidency after Kenyatta's death were hectic ones. Prior to Kenyatta's death there had been strenuous attempts by powerful politicians to bar Moi from succeeding Kenyatta. Those attempts originally took the form of a move to change the Kenya constitution so that there would be no automatic succession by the vice president on the death of a president. The change-the-constitution forces were essentially a Kikuyu tribalist group whose intentions were to keep the presidency within the tribe. That was their major blunder and it was not surprising that the majority of parliamentarians and other political leaders in the country opposed vehemently any change in the constitutional provisions for succession. That was back in 1976.

The defeat of the move to change the constitution did not, however, change the intentions of anti-Moi elements in the country's leadership. It simply changed their tactics. By mid-1978 a new and rather elaborate scheme had been worked out to assassinate Moi and his leading supporters immediately President Kenyatta died, in the hope that in the ensuing confusion power would be transferred to the change-the-constitution group. If this scheme was not known to Moi before Kenyatta's death, it certainly became a focal point of his first administrative decisions after taking over from Kenyatta. By the end of November 1978, the new president had made a thorough shake-up of the police force, sacking or sending into retirement any senior officer whose loyalty he could not completely count on. The same concern for internal security was to extend to the army and other branches of the armed forces in 1979 when promotions and retirements among senior officers brought new faces into top positions who had the full confidence of the president.

The internal security moves were adroitly handled, with the change-the-constitution and ngoroko assassination attempts being used to provide the necessary public opinion support for tough measures, but equally adroit was the manner in which the new president handled the strong public sentiments for change within the political and economic structure of the country. Popular as President Kenyatta had been, in his last years, mainly through his inability in old age to control corruption and abuse of power by his top aides, the late president had generated a lot of resentment and frustration among large sections of the Kenya public. Many Kenyans had come to view Kenyatta's government as unduly controlled by his own tribe, and within that tribe, his own family. Kenyans were saddened by the death of their founding father, but many viewed the passing away of Kenyatta as presenting an opportunity for drastic change and reform in Kenya's political and economic system.

The new president was painfully conscious of the public pressure directed at him over the issue of reforms. By nature Moi is a populist type of politician. He likes to be with the people; to articulate their concerns and hopes, and the enormous personal support which the people of Kenya gave him as Kenyatta's successor made his dilemma even more acute. There were reforms to be made, and indeed the first pronouncements Moi made as president was to order a freeze on government land allocation which under Kenyatta had served to enrich a small coterrie of Kenyatta men at the expense of public interest. Moi followed this order up with strong statements against corruption in general and pledged his new administration to the eradication of corruption in public life. But against this was the need to maintain the political stability which Kenyatta had built up over the years, and the awkward political fact for Moi supporters was that a good deal of that stability could disappear overnight if in the wake of Kenyatta's death, Kenyans were to indulge in recriminations and witch-hunting. Some of the men in positions of influence in government had in the past not been known for their keen support of Moi, but they were doing a job and to get rid of them in order to put in more loyal people would have meant disruptions in several key areas of the country's economy. And certainly, to replace most of the top Kikuyu civil servants and heads of parastatal organisations with non-Kikuyus was politically and in some cases practically unwise.

So, the new president settled for a half-way house during his first year in office. He fought against corruption and tried to impress upon the people of Kenya that a new era was at hand. In one major respect he did break links with his predecessor; on December 12, 1978, only a few months after taking over, he released all people in political detention and ended a long tradition of the Kenyatta regime of dealing with dissidents through preventive detention. Throughout his many trips up and down the country, Moi sought to bring government back to the people. He opened up the administrative structure of the government so that average Kenyans felt more at ease bringing their grievances to the government. On occasions these grievances were presented to him personally and it was he, rather that the local administrators, who relayed them back to Nairobi.

Yet, all along, President Moi was careful not to suggest to the public that there was a break with the Kenyatta tradition. It was good political sense, in his relations with the Kikuyu community at least, to stress continuity. There was also the practical consideration of law and order, for whether reformed or unreformed, all governments must maintain law and order and institutions of authority, together with their symbols, must continue even as reforms are introduced. Thus it was that the first emphasis of what was later to be known as Moi's nyayo philosophy was no more than a stressing of the fact that the new administration was following in the footsteps (nyayo) of the previous Kenyatta administration. It was not until mid-1979 that the tempo and direction of national politics forced Moi into making a conscious effort to get from under the shadow of Kenyatta.

The genesis of the new change came from the heated, though as yet unofficial campaign for the general elections of 1979. Incumbent MPs, whether front or back benchers, had come to the realisation by the end of 1978 that the president was an immensely popular person, and most MPs thought that a good winning campaign strategy for the forthcoming elections would be to portray themselves as true nyayo men and by implications their opponents as anti-nyayo men. Indeed, the most important issue of the general election of 1979, if one went by the pronouncements of the candidates, was whether one was a Moi "man" or not. Not since the Kanu-Kadu campaigns centering around the issue of the release of Kenyatta from detention, did one personality dominate a general election so much as Moi did in 1979. The only trouble was that incumbent MPs were in large measure also powerful figures in the ruling party Kanu, either at the national level or the constituency level. Kanu had the power to clear or bar any prospective candidate for the general election, and this in effect meant that the incumbent MPs were in a position to pick and choose their opponents. Naturally, a lot of would-be candidates got up-set, and the more frustrated they were by the tactics of incumbent MPs and Kanu office bearers in their respective constituencies, the more aggressive in their opposition to incumbent MPs they became.

By the end of August last year, (one year after the death of Kenyatta) Moi's main consideration had turned away from issues of internal security, which were now under control, and were now focussed upon the election campaign. He was aware that Kenyans had rallied together as one family on the death of Kenyatta, but politics being what it is, he would have been stupid to think that everyone who had wanted to change the constitution to bar him from office had now suddenly fallen in love with him. The more reports he heard from incumbent MPs about anti-nyayo elements in the country, the more interested he became in the final outcome of the general election. It was alright to be popular with the people (he was already assured of re-election by virtue of his presidency of the ruling party); but what if a majority of MPs should be elected in the general election who were not nyayo men? What if, as some reports suggested, there was indeed a plan afoot to bring together a group of MPs after the general election who would have the necessary numbers in parliament to achieve through constitutional means what the change-the-constitution group in 1976 and the ngoroko murder squad in 1978 could not achieve?

And it wasn't as if all the vehement opponents of incumbent nyayo men in parliament had a record for vehement support for Moi. Among the Luo, there was the former vice president and leader of the long-dead Kenya People's Union, Mr. Oginga Odinga, and his supporters who seemed bent on getting rid of pro-Moi men from parliament. In Central Province, there were many young Turks, some of them — Mr. Kenneth Matiba — wielding a lot of financial clout — who were determined to put and end to the political fortunes of men who had staked all their political careers supporting Moi when other leading Kikuyu politicians were trying to bar him from succeeding Kenyatta. Elsewhere, there were men like Mr. George Anyona and Mr. Jean Marie Seroney, radicals who had been put in detention by Kenyatta and released by Moi but whose past relations with Moi were such that the new president could not look to them with any confidence for support in his efforts to consolidate his power in the country. Above all, there was the desire which every head of state has to see that he has flexibility in choosing a new government so that out of each major region in the country he has a choice of people who are both popular at the grassroots level as well as dependable as ministers of his government.

It was these considerations which probably induced President Moi to intervene personally in the campaigns of a number of incumbents and to sanction the ruling party's decision to bar Odinga, Anyona and a number of other would-be candidates from contesting the general election of 1979. In the end, however, Kenya voters seem to have been swayed not by the issue of whether one candidate was more of a nyayo man than the other; they tended to vote on local issues and judged candidates by their ability to serve their respective constituencies. Nearly half of the incumbents lost their seats, among them seven cabinet ministers and some of the men the president had campaigned for. More to the point, most of the people who took their places have turned out to be even more of nyayo men than their predecessors. As if in appreciation of this fact, President Moi in forming his government was later to include more than half of the elected MPs in the front benches.

What the 1979 general election proved was that whatever body of opposition to Moi there might still be, it was not substantial and it was not organised. In any case, the president's reaction to the outcome of the election seems to have been that he could manage potential dissent better through co-opting potential dissidents into his administration than leaving them out in the political cold. He increased enormously the size of his cabinet in order to give representation to more ethnic groups. The Kikuyu, to be sure, still had the largest single block of cabinet seats, but President Moi brought in leaders from areas which before had not been represented adequately, if at all, in the cabinet. Moi's most conscious effort at ethnic equity was to be seen in the appointment of assistant ministers. Virtually every district in the country got an assistant minister in his new government, and this expansion of the front benches also took in men who in the previous administration had been known as radicals or difficult people. Mr. Martin Shikuku, who was detained with Seroney by Kenyatta for his fiery parliamentary contributions; Mr. John Keen whom Kenyatta dropped from the government benches for his critical remarks about the role of the government in the clumsy cover-up attempt after the assassination of the former MP for Nyandarua North, Mr. J. M. Kariuki, in 1975; Mr. Mark Mwithaga who had been even more outspoken than Keen on the J.M. Kariuki affair — these and others were appointed assistant ministers.

In early 1979 Moi began to put to rest the ghost of the KPU. Soon after appointing Odinga to the chairmanship of the Kenya Cotton Lint and Seed Marketing Board, he appointed a number of other people who were prominent members of the former opposition party. By mid-1980 the process of political rehabilitation for ex-KPU men was complete; so complete, in fact that the president ordered that there should be no more public harping upon the issue of the former opposition party.

If the first year of Moi's presidency was taken up with mostly political concerns, the second was mostly one of economic issues. Like other African countries, Kenya had been facing mounting problems in the energy field. More and more of the country's export revenue has had to be spent on the import of pretroleum whose prices keep going up. President Moi appreciated all this from the beginning of his administration, and most of his state visits abroad have been geared to getting more financial and technical assistance for Kenya to help cope with the growing energy problem. But the energy problem was not the only problem on the economic front which threatened the stability which Moi was so busy strengthening on the political front.

By July last year there were reports that the country would be having a food shortage. Farmers were having trouble securing fertilisers and the reason was not that the country was broke, but that the world fertiliser market was tight. From these reports alone some experts predicted that 1980 would be a year of scarcity. What the experts did not know at the time was that there would be a prolonged drought as well. More important was the fact that the country's strategic food reserves, particularly maize, had been dangerously whittled down through a thoughtless export drive initiated by the Kenyatta administration at the height of a bumper harvest. Those who knew the latter fact for some unknown reason told the president a totally different story. When newspapers (mainly The Nairobi Times and The Weekly Review) started raising the alarm back in 1979, the reaction of the ministry of agriculture and the people responsible for safeguarding the strategic reserves of maize was to deny that there would be any shortages. They told the president there was no cause for concern, and believing them, the president passed on the assurance to the public. For good measure he warned newspapers from over-sensationalising the issue of food shortages.

By the beginning of 1980, however the combined effects of a prolonged drought and mismanagement in the food distribution system were beginning to have their toll. Queues of shoppers appeared in the country's main urban areas. They were orderly queues, but they grew longer as the weeks went by. The president pressed his experts for information and they stuck to their story that there was enough food for everyone, except that they now changed to saying that it was all the fault of hoarders and smugglers. Still the queues grew longer.

At last the president decided he had better take a look for himself. He visited a number of maize stores and was appalled to find them empty or nearly so. This was no time to apportion blame; emergency action had to be taken and the blame apportioned later. Courageously the president told Kenyans there was a major food crisis but that the government was trying to do everything within its power to find enough food for everyone. The fact of the matter was that in the early months of this year, the government as a government appeared almost paralysed in the face of the food crisis. One ministry would say one thing, and the following day another statement, not necessarily in conformity with the first, would be issued. Only the president seemed to be aware of the full gravity of the situation, and it was so grave that he was personally involved in not only the major policy issues but also in the administration of the food import programme. His state visit to the United States early this year covered several grounds, but none was of greater and more pressing interest to the Kenyan leader than the import of American maize and wheat in time to save Kenyans from starvation. (Ironically, while Moi was away in America trying to secure grain for Kenyans, the ministry of agriculture in a misguided move increased the prices of maize and wheat presumably to induce farmers to produce more grain! The announcement of increase was rescinded by the president even before the ink was dry on the paper on which it was made).

The food shortage was bad enough, but the drought had caused a substantial fall in the water levels of Kenya's main hydro-electric power dams. And for months in the early part of 1980, power failures were as topical as the long queues of shoppers looking for food. Industry was disrupted. Tempers in the country grew shorter. Again it looked as if the government machinery had come to a standstill in the face of a national crisis. Only the president appeared to be active. Indeed, because of the seeming inability of many responsible people to carry out their respective functions, rumours started doing the rounds to the effect that the shortages — whether of food or electricity — were intentionally created in order to embarrass, or even bring down, the Moi government. Farmers in the Central Province were said to be withholding their food from the market in order to cause trouble. The sluices of the power dams had been intentionally opened to dry up the dams, it was said. In the ensuing crises, anti-Moi forces were hoping the government would collapse. Those were the rumours, but if President Moi heard the rumours, he did not seem to be overly worried about them; he was more worried about the effect of the shortages on the public — whatever the cause of the shortages. It must have been a very relieved president indeed who was able on his return to Kenya to tell his countrymen of the programme of food importation from the United States which began in April and is only now coming to an end.

The food and power shortages were a major test of Moi's leadership, and though there is no guarantee that the country will not experience similar troubles next year, the president proved equal to the test. As soon as he had a breathing spell, he moved fast to ensure that key ministries and institutions dealing with food production and distribution are manned by capable and reliable people. One thing he reportedly swore was that he would never believe any figures given to him by his officials on the quantity of food in the country's grain stores. This suspicion on the part of the president has had its own ironic twist. Kenya has recently been building up surpluses of sugar. A few months ago contracts for the export of the surpluses were signed, but when the president heard of the deals he was anxious that another shortage arising out of over-exportation be avoided. He ordered the deals suspended while verification of the figures of surpluses was made. The implied breach of contract with importers of Kenya sugar reportedly threatens to cost Kenya a very large sum of money in damages unless the suspension can be lifted soon. So far, the president doesn't seem to be convinced that the figures of huge surpluses are justifiable.

The second year of his presidency saw Moi taking a greater interest in foreign affairs than he had shown in his first year which was in itself far greater than what his predecessor had shown. Early this year Kenya took part in the Commonwealth monitoring force which helped in the transition from the illegal government of Mr. Ian Smith to the majority government of Mr. Robert Mugabe in Zimbabwe. President Moi showed concern for human rights outside the borders of Kenya when he was one of the first heads of state in the third world to voice opposition to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, and he continued his efforts to forge closer links with the oil-rich Arab nations of the Middle East when he paid state visits to Iraq and Abu Dhabi this year.

The thrust of his foreign policy has, however, revolved around the situation in Uganda and to a less extent in the Indian Ocean and Gulf areas. Kenya's policy towards Uganda is fashioned at State House, not in the offices of the ministry of foreign affairs. President Moi attaches enormous importance on the outcome of the search of a peaceful return to democracy in Uganda, and like his counter-part in Sudan, President Gaafar Numeiry, he is concerned that Tanzania, which still has 10,000 troops in Uganda, may wish to influence the outcome of the forthcoming elections in Uganda with a view to putting former President Milton Obote back into power. Kenya's concern goes beyond the mere question of keeping outside interference from Uganda's general elections. Obote in past has been a difficult neighbour to live with. Unless he has changed, he could well be even more difficult if he were to come back to power with the help of the Tanzanians.

Developments in the Indian Ocean and Gulf areas seem to have convinced President Moi that closer defence ties with the United States are the only way of checking seeming Soviet expansionism. Under Moi defence expenditure in Kenya is growing much faster than it did under Kenyatta, a factor which is bound to colour Kenya's relations with her neighbours. The Americans seem to be assuming a more important role in defence support for Kenya. In turn they have been granted "facilities" at Mombasa, Nairobi and Nanyuki as part of their Rapid Deployment Force strategy in the Indian Ocean and Gulf areas which also enjoys similar facilities in Somalia and Oman.

Like his predecessor, however, President Moi's main interest remains domestic affairs. In the political arena, he ends his second year as president on an upbeat not with his call for an end to tribalistic organisations receiving massive support from the country's leaders (See following stories). On the economic front the challenges grow more numerous and daunting, but with the harrowing experience of the recent food and power shortages behind him, President Daniel arap Moi has proved that he is equal to any challenge that may come up.

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVOID FOOD SHORTAGES URGED

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 8 Oct 80 p 4

[Text]

THE Government has been urged to take immediate steps to balance industrial and food crops to avoid food shortages.

The call was made by several MPs yesterday.

Contributing to the debate on the Ministry of Agriculture's estimates, an Assistant Minister for Environment and Natural Resources, Mr. Philip Leakey, said the matter should be looked into seriously.

He said the issue should be dealt with now while industrial crops continued to fetch higher prices, thus attracting farmers.

Mr. Leakey said Kenya needed to be self-reliant, especially in modern chemicals and machinery.

The Assistant Minister said Kenya must add to the value of her agricultural produce by exporting them in finished form instead of exporting raw materials.

He also called for the genetic selection of plants to increase yields and, if possible, the establishment of national genetic stations. Mr. Leakey urged the Government to enforce laws, especially those concerning cultivation along river banks, to avoid soil erosion.

He said one of the country's problems now was siltation and that all Kenya's rivers were now polluted by silt.

Speaking on the same motion Emuhaya MP E. Khasakhala said the Kenyan silt had enriched Egyptians on the River Nile.

Speaking on food production, Mr. Khasakhala said the Government should force wananchi to grow both cash and food crops and not to neglect any of them.

He said farmers should also be encouraged to grow weather-resisting crops such as cassava and potatoes.

Agriculture Minister Gilbert M'Mbijjewe said his Ministry would work like "a strong horse" to feed the nation.

The Minister was replying to the debate on his Ministry's vote, which was approved by the House.

The Minister thanked members for their "wonderful and useful advice for the Ministry" and promised it would continue to welcome more views and suggestions.

Among suggestions made during the debate were the increase of agricultural extension officers, improvement in the cotton buying system, promotion of irrigation and soil conservation, provision of more loans to farmers, protection of farmers from exploitation and provision of more houses and vehicles for agricultural workers.

"My Ministry will try its best to fulfil all the wishes of the Members because those are the wishes of wananchi," said the Minister.

The Ministry would soon ask the House to approve a Bill aimed at protecting farmers from people who sell fake crop chemicals. "We have been taken for a ride for a long time," Mr. M'Mbijjewe added.

He said the Government would encourage the planting of sorghum, millet, peas and other crops which require a short time to mature.

He said the Government was aware of the potential of 75 per cent of the country's arid or semi-arid land.

BRIEFS

CEMENT SHORTAGE--Over 100,000 tonnes of cement has been lying at Mombasa's Bamburi Portland Cement factory and at Mbaraki depots while the upcountry construction industry is facing an acute cement shortage. Bamburi Portland works manager J. Kimanthi said the cement could not be moved upcountry because Kenya Railways could not provide enough wagons. Mr. Kimanthi said the factory was capable of providing 1,200 tonnes for upcountry but, he added, only 800 tonnes was being moved. He said this was an improvement over the last few days when only 750 tonnes could be transported. The works manager said the problem was further compounded by the fact that the company was not allowed to distribute its own products. "Thus we rely heavily on the national railways network as it is the cheapest means of transport," he added. Mr. Kimanthi pointed out that now over 100,000 tonnes of cement and clinker--a form of cement whose preparation has not been completed--were posing storage problems for the compnay. He said when clinker was stored outside it started deteriorating after rains, rendering it useless. This was a loss to the company, he said. To alleviate the problem, Mr. Kimanthi said, the company would allow the collection of cement from the factory by customers from different parts of the country, provided they had valid local purchase orders from the Kenya Cement Marketing Company that handles all the cement for the factory.--KNA /Text/ /Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 9 Oct 80 p 9/

REFUGEE SECURITY THREAT--The influx of Ugandan refugees into Kenya has adversely affected the country's security. The Immigration Department's 1978 report just released claimed that the refugees have abused "our hospitality" by engaging in "criminal activities." The report said: "Because of the uncertain political climate in Uganda, Ugandans continued to enter Kenya as refugees. A combined police and immigration operation was carried out and Ugandans considered a security risk were repatriated, the report said. During the year under review, 9,808 aliens were registered. The report, presented to Parliament yesterday, said a sizeable number of applications for new entry permits were rejected because Kenyan citizens with similar skills were capable of taking over those jobs from expatriates. /Text/ /Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 8 Oct 80 p 4/

STRIKE ENDED--Workers at Mwea Rice Mills in Kirinyaga District ended a three-day strike yesterday. The strike was called off after negotiations between labour officials, the Commercial, Food and Allied Workers' Union and the general manager of the National Irrigation Board, Mr. Lempaka. Riot police had been called in when the workers started a go-slow on Monday morning demanding the removal of their manager, Mr. Mwangi Thegeya. The workers later boycotted work and were joined by shift workers in the afternoon. Over 70 of the employees were picked up by police for questioning and released later. But the strike continued on Tuesday as the workers maintained they were not prepared to work under Mr. Thegeya. This was the second industrial unrest at the mills this year. Last month, the workers went on a two-day strike in protest against the manager. Three shopstewards were dismissed. Kirinyaga DC Norman Njuguna had addressed the workers after the first strike and warned that the Government would not tolerate agitators. /Text/ /Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 10 Oct 80 p 8/

BETTER KANU DISCIPLINE--Kanu is to tighten discipline among members from the grassroots to headquarters level in a bid to strengthen party leadership. The secretary-general of Kanu, Mr. Robert Matano, said this in Nairobi yesterday when he addressed newsmen in his office. Mr. Matano, the Minister for Co-operative Development, was speaking shortly after he arrived from Malawi where he led a Kanu leaders' delegation to the Malawi Congress Party's annual convention. The secretary-general said Kanu was currently involved in reorganising its administration, recruitment of members and other aspects geared towards promotion of leadership. He urged Kanu members to continue assisting headquarters to enhance discipline, especially among youth. The annual convention celebrations were attended by about 600 Malawian Congress Party leaders from all branches and by the Zambian and Mozambique ruling party leaders, said Mr. Matano. He said Kanu could learn a lot from the Malawi Congress in party administration. He added that Malawians were disciplined people.--KNA /Text/ /Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 8 Oct 80 p 32/

FINNISH GRANT--Finland is to give Kenya a Sh. 3.4-million grant for establishing small-scale hydro-electric power stations in Kerio Valley and the Lake Basin development programmes. The assistance is to come in two instalments: Sh. 1.6 million this year and Sh. 1.8 million next. The agreement was signed yesterday in Nairobi by Energy Minister John Okwanyo and the Finnish Ambassador Raimo Salmi. The money will be used in erecting small hydroelectric stations on rivers Arror, Muruny and Tekerra in Kerio Valley. In the Lake Basin, rivers Nzoia, Yala, Nyando, Sondu, Kuja, Mara and Migori will also have small hydroelectric stations. This is the first such assistance Finland has extended to Kenya. But there are many other areas of development co-operation between the two countries particularly in commerce. Mr. Okwanyo thanked the Finnish Government for the assistance. /Text/ /Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 9 Oct 80 p 5/

FRENCH ASSISTANCE TO BE INCREASED

AB031165 Paris AFP in French 1815 GMT 31 Oct 80

[Text] Antananarivo, 31 Oct (AFP)--The total contribution of the Ministry of Cooperation to Madagascar's development will amount to about FF150 million (7.5 billion Malagasy francs in 1981) a figure never before reached, the French Minister of Cooperation Mr Robert Gallery said on Thursday night.

The leader of the French delegation to the third meeting of the Franco-Malagasy joint commission gave these indications at the end of the commission's working session held in Antananarivo from 28 to 30 October.

Having signed with the Malagasy minister of finance and planning, Mr Rakotovao-Razakaboana, the documents containing the commission's conclusions, which will be submitted to the authorities for approval in Paris, Mr Robert Galley emphasized that France, which is convinced that her aid will further strengthen an old friendship, will make this solidarity effort in the difficult moments through which Madagascar is passing.

Talking about nonrefundable subsidies from the Aid and Cooperation Fund (FAC) (about FF44 million in 1981 as against 32.12 in 1980), Mr Robert Galley stressed that the joint commission has decided to improve the efficiency of the French technical assistance (about 600 French technical assistants currently live in Madagascar) which will be geared more towards the training of teachers.

According to Mr Galley, the commission intends to pay particular attention to scientific research in order to bring it up to the level of the friendship and solidarity which should exist between our countries.

Mr Galley finally disclosed that as far as capital investments are concerned, the commission strictly respected the directives given by the Malagasy president, Mr Didier Ratsiraka. It envisages mainly:

--continued effort for the development of cotton and coffee cultivation, as well as agro-industrial studies;

--the setting up of a pilot scheme of soybean production;

--the development of rice production in the region of Lake Alaotra (north-east of Antananarivo) and a seed multiplication center will be set up; this effort will stretch over several years;

--the improvement of railway transportation (?between) Antananarivo and Tamatave (east coast);

--the study of the iron deposits of Soalala (west coast);

--the establishment of a radio relay system between Fianarantsoa in the center and Tulear in the south-west to (?link) Fort-Dauphin in the south-east;

--the extension of the telephone network in the capital;

--the pursuit of efforts in teaching and professional training (sawmill pilot scheme for pine wood, national school for maritime training).

A new and greater effort will also be devoted to the teaching of the French language and to complementary equipment for Malagasy television, the cooperation minister concluded.

MACHEL URGES FULFILLMENT OF 1981 PLAN

LD051845 Maputo Domestic Service in Portuguese 0800 GMT 5 Nov 80 EA

[Text] Let us make the state central plan for 1981 the first step to be secured in the decade of victory against underdevelopment--this was said yesterday by President Samora Machel at the closing session of the augmented meeting of the Council of Ministers which approved the project of the state central plan for next year. President Samora Machel laid particular stress on two aspects: First, on the obligatory character of the plan and the need for all workers to apply themselves conscientiously. On the second aspect, he said that under the guidance of the party, a wide campaign of tasks and objectives of the plan will be initiated from the base upward in all sectors of the national economy.

Speaking on the obligations of the plan, President Samora Machel repeated that in socialism the plan is imperative, the plan demands discipline, understanding of the tasks, control and submission of reports; that officials at all levels should establish the mechanisms of control to the furthest extent. The Mozambique supreme leader added that reports will be required from officials on the compliance of the plan.

The state central plan for 1981 concentrates essentially on two sectors. First, the economic area which supplies the principal products for export and those for the supply of the people. The project of the state central plan for 1981 approved by the augmented Council of Ministers will be submitted to the People's Assembly, after its approval, the plan will become law.

Summarizing the work of the meeting, President Samora Machel hailed all workers engaged in implementing the plan and especially those of the National Planning Commission. This session of the augmented Council of Ministers also examined the length of the [word indistinct] of the plan for 1980, in which sectors the aims have been complied with, and if not, why not. As summarized by President Samora Machel, it was established that there were advances in comparison to 1979, but that those advances did not correspond to the plan. In face of this, President Samora Machel said, we are obliged to redouble our efforts in order to comply with the state central plan for 1981.

Analyzing the causes of noncompliance with some of the aims for this year, Samora Machel reiterated that the political and organizational offensive has already enabled the detection of many of those causes, such as disorganization, incompetence, indiscipline, corruption and in a general form the actions of the internal enemy infiltrated into our structures. President Samora Machel repeated (?as he said at the) seventh session of the party Central Committee, that it is necessary that the offensive should become permanent; that it should transform the mode of all our lives; that it should be a permanent methodology for the struggle against underdevelopment. Speaking further on the noncompliance of the plan for 1980, he said the absence (?is also felt) of technical and scientific knowledge as shown by many cadres.

In this respect, President Samora Machel said that the economic battle demands well-formed cadres with a good technical and scientific background, cadres capable of putting into effect and stimulating the enormous energy [words indistinct] cadres capable of applying dynamism to the people's problems and the development of technicians. President Samora Machel praised the realization of short practical courses in order to prepare basic cadres for specific tasks in the various productive sectors. President Samora Machel cautioned that the central state plan does not yet cover a large area of the economy of our people, namely family (?production). The Mozambique supreme leader said this does not mean [word indistinct] that at the end the majority of our people should not be supported and encouraged. He recommended that special attention should be given to these sectors by mobilizing and giving concrete support. Finally, Samora Machel said that all should assume from now the principles and guidelines of the 1981 plan.

MACHEL DISCUSSES REORGANIZATION OF DISTRICT ADMINISTRATION

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 9 Oct 80 pp 3-4

[Speech by President Samora Moises Machel at meeting with district administrators and other government cadres on 8 October 1980]

[Excerpts] In a meeting on 8 October 1980 with district administrators and other government cadres from all over the country, Samora Moises Machel, the president of FRELIMO Party and of the People's Republic of Mozambique, made an important speech published below in its entirety:

Mr Administrators,

Today we are gathered together with members of our government. For the first time in our country, all district administrators are meeting with members of the Council of Ministers and high-ranking cadres from the central and provincial levels.

This is the time to discuss some basic questions about our people's lives in the district.

I salute those who, in the very harsh conditions of our economic struggle and the struggle against aggression and enemy infiltration, have acted in a manner worthy of the heroic traditions of the resistance and the revolutionary struggle of the people of Mozambique. Their behavior identifies them with the principles of FRELIMO Party and makes them leaders defending the country, the revolution and socialism.

We have come, then, to praise these distinguished administrators for their example and dedication to the service of the people.

Mr Administrators,

All of you must understand and accept responsibility as leaders in our state; in other words, as district administrators in the specific conditions of our country.

All of you must be aware:

Of yourselves as people.

You must know yourselves, your shortcomings, vices and inadequacies.

You must fight against what is negative in yourselves and accent the positive.

All of you must be aware:

Of your management duties and how to exercise power. You must use power firmly to carry out tasks, make decisions, supervise their implementation and make as many people as possible participate in state tasks in the district. You must know how to report on your activities to the party and provincial governor.

The administrator must understand his structure and relations with other structures at various levels.

We are from different backgrounds. This is our most difficult problem, thus we see administrators causing scenes from time to time. All of you have your habits and defects.

This is a cultural question.

Our language, our rudeness or courtesy and kindness toward our wives and children is a matter of culture.

So too is the way we relate to our subordinates.

Consideration for the public and sensitivity to solving the people's problems are, above all, cultural matters.

In our country, the cultural issue is very prominent.

In addition, there is illiteracy, ignorance, poverty and hunger.

Like peasants, we were not in touch with the district, the province and the country. We were isolated, restricted by ethnic groups, which explains certain episodes. We lacked a vision of the whole.

The Portuguese colonial administration kept the districts isolated.

It kept us within the narrow bounds of the ethnic group.

Even the few who could read and write did not know about the history and geography of our country, district or community. They learned about the colonizer's rivers, mountains and history.

Some of them became specialists. They were assimilated into the colonizer's culture.

The absence of a proletariat in our country, the lack of industry, especially large-scale industry, exacerbated this situation in Mozambique.

The proletariat should lead the people in a class confrontation with the exploiter.

Since the proletariat was forged during the armed struggle, the revolutionary armed struggle for national liberation brought class consciousness. The working class must assume the role of leader in our class struggle. The proletariat will have to lay the foundations for an alliance with the peasant so that the latter will be liberated from his limited, restricted, individualist view.

The peasant who works his little plot of land growing only enough to subsist does not have a collective conscience.

We must strengthen the alliance between the working class and the peasants in the district. It is strengthened by developing economic links between the countryside and the city.

It is strengthened by organizing peasants into cooperatives, by improving the organization and developing the state agricultural sector.

Socialization of the countryside, then, is a decisive task in this decade.

Through socialization of the countryside, we will overcome the present situation of limited production. We have millions of tiny, unproductive farms scattered about.

Because they are scattered, we will not produce the necessary surplus. We will not produce the surplus needed to build factories to produce farm implements, tractors, clothing, shoes, cement and the tools we need.

The countryside must be socialized in close connection with the industrialization of our country. By creating large-scale industry, we forge a highly aware and organized working class. Large-scale industry is our economic independence. It makes the socialist revolution in our country irreversible. It makes the working class the guiding force in establishing socialism in the People's Republic of Mozambique. Through the struggle for socialism, we will liberate all our people culturally, economically and socially.

We must recognize that much work still must be done to achieve this. We must be aware that very little has been done. There is much to do and it must be done better.

We must guarantee the growth and political, scientific, technical and administrative maturation of district administrators and leaders in general.

These tasks demand high-level management qualities of everyone. The state and society must be administered scientifically.

We must learn from our own experience.

There were no Mozambique administrative cadres in the colonial state of Mozambique.

The Mozambicans were not leaders.

We learned to lead through our own struggle against Portuguese colonialism. We learned to lead through the revolutionary armed struggle for national liberation. Unfortunately, the armed struggle did not extend throughout the entire country.

The Popular Forces for the Liberation of Mozambique are the great school of leadership. Dedicated cadres are forged in them. They forge cadres who can understand and study the situation, can consult adequately, firmly carry out decisions and oversee their implemtatation.

Cadres must learn to lead. Administrators must learn to guide the district. The administrator must learn quickly and well.

To lead, the administrator must have a work plan. He must have the best plans, be the most organized and the most punctual.

The administrator carries out his work plan in a disciplined manner.

He must know the people. This is the only way to solve their problems.

He heads the People's Assembly.

He heads the Executive Council.

He mobilizes and trains all the people to carry out the tasks.

The administrator heads the state organizations and guides the people of the district to do local tasks in the struggle against underdevelopment.

The administrator has specific duties and responsibilities in managing the district.

The administrator sees that the People's Assemblies are held.

He organizes the delegates' work.

He ensures that, by preparing the citizen, the dynamizing group, the Democratic Mass Organizations, the production centers and the Local Assemblies, the People's Assembly sessions are prepared from the ground level.

The problems are at the ground level.

Local Assemblies and their Executive Councils must be dynamized and organized to solve local problems. The Local Assemblies can not wait for the problems to be solved at other levels.

The Local Assemblies can study and sum up the problems and the experience of the community.

The District Assembly must take its lead from the Local Assemblies.

The rank and file is the keystone of any exercise of our power, the keystone for solving the problem.

To do this, there must be close liaison between the Local Assemblies and the District Assemblies and their Executive Councils.

The Administrator has this fundamental task. He must lead the rank and file.

These are the administrator's basic duties:

Lead the fight against hunger in the district.

Eliminating hunger means producing food.

We will stop eating only traditional foods from our native areas.

We will stop eating only manioc, corn, mapira or wheat. We will overcome ignorance and conservatism.

To wipe out hunger, we must have varied foods, rich in protein and vitamins. We will eat eggs, fish, chicken, veal, carrots and lettuce. We will drink milk.

To wipe out hunger, we will eat more fruit.

All our people must plant fruit trees.

We must produce all this to create surpluses for export.
Through exports, we will buy tractors, trucks, farming tools, electric equipment, water pumps and spare parts not yet made in our country.

The administrator provides necessary support to state firms located in the district and subordinate to higher-level organizations.

The administrator keeps informed about production plans of those state firms.
He does not interfere in their management, he is not the director of the firms.

Together with the management of the firms, the administrator helps solve the political and social problems of workers in state firms.

The administrator helps recruit workers for state firms.

The district administrator must do everything to meet and exceed export production goals.

The district administrator must supply goods to the people.

He must supply the people by producing surpluses. He must do this by marketing local form produce.

He must organize the local trade network in a rational manner.

He must provide the people with basic consumer goods.

The administrator must organize local industry. He must discover local raw materials. He must insure that existing raw materials are fully used.

The administrator must guarantee that the process of forming cooperatives and communal villages is truly a widely based mass movement.

It is the administrator's duty to set up and develop the cooperative base of the communal village.

The administrator rewards the best cooperative.

He holds individual and collective socialist emulation campaigns in communal villages and cooperatives.

The administrator mobilizes and organizes workers in state firms to create communal villages on this foundation.

Communal villages must be established on the basis of existing villages and production centers.

Communal neighborhoods must be set up in neighborhoods, boroughs and small towns in the district.

This is the administrator's task.

Our administrator encourages plowing with draft animals and plans transportation through the freight information centers.

Our administrator fights against the clothing shortage. To overcome this, we must produce more cotton.

The administrator must insure that the education programs formulated at a higher level are carried out in the schools and literacy centers.

It is the administrator's duty to provide for public order and popular vigilance at the district level.

The district commander of the People's Police of Mozambique is subordinate to both the respective administrator and the provincial commander. The police are an instrument of the administrator to guarantee public order.

The administrator oversees the management of vigilante groups in the district.

The security situation is different. Security is centrally organized.

The administrator is not the superior of the head of security.

The district head of security must, however, give the administrator the necessary general information about people's lives and pursuit of the enemy in the district.

The district head of security must keep the administrator permanently informed about the security situation and essential security matters at that level. It is not the duty of the head of security to reveal, or the right of the district administrator to know, specific, internal aspects of security work--the sources of information, how they are treated and ways or methods of organizing their activities in the district.

Secrecy in relations between the administrator and the head of security is in ideology, policies and the common objectives in defending the people, the state and the revolution. Basically, secrecy is in the spirit of close cooperation. Secrecy is in the clear delineation of each one's specific responsibilities. Secrecy means understanding that there are distinct but complementary responsibilities. It is the understanding that the administrator is the highest-ranking leader in the district. Secrecy is understanding the requirements of security work. It is assuming that security is indispensable, a complex, vital task requiring centralized management.

We must all assume that, by struggling together, we overcome the enemy and defend the people, the state and socialism in our country.

Being an administrator in our country means assuming great responsibility before the party and the people of Mozambique.

The administrator represents the Council of Ministers and the provincial government in the district.

At the district level, he concentrates the state's power from the workers and peasants. We give the administrator's duties to a management cadre. He plays two roles: one as secretary of the district and the other as district administrator.

All eyes are on the first secretary of the district committee and the district administrator.

Because of the high-level responsibilities of the district administrator, we must discuss a fundamental question of management. We are talking about the administrator's behavior.

We know some administrators misuse power and are arbitrary.

They encourage illegal acts.

Some administrators succumb to undisciplined behavior, liberalism and drunkenness.

Other administrators sink into thievery and embezzlement.

They rob the people and the state. They are thieves and criminals. Some administrators succumb to comfort and laziness. They make compromises undermining the prestige of their office.

There are immoral, debauched administrators. They boldly attack our program by promoting moral and sexual corruption. They encourage the disintegration of society and the family. They believe immorality has a value.

They are no longer administrators.

Some of you will be punished for transgressions. The compromises dragging you down are responsible for your dismissal. You are not worthy to remain in the state apparatus.

In our country, the administrator is a leader of the people. He assumes and promotes the values of the political and organizational offensive.

Mr Administrators,

We are purging government management in the districts, expelling administrators in the colonial mode, eliminating those who collaborate with the enemy and removing those who do not have the qualities needed for a cadre in the state apparatus.

As always, with the active participation of our people, we are succeeding in fighting the enemy's inflitration into our networks.

However, we know the enemy is reacting to our victories. We must continue to strike and destroy him.

The enemy works against the state apparatus in particular, because in our country, it is the principal instrument of the power of the workers and peasants united and led by the FRELIMO Party.

The main target of enemy activity is the cadres in the state apparatus.

Therefore, the leader is the enemy's preferred target.

The enemy will react against the upcoming transfer of administrators.

He will use new tactics, reconnoiter and be subtle in the beginning in a seemingly inoffensive manner. He will use flattery.

We know the enemy. He is always trying to isolate the leader of the people.

The enemy, on the base of individual inclinations, wins with flattery. Vice is the source of our weakness. It is the basis for recruitment, and the enemy recruits. We become enemy agents.

The administrator must have unshakeable confidence in the correctness of our line, and indestructible faith in the victory of socialism.

The district administrator sees that all the people work enthusiastically in the fight against underdevelopment.

The district plays a decisive role in building socialism from the ground level.

Therefore, we must define priorities among the districts.

The following are to be considered priorities:

--the most economically important districts in this decade.

--the districts in the liberated areas.

--the districts hit by Rhodesian Army aggression.

--the border districts.

Taking these priorities into consideration, we must:

Begin, in the near future, the territorial reorganization of the districts.

We must make the district a territorial unit so that management and planning will be easier.

This endeavor must be accompanied by properly organized programs for selecting and training the necessary cadres.

The initial reorganization should eliminate obviously unsuitable present administrative divisions.

The in-depth territorial reorganization must be carried out in the context of the future indicative plan.

We must all ensure that the resolution on the political and organizational offensive approved by the Sixth Session of the People's Assembly is completely carried out at the district and local level throughout the country.

We must approve new members for the Executive Councils of the District Assemblies, in order to implement Directive No 2/78.

In this context, the district leaders must be integrated into the Executive Councils.

It is the provincial governor's responsibility, in accordance with Law Number 7/78, to appoint district leaders.

These leaders must be appointed after consultation with the appropriate ministers or state secretaries, or on their suggestion.

We must not appoint too many district leaders or provincial heads since we do not have enough cadres to accomplish this and, too, it would not be in keeping with a clear view of the duties of the Executive Councils. The duties of each district leader should be studied so that the priority branches or sectors of state management in the district will have district leaders.

We must, however:

Beginning in 1981, make efforts to supply the District Executive Councils with the necessary people, materials and money to carry out the related activities in the district in the following areas:

Planning, finances and work force.

Agriculture.

Communal villages and formation of cooperatives.

Supplying goods and marketing.

Local industry.

Opening and maintaining roads, airfields and landing strips.

Upkeep of district infrastructure.

Literacy.

Preventive medicine and social aid.

Law and order.

In this context, the specific duties and tasks of the Executive Councils must be defined. Their membership and the salary of district leaders must be determined. Districts should be classified according to the main political, economic and social characteristics of each district.

We must:

Provide for the basic competence of the central organs of the state apparatus:

By training cadres.

By technical and physical support and by defining standards for the normal functioning of the Executive Councils and the respective district management.

We must:

Define the management training system at the central level. In that system, district-level management cadres must receive political, scientific, technical and administrative training.

District management cadres must be trained to handle the tasks of the District Executive Council with great competence.

Governors, provincial governments and district administrators must assume a more active role in selecting and training cadres.

They must apply specific standards to the policy of cadres so that the district directors who are transferred have designated or will designate a replacement quickly.

The provincial government must organize and train cadres at the district and local level.

It is the duty of the provincial governments:

Under the aegis and initiative of the District Executive Council, to begin training programs.

The administrator must form a staff. If it is to be effective, not everything can be done at once.

The district is of crucial importance in administering the economic and social base necessary for local development. It is vitally important in transforming the relations of production, and in creating, from the rank and file, political and ideological conditions for constructing socialism in our country.

Strengthening state organizations in the district is a priority task for this decade.

Without strong state organizations in the district, our state will be weakened.

It will be like a large tree with stunted roots. They will not be able to penetrate the earth and find water to grow and resist the most violent winds and storms.

Strengthening our state of workers and peasants in the district is a task of the party and state organizations at all levels.

Strengthening our state in the district is a task to which the governors and provincial government must dedicate themselves. Strengthening our state in the district is the direct responsibility of district administrators. It is a task the district administrator must accomplish successfully at his level.

To do this,

Let us make the political and organizational offensive an instrument to strengthen local state organizations!

Let us make the political and organizational offensive a means for mobilization and a popular movement, headed by the local government organizations conscious of the tasks in the struggle against underdevelopment!

Thank you.

The struggle continues!

VARIOUS INCIDENTS SAID TO BE EFFORTS TO ISOLATE NPN

Lagos DAILY TIMES in English 30 Oct 80 p 3

[Commentary by Rufai Ibrahim in the column "In the Nation": "Isolating the NPN?"]

[Text]

ON the occasion of Vice-President Alex Ekwueme's 48th birthday, the Daily Star, after congratulating him and wishing him many happy returns, drew the Vice-Pres's attention to the Nigerian Tribune's editorial of September 22, 1980, which it (the Daily Star) reproduced. For those who did not read it, the Tribune editorial was a criticism of what the paper saw as the Vice-President's attempt to move a step ahead of the President, and his frequent visit to his home state, which the Star saw as inimical to peace in the state.

Earlier than this, in September, Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe, leader of the NPP, chose the venue of the Anambra State Assembly to launch a critical attack on the Vice-President's views on party supremacy.

Still in the NPP zone, Chief M.C.K. Ajuluchukwu, UPN's Director of Publicity is on record as having visited and held discussions with both Governors Jim Nwobodo and Mbakwe. The subject of their discussions we may not get to know immediately but his visit could be instructive in terms of the growing understanding between the NPP and the other parties.

In Plateau State, the Plateau Publishing Corporation (PPC), is soon to start a Hausa newspaper, and the Plateau State Government has appointed Haroun Adamu, a PRP sympathiser and Managing Director of the Kano Triumph Publishing Company, into the PPC board of directors.

This apart, there has for long been some kind of understanding between Governor Solomon Lar of Plateau and the PRP governors.

All these, appear, in a way, to be totally unrelated events and occurrences. It is impossible, after all, for those in government or in politics to avoid interactions with each other. And it is tempting to argue that Haroun Adamu's appointment into the board of PPC has no meaning outside the fact that the board could benefit from the wealth of his experience — in other words that it has no political significance. There is also the instinct to see Zik's action as merely the desire and duty of a party leader to counter a view which could make things uncomfortable if allowed to become conventional wisdom.

But a sober inclination is to view all these seemingly unrelated events in terms of their significance for the formation and durability of political alliancies — a process that is still very active. Viewed against this backdrop, these happenings appear to have one common denominator — an unarticulated but nevertheless agreed plan to isolate the NPN. It is easy to see how and why.

It is necessary, from the onset, to note that the whole party system, on which everthing revolves, is yet to establish firm roots. the parties formed hurriedly to fight the elections are still in their formative stage, and in this kind of situation alliancies may prove to be no more durable than antagonism.

Of course, the NPN is in an accord with the NPP—an accord which many people believe confers more benefits to the NPP than its electoral fortunes would normally entitle it to. It is nevertheless an accord which is not only based on certain wrong assumptions but one which gives the stronger partner, the NPN, the leverage and clout to be crucial to the continued existence and credibility of the weaker party, the NPP. First the wrong assumptions: it was thought that the President really needed an overwhelming majority of party loyalists in the legislature to get his bills through — a thinking that was clearly a hangover from the parliamentary days; it was assumed that once the NPP was "given some appointments and NPP legislators would always vote as the President would wish them to.

It is precisely this that puts the NPP squarely at the centre of what is now happening in the political scene.

In its just concluded convention in Ibadan, the party stopped just short of openly telling its three governors to join the nine "progressive" governors but the comments of Chief Ogunsanya and others on the matter amounted, unmistakably, to an open licence for the governors to join their nine counterparts. Even before this convention, statements from the NPP secretary, Dr. Alex Fom and both governors Nwobodo and Mbakwe only pointed to a desire — or threat — to start attending the nine governors' meeting.

It is very tempting to view NPP's actions in term of its overall strategy to maximise its benefits from the accord. Certainly, the NPP is a very pragmatic party, for which ideology might not mean exactly what it means.

'IT is very tempting to view NPP's actions in term of its overall strategy to maximise its benefits from the accord. Certainly, the NPP is a very pragmatic party, for which ideology might not mean exactly what it means'.

And when Governor Mbakwe once dismissed the NPN as a party without an ideology, he probably never meant that the NPP had, or bothered so much about one.

Meetings

Yet, it seems to this writer that NPP's actions are prompted more by a fear of being "swallowed" by the NPN than by a desire to grab more.

Many prominent members of the NPN, Chuba Okadigbo in particular, and the NPP, ex-Minister Paul Unongo, have been in the forefront of the campaign for a two-party system. No doubt, the rationale and reasons both Unongo and Okidigbo advanced to back their call for a two-party system, were sound. But the problem was that their interest in the matter tended to give the impression that the two-party thing was an NPN strategy to swallow the NPP

Given all this, NPP's strategy became geared towards maintaining its identity. But this is a strategy that has forced the party to seek wider alliances, the accord with the NPN not withstanding.

Already in the northern states, since the last Eid-el-Fitr, Governor Lar has been holding regular meetings with the two governors of the GNPP and the two governors of the PRP And governor Bola Ige's recent visit to Jos is part of the whole strategy of the "progressive" governors to win over Governor Lar to their side. Governor Ige was in Jos, it seems, to further work on Governor Lar.

It is thus most probable that Governor Lar will be the first to be won over, if only because the NPP in Plateau thrives best on anti-NPN sentiments.

But, it is not only because of the fear of the NPN swallowing the NPP that the latter is drawn towards the other three parties.

On the issues of free education and the community and Jangali taxes question, at first the NPN thought it could shrug off the qestion of free education out of the campaign. When it became an issue, the NPN offered an alternative — the "qualitative education". And now the NPN wants to give free education come 1983.

One is not saying that the NPN was opposed to free education. In fact, none of the five parties is opposed to it. The issue is the timing. But the point one is making here is that it seems the NPN waits to be forced, into taking positions.

It appears this is bringing other parties closer together than will normally be expected. And it is for this reason, among others, that the NPN stands the risk of being isolated.

Question

It is, of course, impossible that the PRP, GNPP, UPN and NPP will come together to form one single party in opposition to the NPN. With Zik and Awo around, it is utopian to think so. And the NPP leadership says that the accord is as strong as ever. It may be so, but the point is that in all the four parties the younger people seem agreed on reaching some kind of understanding. What form this will take, how durable or perishable it will be, is, of course, a question that cannot be immediately answered.

RESCINDING BAN ON CAMPUS POLITICAL ACTIVITY URGED

Lagos DAILY TIMES in English 30 Oct 80 p 3

[Editorial in the column "DAILY TIMES Opinion": "Politics in the Campus"]

[Text]

IT was surprising but not totally understandable that the last administration thought it necessary to impose a ban on party politics in the country's university campuses.

Surprising, because the degree of political awareness one has good reason to expect in such places immediately indicated just how unrealistic it was to ban party politics there. This is because one of the variables that account for active participation in politics is education. The higher the level of education, the greater the likelihood that the citizen would be politically active some scholars have rightly theorised.

But experience is the best teacher, and what those with any political hindsight must have learnt from the political history of the First Republic is that the sharp division which characterised the politics of that period produced undesirable effects on university life, to the extent that discipline and the purposes for which universities were established became unduly threatened.

In placing a ban on party politics on our campuses therefore, the erstwhile military leaders must have taken the rather expedient decision, to avoid a repeat performance of the unwholesome practices before 1966.

Now, the Students' Union at the University of Benin has threatened to challenge the National Universities Commission (NUC) over the ban, on the ground that section 37 of the constitution guarantees freedom of association and that any order to the contrary amounted to a violation of individual rights.

The union has also argued that unless the NUC held the constitution in contempt, there was no basis for further enforcement of the ban.

While not questioning the students' right to patronise the courts, it is doubtful if they had given a deep enough thought to the issue before making their objections to the ban known.

Indeed, the notice which the NUC issued last year does not, to the best of our knowledge, ban party politics as such. It confers on students the right to belong to political parties as individuals and take part in political activities outside the university campus. But it debars members of the academic community from forming and running university branches of political parties.

If what students really want is a declaration allowing the latter, and also perhaps the right to hold political rallies on campus, then they are well advised to seek other more productive avenues of demonstrating their political interest.

We believe their grouse is predicated solely on the assumption that the NUC order militates against their right to take advantage of the constitutional provision for freedom of association and fundamental rights.

Strictly speaking, it does not, because the NUC did not stipulate that politically-like-minded students could not exchange views or engage in political discussions, just as soldiers in the barracks and seminarians, for example, can, even though branches of the political parties and rallies are also not allowed in the military and religious institutions, for apparently the same reasons that necessitated the NUC ban order. And it is quite clear that no rallies may be held in any public institution or place without the express permission of the police or other appropriate authorities.

All told therefore, the NUC order is in the interest of the students and the universities, which must not be distracted from the smooth discharge of their responsibilities to society. Viewed from this perspective, perhaps everyone would better appreciate the merit and selfless motive behind the ban, and cooperate in ensuring the calm atmosphere essential for creative work in our institutions of higher learning.

COMMENTARY EXAMINES AFTER-EFFECTS OF LIBERIAN REVOLUTION

AB030912 Lagos International Service in English 0830 GMT 2 Nov 80

[Text] Liberia should have continued to remain out of the glare to [word indistinct] publicity if the events of 12 April 1980 had not happened. On that day, M/Sgt Samuel Doe set a double record in the American-style republic; he broke the myth of the nonchalance of the Liberian people and also became one of the lowest army officers to seize power in contemporary history.

However, the Doe Revolution as it seemed at that time brought spontaneous jubilation among the Liberian people. They saw his emergence as a phenomenon to obliterate the age-long authoritarian rule of succeeding governments in their country and a means to an end. The total routing of the Tolbert family, therefore, did not seem to them at the time to matter so much as long as the Augean stable was cleared and their hopes raised. So while Sergeant Doe consolidated his stranglehold by eliminating and restricting potential rivals and other stalwarts of the old regime, Liberians hailed him on in the genuine belief that a messiah had come their way.

But it soon dawned on them, however, that this lord was not actually being their shepherd. They also discovered all too soon that their leader was prepared to flex his muscles and rule through thick and thin. Master-Sergeant Doe certainly wanted to rule in comfort, and he went ahead to ensure that nothing stood between him and his goal. In the belief that no coup is total until the incumbent leader was eliminated, Sergeat Doe combed the Tolbert household, putting a good number to the sword and punitively confining others. That bloodbath did not do Sergeant Doe any good and very soon he realized this.

Drawing an inspiration from his Ghanaian idol, Jerry Rawlings, Sergeant Doe sought to excell in what he thought was a revolutionary clean up. African nations, spearheaded by Nigeria, did not take kindly to this new twist to the revolution concept as manifested in the Liberian brutality so soon after Carnage in Accra. Because of this state of feeling, Liberia was stigmatized and avoided like a plague.

The first opportunity Sergeant Doe had to test his acceptability in contemporary African politics was at Lome where an ECOWAS meeting was being held. Of course, he was rejected outright. It could not have been otherwise, particularly considering the infantile attitude of Sergeant Doe who visited the foreign countries in combat dress and well stuffed up with grenades. The more mature African leaders, even those of them who use reckless militancy as their leverage to power and popularity, did not seem to take Sergeant Doe's showmanship too kindly.

The economic summit of ECOWAS in Lagos and later the OAU summit in Freetown, Sierra Leone, made Sergeant Doe realize in full force the futility of his experiment in hardihood. The Nigerian leader did not mince words when he stated that he found it impossible to interact with someone who had been so brutal and did not seem to show decorum and humanism in the affairs of state. Not only that, Sergeant Doe's problem was compounded by the sheer accident of time; at the time of his action, President Tolbert was the chairman of the OAU and naturally African leaders did not like what they thought was a slap in the face of the Panafrican movement.

After the Nigerian verbal confrontation, Sergeant Doe and his Junta certainly did some self-reexamination. He bent completely backwards to find the frayed African pulse. He went to see Mrs Tolbert in confinement and offered national apology. He also went on to release a number of people including members of the Tolbert family and some of his aides. But this was a grain in the desert because scores of others are still languishing in Liberian jails and Sergeant Doe seems not in a hurry at all to throw their gates open.

This is why the call by his justice minister last week for a speedy trial of all political prisoners should be seen as a new twist in Liberian politics. Sergeant Doe must now understand that Liberia cannot live in isolation and whatever good intention he may have had for the April sweep could be obscured by his eccentricity of administration. Besides, he could be fanning the embers of discord within his ranks and this more than anything else could spell disaster.

If Sergeant Doe allows better wisdom to prevail and listens to the call of his justice minister to allow the course of true justice, he may be scoring a great diplomatic [few words indistinct] point, which is what Liberia needs so badly at this moment.

PUBLIC DEBT STATISTICS PROVIDED

Lagos BUSINESS TIMES in English 28 Oct 80 p 1

[Article by Onyema Ugochuku]

[Text] Nigeria's public debt outstanding amounted to N5,985.1 million at the end of June 1979. The debt increased by N787.4 million in the twelve months from June 30 1978, according to a report by the Accountant General of the Federation Mr W. T. Dambo.

The debt was made up of N4616.0 million in internal borrowings, and N1,369.1 million in external loans. In the 12 months up to June 30 1979, the internal portion increased by N414.3 million. This portion comprised N2,185.0 million in funded loans, borrowed through the development stocks, N1,215.0 million in unfunded loans and N1,216.0 million in floating loans in the form of treasury bills.

The external debt outstanding increased by N373.1 million in the twelve months. Total amount borrowed up to June 30 1979 was N1,530.7 million. Some of these had apparently been repaid, to bring down the outstanding amount to N1,369.1 million.

The external debt was considerably boosted by two Euro-dollar loans Nigeria raised in 1978 and which were completely drawn by the first quarter of 1979. The two loans totalled N996.7 million.

Other external debts outstanding amounted to N372.4 million, of which the World Bank Group--specifically the I.B.R.D. and the I.D.A.--accounted for N157.5 million.

Other loans outstanding were N46.3 million owed to the United Kingdom, out of a total of N88.8 million borrowed to that date; N35.97 million owed to the United States out of a total of N102.00 drawn; N33.7 million to Canada out of a total of N34.1 million; N29.25 million to the West German Government out of a total of N44.57 million; and N30.90 million to Japan out of a total of N34.29 drawn.

Italy was being owed N10.7 million out of N19.06 million borrowed. The Netherlands N8.22 million out of N8.34 million, Hungary N11.09 million, Denmark N2.0 million out of N2.19 million and the U.S.S.R. N0.50 million out of N2.63 borrowed for an iron and steel geological survey.

The African Development Bank (ADB) is owed N2.82 million out of a total of N4.18 borrowed. Nigeria however has since 1977 not utilized its right to borrow from the Pan-African Bank, in order not to reduce resources available for lending to other African countries who may be in greater need.

The balance of the external debt outstanding, amounting to N3.43 million is owed to three companies--Copoil United Company Ltd, Pauling Africa and S. G. Worburg and Co Ltd--from whom a total of N7.24 million had been borrowed.

The external debt has of course increased substantially since June 1979, with the World Bank accounting for the bulk of the increase. For instance the last World Bank report put the Bank Group's cumulative lending to Nigeria as at June 30 1980 at N748.2 million ($1,416.2 million) and although this figure included amounts that may already have been repaid, loans outstanding and those yet to be disbursed constitute the bulk.

In spite of the sharp increase in the external component of the public debt however, Nigera's international creditworthiness, enhanced by record earnings from crude oil exports, is high. [as published] The debt ratio (calculated as external debt as a percentage of export earnings) is still about 11 per cent, which is one of the lowest of any developing country.

PROVIDENT FUND STATISTICS PROVIDED

Lagos BUSINESS TIMES in English 28 Oct 80 pp 1, 3

[Article by Cyprian Agbor]

[Excerpt] The National Provident Fund (NPF) has invested a total of N417,050,769.47 as at May 1980 on various Government Stocks and quoted securities.

The Fund's Director, Mr M. C. Ijeh told the BUSINESS TIMES last week that at first the Fund used to invest mostly on government stocks and that this only changed recently after the Indigenisation Decree.

With indigenisation, he said, the NPF tried to diversify their investment portfolio and as a result, by December 1979 they had N372,241,957.00 on government stocks, and N17,454,490.00 on debentures and other quoted securities.

He disclosed that the total contributions as at the end of last year amounted to N301,846,292.91, while that of 1980 is yet to be fully compiled from the Fund's ledger books.

The Fund's investments as at December last year amounted to N389,696,447.00 and benefits paid out to the public amounted to N2,802,239,000 while contributions for the single month of December 1979 fell from the regular over N20 million monthly figure to N18 million Mr Ijeh said.

He explained that the drop in contributions in December 1979 was due to government policy whereby almost all civil servants who were formerly non-pensionable were converted to permanent and pensionable staff and ceased to be covered by the Fund.

The NPF Act 1961 and both its amendment in 1964 and the Decree No. 40 of 1967 specify that those to be covered by the Fund must be non-pensionable workers of Federal and State Governments Public Corporations and all workers of private businesses employing not less than ten workers.

EASTERN PORTS WILL REPORTEDLY HAVE BETTER FACILITIES

Lagos BUSINESS TIMES in English 28 Oct 80 p 32

[Text] The Nigerian Ports Authority is currently installing bulk handling equipment and other facilities for cement and grains in the new ports of Calabar, Warri and Port Harcourt.

Federal Minister for Transport Alhaji Umaru, Dikko said recently that when these installation projects are through, only vessels which carry these commodities will be encouraged at these Ports.

He said that this was being done in a bid to further modernize port operations in the country's major ports.

The two new ports of Calabar and Warri are at present not operating at full capacity and the Minister said that they will be equipped in the near future to enable them operate at their full capacity. [as published]

Turnover at the two ports is currently being hampered by a few constraints. For the Warri Port, built at a cost of N85 million, apart from inadequate handling facilities, the position of the port in the interior makes importers reluctant to ship their goods there. Meanwhile the NPA continues to appeal to them to use the port's available facilities.

For the N88 million Calabar Port, situated on the Cross River, on the South Eastern shore-board of the country, while the lack of modern handling facilities and consequently shipping traffic is a problem, the Calabar-Ugep-Oguni-Ikom road (once a beautiful expressway), is now in a state of total disrepair and cannot serve to transport cargo to Ikom and the North-Eastern areas as intended.

STAFFS OF VARIOUS UNIVERSITIES GO ON STRIKE

Lagos DAILY TIMES in English 30 Oct 80 p 1

[Article by Richards Adeniyi]

[Text]

THE academic staff of the country's universities announced yesterday that they have embarked on an industrial action.

The Universities of Ibadan and Ife were the first to begin, Lagos and the others are expected to join today.

The news of the action was contained in a letter signed by the national president of the Academic Staff Union of Universities, Dr. Biodun Jeyifo.

Dr. Jeyifo said in the letter which he addressed to the Federal Minister of Education that the action would continue for as long as there was no positive response from the minister or any other responsible member of the Federal Government to our demands".

On the reasons for the action, Dr. Jeyifo declared: "Two weeks ago, I wrote another letter, giving, on behalf of the union, an ultimatum of 14 days within which agreements reached between our union and the National Universities Commission (N.U.C.) in the course of comprehensive negotiations, were expected to be implemented".

Dr. Jeyifo noted that for years, his union made representations verbal and written, to all the constituted authorities "on the state of neglect of our universities, the mass exodus of academic staff from the universities, and the depth of demoralisation of the academics who remain in the universities".

When contacted, the secretary to the Academic Staff Union of the University of Lagos, Mr. D. P. Igweonu said they were not taking part in the industrial action, until they received directives from their headquarters at the University of Ibadan.

It was however, gathered that the Lagos University branch of the union will join this morning.

From Ife came reports that the strike action was in full gear with all academic work completely paralysed.

Posters distributed by the academic staff read: "No lectures: No tutorials: No meetings as long as the action lasts."

By last night, efforts to contact the other universities to establish, if they had joined in the industrial action failed.

COURT ACTIONS IN ONI THRONE DISPUTE WITHDRAWN

[Text]

PEACE has finally returned to Ile-Ife after a series of disagreements and controversies surfaced over a successor to the Ife throne.

The battle for the Oni throne began shortly after the late Oni, Sir Adesoji Aderemi joined his ancestors on July 7.

The bone of contention among the ruling houses was over the operative declaration to select a new Oni. There are two declarations — that of 1957 and the 1977 Declaration.

The dispute deepened when the Secretary of Oranmiyan Local Government, Mr. E. O. Irewunyi, announced that it was the turn of Ogboro family to pick a new Oni. This led to a series of court suits from many quarters.

Investigation conducted in Ile-Ife yesterday revealed that the situation had changed since the time when the Oyo State Government approved the candidature of Prince Okunade Sijuwade as the Oni-elect.

It was understood that some of the protesting families and individuals had withdrawn their actions following the government decision and the unprecedented massive reception accorded the Oni-elect when he arrived in the ancient town for the grooming session preparatory to his installation.

Some of the agitators, it was gathered, have either gone to pay homage to Prince Sijuwade or sent emissaries to rejoice with him.

A high chief said that the succession battle attracted such controversy "especially when the late Sir Aderemi spent about 50 years on the throne".

According to him, the people of Ile-Ife were known to be "peace loving," adding that the final selection of Prince Sijuwade was automatically the end of the matter". All the princes have since buried the hatchet.

The people of Ile-Ife, the Chief observed, were no longer interested in chieftaincy wrangles but in peace and very progressive ventures.

Lagos DAILY TIMES in English 21 Oct 80 p 9

THE Borno State Government is planning to establish between three and five industries a year.

This is expected to continue till 1983 when the present administration's term of office expires.

Giving this hint at an exclusive interview with the DAILY TIMES, the State Commissioner for Trade and Industry, Malam Abbas Dauka, in Maiduguri said industrial development occupied a central position in the state administration's priorities.

He said before the term of the state government expired in 1983, it would have established about 15 medium and large scale industries in the state.

He said the administration believed that without the contributions of a dynamic industrial sector, the economic aspirations of this nation's masses would continue to be "the proverbial milage".

"Borno State Government, therefore, attached great importance to this sector and is determined to establish a social industrial base", the commissioner said.

He said the administration planned set up industrial layouts and estate the state with a view to reducing the problems potential enterpreneurs had encountered in the recent past.

Such layouts and estate, which would be sited in urban centres and local government headquarters, would be served with adequate water electricity, good roads and drainage, he said.

CENSUS BY NIGERIANS URGED--The director of the National Population Bureau, Mr. Fredrick Falodun, has said that it was not possible for any foreign body to help conduct a census in this country. He told the News Agency of Nigeria (NAN), in Abeokuta, that from his knowledge of demography, it would be a big task for any foreign organisation to conduct a successful census in Nigeria. According to him, any successful head count would require a knowledge of the area where the count would take place and the ability of communicate with those to be counted. Mr. Falodun said that Nigerians could still conduct a census successfully, despite the suggestion that the United Nations be invited to help. REPORTED IMMINENT RETIREMENT OF SENGHOR DISCUSSED

Paris LE MONDE in French 21 Oct 80 p 4

[Article by Pierre Biarnes: "Rumors of Senghor's Withdrawal: 'A Hunter Who Lies in Wait Doesn't Cough'"]

[Text] According to information from good sources, President Senghor could renounce his duties as president of the republic soon in favor of Prime Minister Abdou Diouf, who has been considered his heir for a decade.

Under the terms of the Senegalese constitution, which was modified for this purpose in April 1976, the prime minister automatically succeeds the head of state until the end of the current term without having to be elected in cases of the president's death, incapacitation or resignation. Now, it has long been claimed in generally well informed circles of Dakar that Senghor might announce his decision to retire at his annual end of the year message next 31 December, the head of state Abdou Diouf could become his replacement effective 3 April at the latest, the eve of the 21st anniversary of independence, or 2 years from the end of the present five year plan. But, they add, in this case while resigning his post as president of the republic he is likely to make his authority over the government structure and the socialist party felt for some time yet in order to help his successor consolidate his personal authority and win the February 1983 elections on one hand and, on the other, to continue to play a certain role himself on the international scene, especially through the intermediary of the socialist international, of which he is vice-president.

Beyond considerations related to his age--he was born in 1906--and his concern to complete his literary work, according to several officials President Senghor realized that his heir's political credit risks being dangerously vitiated if the latter is to be kept for a long time yet in the uncomfortable position of waiting which is his at present. In most cases this prevents him from putting his own mark on the course of government affairs, even though almost all major dossiers are now his personal responsibility.

Moreover, the social and political calm which continues to prevail in Senegal at the moment makes it possible to envisage eventual changes with serenity, despite the grave economic and financial difficulties of these last months and the rigors of the recovery plan set up to face them.

It remains true, however, that up to now Senghor has not always made known what he thinks of these speculations; in any case, not officially. He thus remains totally free to invalidate them, if he feels it necessary. He will certainly act to preserve his freedom of choice up to the last minute. "A hunter who lies in wait doesn't cough," he likes to say.

[Text] Dakar--On Saturday, 25 October, the police forcibly dispersed a public meeting being held in Dakar by the Sole and Democratic Teachers Union of Senegal (SUDES), resulting in several wounded among the demonstrators.

At the beginning of summer, a general order to boycott the supervision and correction of examinations had gone awry, substitute personnel having been arranged thanks particularly to the French technical assistance competition; but the government had taken advantage of that event to try to crush its opponents by dismissing 28 strikers several of whom were SUDES militants, suspending 110 others and arranging many transfers from the capital to distant parts of the country.

It was especially to protest these measures that Saturday's meeting had been convened; important delegations had been invited to the meeting from all areas of Senegal as well as from friendly union organisations. A total of nearly 1,000 people (four times more even, according to a union leaflet) had answered the SUDES appeal, and despite the fact that the organizers had been clearly informed of the ban by the Cape Verdean government, the delegations had already assembled at a square in the center of Dakar when the police intervened to break up the demonstration by administering blows with their nightsticks.

Finally, orders not to resist having been given by those responsible for the meeting, the affair was settled, it seems, only after half a dozen people had been wounded. Four SUDES leaders, including Mamadou N'Doye, its secretary general, were questioned for a few hours and released after being asked to remain at the disposal of the court.

ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL ENERGY COMMISSION APPROVED

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 23 Oct 80 p 2

/Commentary by the Council of Ministers/

/Excerpt/ The Council of Ministers has studied and passed a bill calling for the establishment of the National Energy Commission.

Oil resources have become the stake of global politicoeconomic tensions as the inescapable inflationary fallout which is seriously penalizing nonproducing Third World countries.

Those countries should therefore take the necessary steps to decrease the effects of worldwide economic conditions beyond their control.

In view of the rise in the price of oil whose import cost is threatening to stifle our economy, our country should engage in a vast energy program based on a restructuring of our sources of supply and on energy saving:

1. Reserve oil for use in situations where nothing else will do by using, wherever possible, forms of energy which are the most abundant, the most economical and especially among the sources of energy of our own country; this is the policy of diversification of supply.

2. Pursue our present course but reduce our needs; this is the policy of energy saving.

This program will obviously take on many forms and will need the support of all economic media, all sectors: from the extraction of peat to the rational exploitation of the forests, from improvement in cooking methods to the intermodal coordination of transportation and from the use of agricultural food by-products to major hydroelectric projects.

Therefore, the Senegalese government should create a specific administrative body assigned to propose a coherent policy on the subject of energy and assume responsibility for coordinating its implementation among the various ministerial departments.

Thus, it is proposed through this decree to establish a National Energy Commission structured along two levels:

1. The top-level commission which is to meet semiannually and bring together the leaders of the various departments concerned under the chairmanship of the prime minister. Its responsibility will be to propose the guidelines of our energy policy, determine the priority of the projects to be engineered and carried out and approve the policy's implementation.

2. The National Energy Committee, executive body responsible for preparing and maintaining files relative to the ministerial departments and economic organizations involved.

PREMIER CONCLUDES 1980 REFORESTATION CAMPAIGN

/Excerpt/ A little more than 2 months ago, on 8 August, in Joal-Fadiouth the prime minister officially inaugurated the 1980 reforestation campaign. He also announced the finalising of this operation in Louga where he had arrived at about 1000 accompanied by Mrs Abdou Diouf and a delegation. The delegation was made up of Oumar Ba, minister of urban affairs, housing and environment, Cheikh Amidou Kane, minister of industrial development and crafts, Maimouna Kane, secretary of state for the feminine situation, Mamba Guirassy, vice chairman of the national assembly, ambassadors from friendly countries and other dignitaries. The prime minister and his retenue were welcomed by Ibrahima Kone, governor of the area, as well as by newly elected regional officials.

The prime minister made special mention of the cordiality of the welcome received. Wherever he went, he had found a large crowd which had come to greet the delegation and participate in the ceremony being held. In finalizing the reforestation campaign, Moustapha Cisse, vice chairman of the national assembly and secretary general of the PS /Socialist Party/ Communal Coordination of Louga, brought up the problem of drought which, although strongly jolting our economy, also "opened our eyes to many difficulties." "And by acknowledging these difficulties," he stated, "we can now correct the errors of the past."

Moustapha Cisse also mentioned in his speech that the Louga and Fleuve areas are the areas most in danger of being taken over by the desert. Thus, the reforestation campaign was considered necessary. However, it is still essential to put together a vast irrigation program to offset the shortage of rain which occurs during certain years. On this point Moustapha Cisse was only recalling a complaint which had been presented during the special CRD /Regional Development Committee/ meeting which had been held in Louga itself last year.

"It is not by chance that I have chosen Louga in which to meet and finalise the 1980 National Reforestation Campaign," Abdou Diouf declared in turn. "In fact, the inhabitants of Louga are seeing a major urban reforestation operation unfold before their eyes with the objective of giving the city its adornment of greenery." From this standpoint, a nursery is being developed on the regional level; reforestation programs along the coast and steps to stabilize the dunes are being carried out with the aid of Canada and the United Nations. Forests are also being developed with the assistance of the FRG. UNICEF, in turn, is financing the CCSOC [expansion unknown] project in Labgar.

Quoting President Senghor, the prime minister said that "the struggle against a desert takeover is preliminary to the economic problem: if we do nothing in the way of reforestation, by the year 2000 it will be too late. By that time we shall be taken over by the Sahara." That is why millions of trees have been planted this year and 4,000 hectares of land reforested. Our goal is still to reforest 10,000 hectares per year. But all of these efforts will be in vain if there is no follow-up to the various operations and if the plants are left without protection, at the mercy of animals, children or brush fires.

In the paper given by Abdoulaye Sene, regional inspector of waters and forests, the forest program of the Louga area was explained in detail. Mr Sene called attention to the difficulties connected with land shortage as it pertains to crop growth. Now finally, there are no more unplowed lands; the soil is deteriorating; only one type of vegetation (the "nger") is rapidly increasing in the area.

The Louga area has therefore settled down to the enormous task of protecting and regenerating the soil and providing irrigation. Several projects are underway. Protection should also be provided for grasing lands and steps should be taken to provide the people with wood and charcoal for their daily needs and improve their standard of living in Louga by planting trees along the roads and creating green areas.

Taking into account articles 82 and 83 of the constitution, taking into account Presidential Decree No 1 of 21 October 1980 on the declaration of the state of emergency, after taking into account the fact that the deviation from correct administration of national policy arose from (?irresponsibility) and ignorance, after considering the economic difficulties facing the country, generally shared by the whole world but especially aggravated by difficult problems confronting the Somali people at present, after considering that it was imperative to take steps to protect and safeguard public property, using the power given to him as per Article 83 of the constitution and following consultations with the Supreme Revolutionary Council (Ed: SRC), the president of the SDR issued this decree with the following articles:

COMMUNIQUE COMPLAINS OF KENYA-SUDAN ATTITUDE ON ELECTIONS

LD052212 Kampala Domestic Service in English 1900 GMT 5 Nov 80

[Text] The Uganda Government has described as a complete surprise and totally unacceptable reports that Kenya and the Sudan have reiterated that the only lasting solution to the Ugandan situation is a free and fair election following the immediate and complete withdrawal of foreign troops from the Ugandan territory.

According to a communique which appeared in the press after talks between the two countries in Nairobi, the two sides reiterated their conviction that the only lasting solution to the Ugandan situation [words indistinct] in Uganda is a free and fair election following the immediate and complete withdrawal of foreign troops from the Ugandan territory.

This particular reference to the communique [words indistinct] the Uganda Government (?statement) says comes to us as a complete surprise and is totally unacceptable. The statement said that Uganda does welcome dialogue among her neighbors and other countries in the region as a positive step towards regional understanding and cooperation, but we do not accept that this should be achieved at the expense of some other states in the region.

The government of Uganda, it added, has (?specifically made it clear) to its neighbors and the world at large its commitment to conduct free and fair general elections. We are surprised that our neighbors have found it fit not only to doubt our good intentions but also to suggest that we should conduct the affairs of this country in a manner they themselves wish us to. Naturally we find this not to be in the spirit of goodneighborliness.

We also find it totally at variance with the main principles of independence and noninterference in the internal affairs of states.

Uganda, the statement goes on, has never advised any of these countries on how to conduct their elections or, for that matter, any other business that was purely within the domain of these countries jurisdiction. We have never questioned, for instance, the presence of foreign troops in their countries [remainder of sentence indistinct]. As a matter of fact we would like to believe that some of these countries that have found it their business to advise us on the conduct of free and fair elections have themselves never conducted one and would be totally at a loss if they had one. We doubt, moreover, that they have ever believed in or recognized free and fair elections.

For our part, while we do appreciate the interest our neighbors have taken in our forthcoming general elections, we would have appreciated it more if their interest was positive and constructive.

Finally, the Uganda Government once more reiterates to the whole world, and Uganda's neighbors in particular, that:

(a) The only foreign troops that are on Ugandan territory are the liberators from Tanzania and (?are not regarded as foreign).

(b) These troops are here at the invitation of the government and the people of Uganda, and they are perfectly welcome to stay as long as the government and people of Uganda feel the need for their presence.

(c) That the exercise of conducting of elections, which the government of Uganda is seriously committed, has absolutely nothing to do with the presence of the troops, and

(d) The government and people of Uganda are determined to carry out a free and fair election [words indistinct] is that Uganda as an independent and sovereign nation should be left alone to conduct this exercise unhindered by outside interference.

LOAN AGREEMENT WITH IRAQ--The minister of finance, Mr Lawrence Sebalu, and the Iraqi charge d'affaires in Uganda, Mr (Zaki 'Abd al-Hamid Haba), have signed an agreement under which Uganda will utilize the unused balance of the loan of $10 million Iraq offered to Uganda in 1975. The loan was partly used to finance equipment for coffee processing plans and a number of ginneries in Uganda. The balance of the loan, which amounts to more than $5 million, will finance development projects to be determined by the government of Uganda. The agreement, which was in the form of an exchange of letters, amends the original agreement between the two countries under which the loan of $10 million was offered to Uganda. The amendment enables the government to utilize the loan in two separate portions, taking into account the interruption caused by the war, and also provides for easier terms of repayment of the loan as a whole. Mr Sebalu said the willingness of the government of the Republic of Iraq to the amendment of the agreement was a sign of Iraq's appreciation of Uganda's pressing economic problems. He added that Uganda will use the balance of the loan to enhance the (?basic) capacity of the economy. The charge d'affaires reaffirmed his country's continued willingness to help Uganda in its development efforts and hoped that the existing friendly relations between the two countries would grow stronger. Mr (Haba) said exchanging of letters and the signing of this agreement showed again the sincere desire of the government of Iraq to cooperate with Uganda and to develop existing friendly relations in the interests of both Iraq and the Uganda people. NATION'S 6 MONTHS OF INDEPENDENCE ASSESSED

[Article by our special envoy Jean-Claude Pomonti: "A Reckless Bet Half Won"; passages enclosed in slantlines printed in italics]

[Text] Salisbury--This country full of contrasts will no doubt never cease to be surprising. Consider just a year ago, one could ask how Mr Ian Smith, former prime minister of Rhodesia, and his colonists who rebelled against the crown 14 years ago were able to continue to stand up to the rest of the world, even with foreign complicity namely South African complicity and even though they had to cooperate late in the day, a "good black," in this case Bishop Muzorewa. Less than 6 months after the proclamation of Zibabwean independence and 8 months after the brilliant electoral victory of the guerrilla, Mr Robert Mugabe, the former "communist terrorist" of the whites seems to be collecting on his bet: peace has been maintained, on the whole, and for the first time in 5 years the economy shows initial signs of a revival.

Today one of 20 white deputies among the 100 who compose the National Assembly, Mr Smith is less particular, said recently /"I don't know too much about what the government wants to achieve, but, if they stick to what Mr Mugabe says, that seems fairly acceptable to me. But can he succeed?"/

Concurrently, he travels around the country to encourage the whites to remain. General Walls, officer of the transition, who was considered to be the best white hope of the government, has been less astute: he accompanied his anticipated resignation--Mr Mugabe had refused him his fifth star--with commentaries which were quite belated and apparently unjustified concerning the electoral fraud in February.

We expected a "Khmer Rouge"

How does one explain that, even if martial law remains in force, the majority of the roads are safe again, that 60,000 new jobs are to be created in 1980 and that coexistence between whites and blacks, in spite of 7 years of war, is not out of the question. One of the white economic advisors of the new regime, offers the following reply: /"I was for Muzorewa. Mugabe's victory took us completely unawares. The whites have been overwhelmed. Mugabe did not give us time to react. His determination and perspicacity have caused us to find ourselves working on his plans, without even being able to account for it. We expected a Khmer Rouge. We are discovering a remarkable, political man."/

The task has nevertheless not been easy. The secretary general of ZANU, Mr Mugabe's party, and Minister of Manpower, Planning and Development, Mr Tekere caused very bad publicity for the regime. Free on bail, although indicted for the murder of a white farmer, he describes himself as both a "gadfly" and the "conscience" of ZANU. Mr Tekere has spent 15 years in prison and tends to identify himself with the "boys"--the guerrillas of ZANLA who have just spent 8 months waiting in the distant assembly camps. But this amateur radical--/"I owe nothing to the whites,"/ he says--and lover of beautiful cars, who is now buying a property worth 400,000 F in a former European residential quarter of Salisbury--/"with a 100 percent loan guaranteed by the party" he recalls--has not perhaps the prestige among the guerrillas which he claims. Neither hero nor martyr, he nonetheless remains one of the most determined adversaries of Mugabe's reconciliation policy. To strengthen the unity and foundation of ZANU, the latter has worked hard to implant it throughout the country. He pleads continually in favor of stability and, to the minority opposition within his own party, he puts up a weighty argument: unity is indispensable in the face of Mr Nkomo's ZAPU, a minority element in the coalition government. For the prime minister, the most serious problem still remains on that score, the difficulties of integration not only of the guerilla force of ZANU (ZANLA), but also--and perhaps above all--that of ZAPU (ZIPRA).

The merger with the former Rhodesian security forces has definitely slowed down. A single integrated battalion seems operational at this moment. The assistance of 130 British military advisors has not permitted the acceleration of the change thus far. Many white army officers have preferred to leave, especially in response to attractive offers from South African units detailed to surveillance of the frontiers and set up as counter-guerrilla units. Five thousand former black guerrillas have already found jobs in the industrial and mining sectors. But the launching of agricultural cooperatives with the worker-soldiers has failed, since the former guerrillas refuse to exchange their submachine guns for pickaxes.

To try and solve the problem the government decided to evacuate the assembly camps where armed soldiers have been vegetating since the cease-fire on 4 January and giving trouble to the local police and white farmers in the vicinity. Of the 23,000 ZANLA partisans, 17,000 are being transferred in October to Chitungwiza, an African city whose construction is just completed, about 20 kilometers form Salisbury. Seven thousand men of ZIPRA are to be graudally regrouped not far from Bullawayo, their provincial capital. This double operation, begun in October, has already caused some commotion, especially at Chitungwiza, where African squatters hoped to occupy the new city. Some incidents have taken place and the population is worried all the more as the settlement of ZANLA guerrillas on a farm at Goromonzi, about 60 km east of Salisbury, has provoked many incidents, some farms and the police station having been the object of many armed attacks. The former guerrillas will be transferred to barracks after the rainy season. In theory the "boys" will have to turn in their arms in the depots. Near the large urban centers they will feel less isolated than in the bush--where they are convinced that they have been forgotten--and will have more distractions. Furthermore, it will be easier for the provincial police to identify the armed bandits who still are on the rampage in the Tribal Trust Lands, former African reserves.

The party of Mr Nkomo, minister of the interior without real powers, likewise constitutes a delicate situation. Some brawls have taken place regularly between members of ZANU and ZAPU in the townships, especially Saturday evening at the drinking hour. This "weekend violence," as they call it here, has not yet taken on alarming proportions, even if the police--weakened by the departure of numerous white officers--are not always able to intervene.

For the moment, in spite of the bitterness of his electoral defeat, Mr Nkomo has never really given the impression that he was ready to break the electoral coalition. Knowing that he represents a minority--the Ndebeles of the southeast and east, at best 20 percent of the 7 million Zimbabweans--he can only play the unity card, in order to present himself, in case of a crisis, as the alternative. The old politician has chosen prudence. But he controls at the Gwai River, at the heart of Ndebele country and about 100 kilometers from the Zambian frontier, a veritable small army of intervention equipped with Soviet heavy equipment, including armored combat vehicles.

In addition, there are reportedly still up to 17,000 ZIPRA soldiers in their former bases within Zambia and especially within Angola. The problem is all the more difficult as Luanda and Lusaka, for the same reason as Mr Nkomo, maintain cordial relations with the Soviets, whereas Mr Mugabe, who was scarcely helped by Moscow during the war, still refuses the Kremlin overture for an embassy in Salisbury.

But the prime minister, in case of a trial of force with Mr Nkomo, can reportedly rely on some units of the former Rhodesian forces, still well officered and which play, thus far, a deterrent role. /"These are professional soldiers who will obey the orders of their government,"/ says a business man close to these white officers.

As for the European community--about 180,000 people--it poses a less thorny political problem. A minority cooperates actively with the government. Departures are at the rate of about 1,500 per month and should reportedly leap in December with the end of the school year. /"But the whites,"/ thinks a high official, /"have too many interests here to play the fool."/ Put differently, as long as their life style will not be affected by the political changes--and that is the case for the moment--they will not budge.

Definite Resumption of Production

At first Mr Mugabe's government was engaged in resettling the refugees from abroad and the people displaced within. The former have all been repatriated. Some 10 or so protected villages--into which the Rhodesian Army had consolidated them in order to better control them--are beginning to empty. /"We are returning them to their homes with a case of goods from which to feed themselves for several months and some seeds,"/ explains one of those in authority. Approximately 350,000 people are to benefit from these "care packages" this year.

In industry, the conflicts which had caused the strikes during the first weeks have been settled and some joint production committees have been set up. The minister of industry himself made a tour of the factories and mines to exhort the strikers not to demand too many large pay increases and to "sacrifice" their interests temporarily in the "national interest." He has succeeded in making himself heard. In the agricultural sector everything has been done to reassure the white farmers and to correct the price policy of the preceding government. The sectors in trouble are those of meat--the production of which has been affected by very weak prices and which is temporarily rationed--as well as that of tobacco, of which Rhodesia was a large producer and whose culture is reviving. The healthy sectors are those of coffee, tea, and above all, cotton, of which the next harvest could be the best in a long time.

The situation with corn--basic food of the blacks--is a bit different. As far back as 1974 Salisbury produced on an average 1.4 million tons per year, half intended for local consumption and the remainder for export. In 1976 the closing of the Mozambican frontier, by forcing the Rhodesians to export through South Africa, a costly detour, encouraged a decrease in production. Since then there is a scarcity. This year, while still filling part of its contract with Zaire (32,000 tons were delivered before the intervention of the clause of "force majeure"), the government has had to import 150,000 tons of yellow South African corn. But this situation is being reversed. Starting in 1979, the authorities have raised prices in order to restore production which will start off again, after the intervening ceasefire, with the rainy season. Moreover the boost to the subsistence economy in the Tribal Trust Lands ought to reduce the requirements of the local market. In short, Zimbabwean economists count on the export of 350,000 tons for 1981, since the cultivated area has already been extended by more than 20 percent. At this rate, if climactic conditions are favorable, total production might reach 2 million tons. Starting in 1980, the rate of economic growth ought to become positive again. It will lie, according to expectations, between 4 and 7 percent after having been negative for several years. Imports, rigorously controlled, are increasing appreciable to meet the needs for new material of an economy which has survived for a very long time in semi-self-sufficiency. But the lifting of international sanctions has reduced considerably (by an average of 20 percent) the cost of exports and has opened some new markets. An astute policy of commercial promotion has likewise contributed to strengthening the cushion of foreign currencies in Zimbabwe. In order not to slow down reconstruction, the government tolerates a rather high rate of inflation (15 percent per year), but domestic consumption has already increased by 20 percent, another sign of health.

A Dramatic Lack of Executives

In this phase of reconstruction, the weaknesses of the economy are, first of all, the dramatic lack of key executives and skilled workers. Many white engineers or contractors are going to find other jobs for themselves on a flourishing South African market. Furthermore, reestablishment of communication with Mozambican ports takes time. Trains run again between Beira and Salisbury, but the Mozambican port can only accommodate freighters up to 5,000 tons, because of its sand bar and poor management. The other railway line, to Maputo, has been repaired on the Mozambican side where many bridges had been destroyed by Rhodesian fighter planes. But on the Zimbabwean side, where 73 km of rails had been dismantled to repair other major lines, the repairs will not be finished until November. It will take a year yet to extend to Mozambique the system of electronic control which allows several trains to use the rails simultaneously.

If reconstruction depends first of all on political stability, the fundamental weakness of the economy lies in the contrast between the subsistence economy of the Tribal Trust Lands (half of the territory where 4 million Africans live whose annual income often falls to 200 F per person) and a modern agricultural, industrial and mining sector where the minimum salary has been increased since independence (an agricultural worker starts at 2400 F per year).

Mr Mugabe banks entirely, for the moment, on stability to attract foreign investments, to make the best use of the existing infrastructure, and to try to allay the fears of the key white personnel. On several occasions he has complained about the weakness of foreign aid, the total of which this year will reportedly not reach $200 million. The Westerners, he says have not kept their promises. The other handicap is the dependence on the South African giant: a debt of $250 million owed to the bankers of Johannesburg, the presence of 200,000 Zimbabweans in the South African mines, the utilization of the South African route for 90 percent of foreign trade, and the importance of South African interests in Zimbabwe.

If Mr Mugabe has not definitely renounced the creation of a more egalitarian society, he has chosen first to consolidate the foundation of his government. In this area, he has shown himself to be a skillful tactician, renouncing, temporarily no doubt, the nationalization of "key sectors" of the economy. Some unforseen delays are always imaginable and undoubtedly it will still take several years, in any case, to know if the experiment of "reconciliation" launched in April, will succeed. Nevertheless it will have been proven, in the meantime, that it was possible.

GUINEA-BISSAU, CAPE VERDE 4-YEAR PLAN TERMED 'FLEXIBLE'

Bissau NO PINTCHA in Portuguese 11 Sep 80 p 3

[Excerpts] The first Guinea-Bissau-Cape Verde Four-Year Plan is to begin in 1982, according to conclusions reached in the third meeting of the State Commissariat of Economic Coordination and Planning and the State Secretariat of Cooperation and Planning. The meeting was held in Bissau from 3 to 8 September.

The elaboration of this first plan is in accord with the political options of the two countries, as we were told by Comrade Jose Brito, secretary of state for cooperation and planning, who headed the Cape Verdean delegation at the meeting.

The problem of a lack of cadres in the two friendly countries and a lack of experience in absolute terms, which can often lead us to make plans not compatible with our realities and jeopardize the harmonious development of our economy, was also taken up by the Cape Verdean leader.

"We do not have favorable conditions for a rigid plan; our plan will therefore be flexible," Comrade Jose Brito said. He then stated more specifically: "It is a document of orientation based on a certain discipline, and we are aware that the plan is not adequate to enable us to overcome all the problems of development, but we can affirm that it is an instrument for the guidance of our economy."

In these first few years of independence of the two countries, some sectors were not used to good advantage.

Jose Brito also acknowledged that, despite the preparation of a plan for each country, both plans should reflect a process aimed at achieving unity. Thus, it was agreed that the contents of the first plan, particularly with regard to unity, should be determined in accordance with the following two objectives:

The development of exchanges and the preparation of conditions for the economic integration of the two countries. This will particularly involve a study of existing potentialities and those foreseen in the area of exchanges, the necessary development of transportation and communications, the study and realization of joint projects, the harmonizing of programs and action at the departmental level of the two countries, and approval of a common guideline to assist in preparing economic integration.

The secretary of cooperation and planning of the [Cape Verde] archipelago emphasized that this first plan provides for vast areas of unified action, especially in the sphere of economic integration and market activity, free exchanges and joint projects.

PARTIAL CENSUS RESULTS SHOW GROWTH RATE DECREASE

Praia VOZ DI POVO in Portuguese 7 Oct 80 p IV

[Text] Cape Verde's population growth rate has decreased in the last few years due principally to extensive emigration in the 1970's, according to the National Census Committee which presented that information in a meeting chaired by Comrade Jose Brito, secretary of state for cooperation and planning, held on Wednesday, 17 September, marking the end of the first phase of the committee's work.

Preliminary information submitted by the committee shows a Cape Verdean population growth rate of 0.8 percent between 1970 and 1980 and a rate of 1.8 percent in relation to the 1960 census and 2.3 percent in relation to that of 1950. The same information also shows that there was a decrease in the growth rate of certain islands compared with the 1970 census. Those decreases occurred on the islands of greatest emigration, whether internal or external. This is the case with the island of Boa Vista where there was a population decrease of 0.4 percent, Sao Nicolau which showed a decrease of 1.8 percent, Brava, 1.2 percent, and Santo Antao, a decrease of 0.4 percent.

On the other hand, on some of the other islands slight increases in the growth rate were noted, such as on Fogo, with 0.5 percent, Maio, with 1.7 percent, Santiago, with 1.2 percent and Sal, 0.5 percent.

Meanwhile, considerable growth was recorded in Praia whose population is estimated at 39,794, an increase of 3.6 percent, a rather sizable rate increase compared with the national average. This is followed by Sao Vicente whose population is estimated at 41,792, an increase of 2.8 percent.

"To give definite information about the population growth on the islands and in the various cities with respect to the people's age distribution, rate of unemployment and the like is a task we believe we can accomplish in the near future and obtain results within a few months by manual processing.

"As for other types of information, we must use data processing. We are already setting up our data processing center and shall begin this month to train qualified personnel and machine operators, and we are still thinking about training higher-level computer personnel for this type of work to be done in Cape Verde for the first time. Within a year or a year and a half we shall have definite results, processed and analyzed," Secretary of State Jose Brito commented.

Of fundamental importance to Cape Verde's development, especially in the current phase in which we are preparing the first national development plan, the results of the first general population and housing census will enable us to prepare sectorial development programs.

Population Figures

The National Census Committee has disclosed that we have a residential population of 296,093 and an actual population of 288,845. There are 137,154 males and 158,939 females, a total of 56,206 housing units and 58,620 families in Cape Verde.

Population Distribution According to Islands

Island	Number of Inhabitants
Boa Vista	3,397
Brava	6,984
Fogo	31,115
Maio	4,103
Sal	6,006
Santiago	145,923
Santo Antao	43,198
Sao Nicolau	13,575
Sao Vicente	41,792

FAN CHIEF DISCUSSES ATTITUDE TOWARD LIBYA, FRANCE

Dakar AFRICA in French Oct 80 pp 37-39

[Interview with Hissein Habre, chief of the Northern Armed Forces (FAN), by Roger Dorsinville, date and place unspecified]

[Text] [Question] Mr Hissein Habre, Mr Minister, at the time of the Claustre affair, you were a hero in the Third World, even those who did not approve of moral violence against a woman told themselves that you must have very good reasons for it and believed in you. So you were a hero, [but then] you became one chief of faction among others, and this harms your image and your cause: how do you feel in this role?

[Answer] Without a doubt, a country governed by 11 factions is not well governed; on the contrary it must be very poorly governed, and perhaps this is one of the explanations for the present crisis. Nevertheless, after more than a decade of war, after the fall of the Malloum regime and before that the Tombalbaye regime, it was necessary to put an end to the war and have a reconcilation of all the Chadian parties to have national peace and concord, in order to save the unity, the independence, and the sovereignty of Chad, in order to block outside ambitions and to lay the foundations of development, of progress, none of which could be accomplished in the midst of a war. This was our objective, we had to bring together the 11 factions, several of which were remote-controlled from the outside. In some fashion to nationalize these factions, and put them in the service of the nation, this was the significance of the Lagos Accord which brought in everyone without exception.

[Question] But starting with the time it became evident that some of these different factions did not pursue the same goals you did, would it not really have been the right thing to withdraw, to save yourself for the future in some way? Some of us think that if instead of committing yourself to this thing which is almost unacceptable to our consciences you had withdrawn and left them to themselves, the future would have played into your hands. They would have sought you out.

[Answer] The stakes of this war are much more serious, for we are speaking of the very fate of Chad as a state, as a nation. On both sides people are implacable against FAN, for the simple reason that FAN constitutes an obstacle to their hegemonstic and annexationist designs. In other words, for FAN to abandon the battle, to abandon the patriotic ideals, the nationalist ideals, the African ideals, and to leave the field open to the expansionists, the annexationists, the imperialists, well this would be playing right into the hands of Chad's enemies, it would be surrender, and Chad's enemies would realize their designs. We would be remiss in our obligations to the people of Chad, to the people of Africa, were we to abandon our goals and leave the field open to Africa's enemies who want to destroy, to balkanize, or to occupy a large part of Chad.

[Question] So, to bring up another problem: you accuse Libya, and at the same time France; you will need France against Libya; who are you counting on?

[Answer] The people of Chad, who took up arms in 1965, opposed to the regime in place, and [to] the French forces which, at a certain point in the history of the struggle, intervened massively in Chad. In the first years of the struggle, even though they received no support from any outside power, the Chadian people held at bay both the forces of the successive regimes in place and of the French forces. We think that in defending a just cause we need no protector whatsoever, from wherever it might come. If we did, we might as well accept the status quo. We should consider all [of them] our enemies as such, and this being so, our people understand us, support us, and so does Africa, the world; countries, states, leaders, statesmen who defend the ideals of peace, justice, and liberty are not lacking, and perhaps we will the support of the just; an unconditional support; so we have no need of any kind of protector.

[Question] Obviously we are not talking about a protector, but the problem is how can you fight against everyone at the same time. It is not a question of a protector, but perhaps more a question of tactics. There is uranium, the Aouzou strip is rich in it, no one is going to let you alone, so all the same you are going to have to have the support of someone, either on the right or the left, here or there. Look at what is happening, all the little countries in the world cannot loosen Israel's hold. The weight we little nations wield is not great. It's going to be necessary for you to fight against Libya, to fight for your independence, and the next day for your rescue you are going to have to have someone's support, this is the problem.

[Answer] What you say is quite true, for even when one is fighting in a just cause one always has need of support, this is certain. But we believe that in this case France has lowered herself to working with Libya against Chad for sordid and egoistic interests that are well recognized. We cannot betray our ideals, our objectives, and fall in behind Libya or France. We think that France, which has historical connections with Chad as well as with all its old colonies, should reconsider its present position, and reflect deeply on where its real interests, the interests of the French people, lie. I cannot believe that France's interests can be found in a deal with Qadhdhafi at the expense of Africa. It is up to France to reconsider its position. As for support, we are looking for support wherever it can be found, honest support, disinterested. Whatever be the problems of the war, we believe that we do not need to try to get support from our enemies. We will look elsewhere for support.

[Question] We will not ask you where. We will be satisfied with your answer that you will go wherever it is useful in order to escape the clutches of recolonization. Another question. You have said that you were ready to agree to a peace without victor or vanquished, you said this. This is therefore to admit at least the idea of [there being] two balanced factions. You have also said you were ready to accept a United Nations intervention force, you said this. And this is to admit a kind of arbitration, an idea of sharing, the United Nations between two rather powerful factions to provide equilibrium. There you introduce the notion of federalism, but you are against federalism, is this not a contradiction?

[Answer] No, no, no. There is no contradiction in our statements, no more than there is any idea whatsoever of federalism. Our conception of reconciliation, of concord, of peace, in Chad, is in no way based on a partition into spheres of influence. We think that the highest interests of the Chadian nation, the deep aspirations of the Chadian people, demand of those who today consider themselves her spokesman, her leaders, her flag-bearers, that they transcend their egoism, their personal ambitions, that they transcend themselves, that they find a new awareness of their responsibilities so that they can understand one another, guide together the destiny of this country, contribute to the strengthening of its unity, to the brotherhood of the Chadian people, and together build the state, but in no way whatsoever to partition, on a regional or any other basis, power on territorial lines. Quite contrary. We think that this reconciliation should go toward a meaningful struggle against those who want to destroy the Chadian state, who inject the idea of feudalism. This is our way of thinking, we are absolutely against the partition of Chad into spheres of influence.

[Question] Are you confident that some of the other chiefs of factions will transcend their egoism and maintain such lofty views?

[Answer] I think one must never despair of humanity, for man is an evolving and dynamic phenomenon. He can change his position, he can reconsider his analyses; for the moment, we are obliged, of course, to consider the facts such as they are, reality in its naked truth. At the present moment we know that those who are fighting the FAN have become true foreign agents, but we think that as the situation evolves, for these people thought they could make mincemeat of the FAN in 48 hours, not to speak of the will and determination of those who are defending a just cause... reality should lead them to reconsider their point of view, and also there is the support of Africa. There are African forces that are not supportive of hegemonic, annexationist politics; I think these powers also have their weight. The problem of Chad is after all an African problem. So all the same we are optimists in our search for a just solution.

[Question] All of us are greatly concerned, who live far from the events and yet live through the events. We are agonized, we are in pain, and not only for Africa, not only for Chad, but the [entire] Third World. Don't you see, when we consider what is happening in Lebanon and then in Chad, and then in other places, Eritrea at war with Ethiopia, we are tormented by these events. Naturally, you are pursuing your version of justice. But as for us, when we look from afar we tend not to see your version of justice and [instead] to see it as a part of the overall injustice. One must be able to speak to the other side. Can you say you have consciously tried to pass this message of peace, to Goukouni Oueddei for example, since we are speaking of him? To dialog! Have you really tried? Do you think you have done everything possible to convince him?

[Answer] Look: when on the night of 20-21 March the combined elements of Goukouni, Kamougue, and Acyl Amath attacked the FAN combattants of Prevote at 0330, 0400 in the morning, assassinated them as they slept in their beds, yes, after this bloody event so shocking to the conscience of mankind--we tried within two days to resolve this problem and above all tried to prevent the war from expanding. I must say that efforts by third parties were undertaken toward the same end, in particular by the ambassadors of Saudi Arabia, Egypt, France, the Sudan, and the Imam of the Great Mosque of Ndjamena, and other notables. So all possible efforts are being made to inhibit the escalation of the affair, and we have done everything to this end, we have even signed several cease-fires; unhappily, every time, those whose interest was in unleashing the machine of war refused [to listen to] the voice of reason. At the beginning of hostilities, I was in continual contact with Goukouni; we called each other on the telephone almost every hour, we met personally.

[Answer] Of course, of course, we were in continual contact by telephone and we even met three, four times in person. But Goukouni was unable to stop the momentum of war. He did not control his troops, who were not obeying him; the Libyan agents who surrounded him did not obey him. Acyl Amath who is part of the coalition did not obey Goukouni. Mahamat Abba did not obey either. In fact, you know, Goukouni is just what he is, he does not have authority over his own men; the majority of his advisors are Libyan agents, Ibrahim Youssouf, the brains of the FAP [People's Armed Forces] is a Libyan, an advisor to Goukouni put at his disposal by Qadhdhafi. This is the man who is calling the shots. So I should tell you that not only does the FAN have a clear conscience about these events, the FAN has a clear conscience about its responsibilities. The proof is that we came to Lome, and the other side didn't even come. From this point of view, I think that we are in harmony with our conscience, our duty, and our responsibilities.

[Question] Do you believe you can hold out on the battlefield?

[Answer] The situation is better than when hostilities started, despite massive assistance and mercenaries from Libya. We are doing well, we are holding firm, and I think that if the war continues, sure, we will gain ground every day.

[Question] You think you must also win another battle on the diplomatic front by stopping Libya, and then France. Is this perhaps the reason for your trip?

[Answer] I think it is indispensable. You understand perfectly well that these countries thanks to their financial power manipulate international opinion; the media sows confusion throughout the world and throughout Africa. Reality is distorted. They have even succeeded in foisting off the absurd idea that the FAN attacked the "gang of four." So, our job was to demystify, to re-establish the truth, to inform the African public in particular and international opinion in general about the hidden truth of the conflict. What Libya is in the process of doing is a scandal to the African conscience, it is unacceptable. Good God, what century are we living in? And France, after having been disappointed in the Biafra affair, this time is acting in a crafty manner, its media wanted to mold an image of the FAN favorable to France. As leaders, we have tried sincerely, we have done everything possible to enable France and Chad to cooperate on the basis of reciprocal advantages, mutual respect, but, having discovered France's game, we are obliged to denounce it.

[Question] There is all the same a difference between your two enemies. Namely, that one is crazy while the other is intelligent. One has just discovered history, while the other has long experience of it. I would not try to say which is the more dangerous, but I would try not to have to fight against two enemies at the same time.

[Answer] Thanks for the advice.

U.S. AID CRITICIZED--Rome, 13 Nov, JAMAHIRIYAH NEWS AGENCY--The Chadian Foreign Minister Ahamet Acyl confirmed the flagrant intervention of the Egyptian regime in the internal affairs of Chad in support of the renegade Hissein Habre through incitements by the United States with the aim of threatening peace and security in this African country. In a press conference held in Rome yesterday, Mr. Acyl pointed out to the open military assistance being extended by the Al-Sadat's terrorist regime for Hissein Habre, the Egyptian military troops in forms of technicians and experts are fighting with this renegade. He confirmed that the Chadian legitimate forces are completely on top of the situation in Chad while Habre's forces are beseiged in a narrow area in northern Chad. In the press conference, Mr. Ahamet Acyl, the Chadian foreign minister, exposed the contradicting stands of the United States towards the situation in Chad. He said we consider the direct and indirect American intervention in Chad's affairs and its support to the renegade Hissein Habre constitutes a flagrant violation of freedom which the Chadian people are struggling to achieve on the Chadian territories. The Chadian foreign minister emphasized that strong historical relations link the Chadian and the Libyan peoples in the form of neighbouring, Arabist and Islamic ties. PRESIDENT N'GUESSO ADDRESSES CENTRAL COMMITTEE SESSION

AB061552 Brazzaville Domestic Service in French 1245 GMT 6 Nov 80

[Excerpts] After the meeting of our honorable deputies last Tuesday, the members of the Central Committee of the Congolese Labor Party this morning began their ordinary session, the fifth since the party's third extraordinary congress. The opening session was attended by the chairman of the Central Committee and head of the party, who stressed the importance of this session considering the present critical and difficult national situation to which we must still find solution. This demands meticulous work in an attitude free from weakness. The head of state said:

[Begin Sassou-N'Guesso recording] Our people have been following with attention the normal operation of our institutions and ardently hope that we will not betray their trust. The important problems on our agenda include some which are obviously of a strategic nature. The conference of state enterprises prepared a document which contains the conclusions of the 7-month deliberations between our political cadres, our technicians, the workers' representatives and foreign delegates. The conference made an important recommendation: It concerns the charter of state enterprises. This charter, which will become a state law after it has been examined and adopted by the People's National Assembly, deserves all our attention. After it has become law, everyone must observe it or face the necessary penalty.

Our meeting will also examine the 1981 program. This is an opportunity for us to become more conscious of the sad reality represented by the contradiction between our needs and the means at our disposal, which are inadequate in view of our state of almost complete destitution and the present state of our resources. The 1981 program, which was named the buffer program by the party's third extraordinary congress, will prepare the launching of the Fifth National Development Plan, which we intend to discuss in the course of next year. Meanwhile, let us understand that the 1981 national budget compels us to adopt a very strict attitude. You will observe that our finances are still on a tight rope and that we must maintain a firm attitude. [end recording]

OPPOSITION MOVEMENT COMMUNIQUE--Dakar, 12 Nov (AFP)--The democratic rally for the Liberation of Equatorial Guinea (RDLGE--an opposition movement in exile) has called for an urgent meeting sponsored by the OAU in order to find a peaceful solution to the problems of Equatorial Guinea. In a communique given to AFP in Dakar, Mr Manuel Ruban Ngongo, the founder of the movement, explains that such a meeting should be held outside Equatorial Guinea and should be attended by the members of the Supreme Military Council and the members of the RDLGE. The RDLGE, which according to its founder, comprises four former parties opposed to dictator Macias Nguema's former regime, accuses the present military regime which has taken over of not making any major changes to the repressive machinery of the former government. The most basic human rights are being flouted and the arbitrary system has been maintained, the communique adds. [Text] [AB121727 Paris AFP in French 1125 GMT 12 Nov 80]

ADDIS ABABA COMMENTARY ON GROWING RELATIONS WITH PDRY

LD092022 Addis Ababa Radio in English to neighboring countries 1530 GMT 9 Nov 80 EA

[Text] In our commentary this evening, we look at relations between Ethiopia and Democratic Yemen.

Last week two items in the news illustrated the state of relations between the two countries. The minister of culture and sports affairs, Comrade Tesfaye Shewaye, had spent a week in Aden and returned Thursday [6 November] after signing a cultural agreement providing for cooperation in the fields of museums, exhibitions, the mass media and education. Comrade Tesfaye had the opportunity to discuss bilateral matters with Comrade 'Ali Nasir Muhammad, the leader of Democratic Yemen. Also on Thursday the director-general of tourism from Democratic Yemen, Comrade 'Abdullah Husayn (Musaybal), arrived in Addis Ababa for a 4-day visit to exchange experiences in the field of tourism.

These regular visits come as no surprise. In the first instance, the Ethiopian and Yemeni peoples have had a long history of communication across the Red Sea. Geographically, Ethiopia and the PDRY could almost be described as neighbors: but more significant is the progressive ideology that has brought them closer together.

Unlike many Arab states, Democratic Yemen has earlier flouted the ambiguous and anti-Ethiopian positions of the Arab League and decided to support the Ethiopian revolution. Those who know the history of the region well know how remarkable the Yemeni move was. But the DPRY went even further, and this is why many references to relations evoke the fact that the Ethiopian and the Yemeni revolutions were united in blood.

The political nature of the region itself is another factor that has demanded close links between the two countries. Democratic Yemen is bordered by Saudi Arabia and Oman, two states led by rulers who work continuously to destroy its revolution. Ethiopia has been menaced by Somalia, whose rulers at various times and in varying degrees have also done all they could to subvert and destroy the Ethiopian revolution. In a sense both revolutions have been forced to be fortresses to defend their internal achievements. This has brought them closer together.

Other issues concerning the unity of the two Yemens and the situation in Eritrea region have also demonstrated the compatibility of both governments.

The PDRY and Ethiopia in 1979 decided to set up a joint commission and agreed to cooperate in technical, scientific and economic areas, paving the way for deeper and effective ties. It is true that at this stage, since both countries are a low level of economic, scientific and technical development, miracles will not appear overnight, but it is their underdevelopment that makes such cooperation imperative. What we learn in Ethiopia we can share, and what Democratic Yemen learns through its experiences will also be available for evaluation and adapted application.

Trade is another feature that should be encouraged to grow. It is only through this cooperation, this culture of collective self-reliance, that developing countries can really move forward.

The important thing is that both governments regularly follow up the agreements signed, that they translate into action the positive impetus that has been started. All the indications show from the exchange of visits and intensified links that a relationship worth of emulation by other states in the region is flourishing between Ethiopia and Democratic Yemen.

GAMBIAN PROBLEMS REMAIN AS SENEGALESE TROOPS WITHDRAW

AB091211 Paris AFP in French 0613 GMT 9 Nov 80

[Excerpts] Banjul, 9 Nov (AFP)--After the withdrawal of the Senegalese troops, which should be completed by Sunday, Gambia still has to solve its internal problems.

Two years ago, this country did not seem susceptible to such a troubled situation, for Gambia, a little country of 11,000 square kilometers almost surrounded by Senegal, has always been a quiet country since its independence in 1965. It has no army. It has no political prisoners. Several political parties are allowed, but only two--the People's Progressive Party (29 seats) and the National Congress Party (5 seats)--are represented in parliament. The press is free and can even lampoon personalities of the regime without any risk.

Gambia's resources are not many, but they are varied. The country produces peanuts and receives many tourists coming mainly from Scandinavian countries. In recent years, black American tourists have been pouring into Gambia because of the craze for Africa created by Alex Haley's book "Roots," which traces the origins of his great grandparents to Gambia.

Like all non oil-producing African countries, Gambia suffers from the current world crisis. Agriculture is experiencing a lean period because of the drought that has hit the country, and revenue from tourism has declined because the Scandinavian countries, which are the major source of tourists, have been hit by recession.

It is within this context that the emergence in Gambia of a new kind of political opposition, different in its methods from the traditional opposition parties, should be placed.

According to several informed sources in Banjul, this opposition is not concerned about legality. They are recognized by their grafiti and vengeful t-shirts against the regime, the parliamentary opposition and foreign commercial houses, accusing them of corruption and abusive exploitation.

The Gambian authorities, for their part, assert that one of the opposition movements--the MOJA [Movement for Justice in Africa]--is collecting arms for subversive activities. That is how they justified their decision last Saturday to ban the movement, along with another hitherto unknown political formation--the Gambian Socialist Revolutionary Party--and prosecute its leader, Mr Koro Salla, and four of his followers.

In any case, this opposition disturbs the authorities. To be banned just after the severing of diplomatic relations between Gambia and Libya, according to observers in Banjul, shows that it is gaining ground among the people who are standing up more against certain corrupt Gambian leaders.

PAIGC TO PCF FESTIVITIES--PAIGC will be represented this year in the festivities of L'HUMANITE, the principal organ of the French Communist Party [PCF]. It is a large-scale political and cultural demonstration which will be held on 13 and 14 September in Paysager de la Courneuve Park in Paris. The presence of our party for the first time in the festivities of L'HUMANITE is in keeping with the long-standing relations of friendship and solidarity existing between the PAIGC and the PCF. Comrade Carlos Lopes Pereira of the party's CNG [National Committee of Guerrillas] secretariat left for Paris yesterday to take part in the festivities of the newspaper of the French communists. SWEDISH FISHING SECTOR ASSISTANCE--"The Swedish International Development Agency (SIDA) has granted Guinea-Bissau 10 million kronor (about 80,000 contos) to finance the second phase of the Bubaque small-scale fishing project over the next 3 years," Bo Hammarstrom, a SIDA representative in our country, told our newspaper. The granting of this financial assistance was conveyed to our government by a Swedish delegation which was in our country for several days and returned to Stockholm yesterday. The funds will be used principally to purchase fish transportation equipment and a sounding boat as well as equipment for a machine shop to repair fishing boat motors; they will also be used to carry on experiments in salting, drying and smoking fish. During the conversations both parties stressed the importance of this project, considered an activity for overall rural development and not that of a state fishing firm. The SIDA representative also said that his organization is not interested in isolating the project but rather in integrating it in the region as a whole. HOUPHOUET IN FULL CONTROL; PRESIDENT, PARTY CHAIRMAN

[Text] The wheel of politics has turned in Ivory Coast. As it rolled, it caused upsets in the party structures and in the political class. The Seventh Congress of the PDCI-RDA [Democratic Party of the Ivory Coast-African Democratic Rally] which met at Abidjan on 29-30 September and 1 October, in an atomsphere of great expectations, asked Houphouet-Boigny to be party chairman. Already holding the office of president of the republic, this new office gives full power to Houphouet-Boigny who came up with a clear answer to the eternal question as to his succession: "After me, those who will follow me will look for the person who has the adequate profile for assuring my succession." So, all of the structures that might sustain the image of a "possible second-in-command" have been destroyed. The secretary-general's position has been eliminated and party affairs will now be managed directly by the president, assisted by an executive bureau (nine members), an offshoot of a restricted political bureau with 32 members instead of 75. The Steering Committee likewise has lost personnel, having been reduced from 201 to 100.

This reorganization, along with a reduction in political personnel, according to the Ivorian chief of state, is intended to bring about greater efficiency. Members of the political bureau and members of the steering committee henceforth will not only exchange their titles against honors: they will effectively have to serve the party in order to provide dynamic impetus for its actions both among the urban masses and the peasant masses. The truth is that, in making this profound change, the chief of state--in addition to taking the party in hand again--wanted to put an end first of all to quarrels among individuals and then put a formal end to any belief in the irremovability of men. And the Ivorian president successfully carried off his operation by salvaging cohesion within the team of the "first hour": J.B. Mockey, Coffi Gadeau, Ekra Mathieu, Philippe Yace, Auguste Denise, Nanlo Bamba, Djibo Sounkalo, etc., all of whom are under the same pyramid, as it were, taking from the Executive Committee only the very faithful and very devoted "servants" whose election to the highest political body can create envy without disturbing harmony in interpersonal relationships.

But the two high points of this congress of the one and only Ivorian party certainly were the activity report and the program of the Ivorian chief of state as well as the massive entry of young cadres into party echelons, the political bureau, the steering committee, and positions of responsibility.

Criticisms and Self-Criticisms

Speaking for 3 hours, the Ivorian Chief Executive in great detail described the first 20 years of his country's independence to the members of the 30 foreign delegations present at Abidjan and his fellow citizens. Although he displayed legitimate pride in listing the positive effects of a spectacular development, he did not hesitate severely to criticize the shortcomings of society and to challenge the softness of the party, the failures, the rather light-hearted attitude and the desire for easy gain among certain young or old cadres. Never before had the Ivorian chief of state spoken as harshly to his people and never before had he so insistently urged them to get a hold of themselves again.

In his diagnosis of his country's development, Houphouet-Boigny did not fail to admit his mistakes and to state his guilt in all humility. This was a rather surprising attitude which only enhanced his standing in the eyes of foreign delegations and his fellow citizens.

Another surprise came from the make up of the political bureau and the steering committee. Loyal to his friends, Houphouet kept those through whom the PDCI was born in those two bodies. Of course, some of them lost the advantage of being in first place up front but nobody was kicked out, as were the "Johnny-come-lately" militants who did nothing positive and who were rejected by their rank and file. One exception was Marcel Laubouet who until then had been considered one of the men very close to the Ivorian chief of state--but he was "retired." Another Laubouet by the name of Gilles joined the political bureau and the executive committee. The newly-elected official is the son of the outgoing official. This young cadre arrived on the scene with three of his comrades, all of whom in 1969 initiated the MEECI (Movement of Students and Pupils of Ivory Coast); at a moment when the student challenge was shaking European and African universities to create trouble for the various regimes, they had rallied to the side of the PDCI-RDA. Their action was courageous. And they were rewarded for it today.

All of this reshuffling, carried out through an Ivorian-style dialogue, characterizes the first moments of a policy of democratization which the chief of state had promised his country last May.

Democratization! This word is now heard everywhere in Ivory Coast. And within the framework of a policy of wide-open approach at home by the Single Party, the Ivorians this year, within 5 months, will for the first time go to the polls five times in order democratically to select their representatives in the village or city boroughs committees, their secretaries-general for the subsections of the PDCI, their deputies, their president, and their mayors. Next December it is expected that the political face of Ivory Coast will have been profoundly altered by the massive arrival of new officials in leading positions.

In taking the initiative in carrying out this profound reorganization, President Houphouet-Boigny saved the party from the disaffection of the young members, the group of not so young (who had been kept away), and in the end he also saved Ivory Coast the trouble of having to refuse to follow the road of which Gen de Gaulle had been a victim--in other words, a revolution. That is how the Negus and the Shah of Iran had been swept away, without any consideration as to their place in history and without any regard as to the positive aspects of their actions.

Only Houphouet, a well-known historical personality, recognized as such, a catalyst in a developing Ivorian society which is beginning anxiously to wonder about its future, could have attempted such a powerful reorganization, taking the country in hand in order to provide new guidelines with assurance of being followed. After all, as far as Ivorians are concerned, is he not "the Father of his Nation" and the "Old Man?" These two terms express real affection and attachment rather than demagogy--at least outside official speeches. Knowing this, the Ivorian chief of state, skillful and politically courageous as he is, maneuvered the aspirations of the masses just right. And the wide-open approach policy now being implemented is in line with a profound desire on the part of the city dwellers as well as the people living in the villages. On their level, they know who has the right to speak in their name. And those who until now had the right to speak out were not always "their" people.

The New Challenge of Houphouet-Boigny

The Ivorian chief of state decided to open the doors of the party in order to correct this situation which had been perpetuated entirely too long by Ivorian authorities. This is a decision which he made all by himself and which was then backed up by the political bureau.

One could not fail to detect the historical character of this decision, since the notion of a single party remains rather repulsive for intellectuals, especially African ones. It is no less true that the political scientists and experts are going to have something new to study on the basis of the Ivorian experience, along with a new situation whose evolution it will be worth keeping tabs on.

Can one liberalize a singe party from the inside? And on what conditions? These are the essential questions arising from the Ivorian experience.

It has been proven historically that a single-party situation, copied from elsewhere in the European East, was never a priori the result of a popular choice. In almost all cases, these were parties which were imposed after someone had come to power by force or, in the case of most of the African countries, after the dissolution of the other competing parties shortly before or after independence, by leaders who had conquered power. That was true of Ivory Coast where several parties were fighting each other starting in 1947 and until 1956-1957. But in this country, much more easily than in other countries, the PDCI-RDA turned out to be a much more popular party (the other parties stood on an ethnic and regional base), with a leader who kept rising and so it was easy to rally men and their ideas. In 1958 likewise and even more so starting in 1960, there were opponents of the PDCI who held positions of responsibility, such as ministers, ambassadors, high officials, etc. These "rediscoveries"--in keeping with a concern for unity preached by President Houphouet-Boigny for the mobilization of all energies in the service of national construction--gave an even broader base to the PDCI-RDA which became a mass party all at once.

In starting the turn toward democratization at home, the PDCI defied political logic within the single party. It is in effect customary in a single party for the dignitaries to share positions of responsibility, and to take as their aides those militants who had provide irrefutable proof of their loyalty. In Ivory Coast, Houphouet maintains that all Ivorians belong to the party and that all of them have the right to move up to positions of responsibility--regardless of their age, their political past or that of their parents, their brand of militantism until now; the only thing that matters is the choice of the voters.

To tell the truth, the party benefitted greatly from the personal success of Houphouet-Boigny as deputy, minister, and statesman. His action is always blended with that of his party and today, when he decides to give back to the PDCI--which operated mostly from the very top of the pyramid, rather than the base--a new source of power, he can fall back on his popularity, his strength as a rallier, on the confidence which the people in all walks of life give him. And the first phases of democratization clearly showed that both young and old, management personnel, office employees, and other citizens for the most part are determined to follow the road charted for them by the "Old Man."

Party Needs Wide-Open Approach

Never before as a matter of fact has anybody seen such a manifestation of support in recent years for an initiative by the Ivorian chief of state; men and women in the villages and towns are working hard to make sure that their candidate will be elected in an election campaign environment with all of the intrigues which that implies. And the people seem to be happy; everybody now seems to have an opportunity really to participate in the life of the party and the country's political life.

Although there is no denying that the PDCI did become somewhat overblown in the sixties, the difficulty for the youngsters--who were becoming more and more numerous--in advancing to positions of responsibility had created a rather lukewarm militantism in their ranks, for the moment giving the impression that cadres and intellectuals were in the party without being totally with the party. And they chose instead to "be active" in the Rotary Club, in the Lion's Club, in the fast food chains, and other young chambers of economy, where they were able to use their competence and their spirit of initiative, of course trying to use these organizations as springboards.

This "freeze-out" of young people was not ignored by the political authorities who did not miss any opportunity to invite them to be more resolutely active side by side with the old members. But their reservations were well founded: "We get the impression that some of the old-liners are using us as a front." "Everything happens as if the party were primarily a matter for certain Ivorians and not so much a matter for all the others." "They seem to be counting it against us that we were not fighting back in 1946. But how could we have done any fighting if we were not even born yet or if we were only 5, 10, or 12 years old?" And so forth and so on.

There was no lack of accusations and counteraccusations. They simply expressed a real situation: some of the old members, because of their "heroism" in the past, did not intend any time soon to pass the torch to their younger followers who--feeling that they were being relegated to secondary roles or anonymous positions--were champing at the bit with impatience, both at the gates of political responsibilities and at the gates of responsibilities in the development sectors.

This is the difficult situation which Houphouet-Boigny, as a fighting companion or as a father of youth, wanted to correct by opening the doors of the party and presenting both "old members" and "young members" to the voters. But is the Ivorian chief of state not going even further in this operation of democratization which some of his close followers of yesterday are having trouble believing in, even after this congress?

One is tempted to think of the analysis of certain proposals by the Ivorian chief of state who drew support from those whom the masses had chosen to govern. If this assumption were to be confirmed, then the apparatus of democracy will also be a real people's tribunal.

Ivory Coast never considered it useful to judge the guilty weaknesses of certain of its officials out in public. Thus, there were no awkward civil servants who had specifically failed in the Ivorian government machine.

The People Know Everything

And public rumor, in this country which is one big glass house, can be encountered in a street in Treichville or Adjame, telling of the dishonest exploits of one or the other high civil servant, of one or the other general manager, of one or the other person whoever he or she may be who had become a powerful business operator as a result of embezzlement. The people know.

Fully aware of this situation, which revealed a continuous decline in recent years, the Ivorian president did not order severe warnings addressed to "dishonest servants even though they may be competent" until April 1977. But there was never any public punishment while some people continued plundering the state and abusing the confidence of overall authority. Some guilty individuals, whose wrongdoings had been established, were asked discreetly to return to the government what they had taken so dishonestly.

The fact remains however that many of them were left at liberty with their ill-gotten gains. They constitute a race of "newly rich" whose loud behavior irritates the little people. And the little people know how to get justice for themselves through the choice of their representatives. Those whom the people absolved certainly will be cleared by the chief of state.

Disappointed by the dishonest behavior of some of his companions of yesterday and by some of the younger members whom he had called upon to share responsibility, Houphouet--by telling everybody to go looking for popular support--seems to be asking the people to assign those men and women to him whom the people consider worthy of helping him in running the affairs of the party and the state.

The situation of the state--like the goose that laid the golden egg--cannot go on. Recent measures, public during a National Council meeting last June, began by striking at the government-owned companies, outfits which are real sinecures and bottomless pits economically speaking. Out of the 36 companies, only seven were kept going; 16 were eliminated and 13 were reorganized and converted into mixed-management companies.

Houphouet-Boigny's democratization operation is paralleled by a real program for taking Ivorian society back in hand. The important thing is to get the largest possible number of his fellow citizens interested in political life through active membership in the party. Another important thing is to rearrange the country's economic life by correcting the shortcomings of society and by spelling out new objectives for the next 5 years.

The Ivorian state can no longer afford the luxury of living "in the lap of luxury" as it had in earlier years. The time has come for major moves and austerity will be the key word at least until 1983. After that, development through agriculture will be followed by development through agriculture and petroleum. Ivorian petroleum production began recently at "Belier," off Grand-Bassam, a deposit whose discovery was announced on 18 October 1977 by the chief of state himself; by 1984-1985, Ivory Coast will be a big petroleum producer if all goes well. The deposits discovered recently back up this statement on which the government however has remained rather silent. Some comparisons--perhaps entirely too optimistic--place Ivory Coast on the same level as the biggest producers. Others are more pessimistic and speak of an output close to that of Gabon. Still other estimates place Ivorian reserves somewhere in the middle, on the same level as those of Nigeria. This year, Ivory Coast could already earn about 40 billions from its first petroleum operation; in 1981 the figure would be 200 billions and in 1982 it would be 300 billions. Although these estimates and statistics come only from semi-official sources, they do at least signify that the future of Ivorian production should not be minimized. As a matter of fact, it should be taken very seriously.

Now this agricultural country could in the next several years become a petroleum power and once again recover its growth rate of the sixties and seventies. But before that, Ivory Coast must be based on a new type of Ivorian to prevent waste and the rather light-hearted approach used during the first stage of its development. It is necessary to guarantee a second period of time during which growth efforts will really benefit all the people and all regions.

This is a first-ranking necessity if Ivory Coast wants to assure its future in the face of the challenges of the eighties which are: mastery of the different sectors of development, reduction of dependence on foreign manpower, slowdown in foreign loans, intensification of regional development policy, definition of a strict school policy, continuation and intensification of the policy of agricultural diversification and mechanization in order to reduce the flight from the land to a certain extent.

We thus find more or less new guidelines in the final general-policy resolution adopted by the recent PDCI-RDA Congress. Ivory Coast is thus aware of its weaknesses. It has done some profound thinking about them and it has drafted the strategy needed to overcome them. But between the conclusions of a congress and the practical implementation of resolutions out in the field, habit creates a wide gap. It is now only up to the Ivorians themselves to discard this old habit. Without being a model in all respects, their country will continue to be mentioned among those developing countries which have overcome their condition of underdevelopment.

BRIEFS

REAGAN'S SOUTH AFRICAN POLICY--Monrovia, 7 Nov (AFP)--Liberia should launch a campaign calling on African countries to sever diplomatic relations with the United States if there is the least sign that the Reagan administration is encouraging Pretoria's obstinate attitude. This was written on Friday by the NEW LIBERIAN, the paper of the Liberian Ministry of Information. Of course, we congratulate Mr Ronald Reagan, and we wish him well, the paper adds. But it must be underlined that Africa is watching him closely and that depending on the nature of his foreign policy, especially on the decolonization of Africa and on his internal policy toward American blacks, Africa may or may not cooperate with him. The NEW LIBERIAN, however, believes that the American president-elect might well have revised his position during the electoral campaign and might make Pretoria more reasonable, as another conservative, (British Prime Minister) Mrs Margaret Thatcher, has done for Zimbabwe. IMPORTED RICE DUTY WAIVED--The Liberian Government has waived [word indistinct] and duty fees on all imported rice into the country. According to a release from the Commerce Ministry, head of state M/Sgt Samuel K. Doe recently gave recommendations to ensure a constant and adequate supply of rice on the Liberian market. The Commerce Ministry has made a call on individuals and importers in the country to take advantage of the new policy. [Text] [AB121948 Monrovia Domestic Service in English 1900 GMT 12 Nov 80]

GOVERNMENT ISSUES COMMUNIQUES DENOUNCING FALSE RUMORS

Government Call for Vigilance

Tananarive MADAGASCAR-MATIN in French 23 Oct 80 p 1, 2

[Passages between slantlines printed in boldface]

> [Text] As a result of "rumors" propogated in recent days about the alleged "exploits" of "mutilators" [lit. "extractors of breasts or testicles"], which unhappily led to incidents the day before yesterday, 21 October, at Ankazomanga, Analakely, and Ampefiloha in the capital, causing two deaths and two injuries, the revolutionary authority published yesterday evening a long communique in which it deplores these new maneuvers of the enemies of the Revolution, and calls for vigilance by the people.
> Given the lateness of the hour when we received this communique drawn up in Malagasy, we are publishing here a quick free translation, and will publish elsewhere the full text in Malagasy.

In this period of national democratic revolution, the first step toward socialism, it is not surprising to find that the degree of ideological awareness is not the same for all Malagasy.

For their part, the enemies of the revolution, the fishers in troubled waters, those opposing the popular struggle, are trying in all possible and imaginable ways to thwart the advance of the national revolution. A tactic and strategy that one finds, moreover, in all socialist and progressive countries.

Thus we see the "dahalo" (highway brigands), cattle rustling, clandestine alcohol and drug trafficking, corruption, brushfires, sabotage to supplies, and other acts of vandalism about which the least one can say is that they are reprehensible and odious.

But let us turn rather to look more closely at the question of rumors and other manipulations to poison the masses.

"Poisoning" is nothing but a method utilized by people of evil intentions and enemies of the revolution to warp public opinion through the dissemination of false news, of lies. It is one of the methods used during the colonial era to oppress the Malagasy by making him believe in the Mpaka-fo (heart-stealers), in the Mpaka-ra (blood-suckers or vampires, the snake-man, etc...)

But none of these things was based on anything real; rather they were invented to affect and fool credulous people.

In face of the efforts made by the revolutionary authority to activate ideological formation and the political maturity of the Malagasy people as they take their destiny into their own hands, we see the enemies of the nation counterattack through poisoning and the propagation of rumors with the aim of spoiling the minds of the people in order to oppress and exploit them better. Unfortunately, these rumors have had their nefarious effects on the credulous, and this despite the warning made by the president of the republic in his speech to the nation at the beginning of the year and also on 15 June at Mahamasina.

/First Example/ It has been said in the capital, urbi et orbi, that many Malagasy soldiers died in the Seychelles, whereas there was not a single death; all of them got back to their families, to the great shame of the rumor-mongers.

/Second Example/ During the recent perturbation in hydrocarbon supplies, those who call themselves prophets in their own country proclaimed that we would get no more petroleum supplies. As soon as hydrocarbon provisioning was back to normal, they look for other ways to upset the public.

/Third Example/ Though the president clearly explained to the French journalists on Antenne-2 that there were no Soviet or foreign troops based at Diego, there are still people who insist on disseminating lies to contradict this.

/Fourth Example/ When President Ratsiraka was at Antsiranana for a few dyas' rest, everyone learned that he had received a number of foreign ambassadors. Nevertheless, some people in bad faith claimed he was in Moscow or Korea. Lies!

What is sad and regrettable is the fact that we see that despite all the explanations provided by the authorities, there still exist people who are susceptible to these techniques of poisoning, to such an extent that quite recently there have been acts of violence actually resulting in deaths.

It is good to recall, doubtless, that there are laws prohibiting the disseminations of rumors or false news. The people should not be duped or dragged into the unhealthy game of unscrupulous people.

The decentralized collectivities should also redouble their vigilance in face of the manipulations of the rumor-mongers, by freely applying the rights of each individual for his defense against any accusation that may be leveled against him, rights established in the constitution. It must be especially stressed that, in order to avoid possible trouble, it is vital to establish communications among all responsible officials at all levels, in cases of questionable events. And if there are questionable individuals, not to hesitate to bring them to the forces of order.

To conclude, we think that it is the duty of every party represented in the National Front for the Defense of the Revolution to do what is in its power to counteract rumors; and that it is also the duty of the populace to listen to the explanations supplied by officials at all levels.

It is well known that our respected president, Didier Ratsiraka, launched the proposal to make the Indian Ocean a zone of peace. If we do not watch out, the enemies of world peace will come to annihilate this great hope of many nations around the world. We learn in fact that the number of nations who favor the proposed Antananarivo conference in 1981 or early 1982 is constantly growing, and that among the latest nations to favor it are Luxembourg, the Netherlands, and Somalia.

If the shoe fits, wear it.

Public Reaction to the Communique

Tananarive MADAGASCAR-MATIN in French 24 Oct 80 pp 1, 2

> [Text] The communique of the revolutionary authority relative to the incidents of Tuesday 21 October at Ankazomanga, Ampefiloha, Analakely regarding "rumors" about what might be called "mutilators," a communique which we published yesterday in both languages, has clearly "defused" the atmosphere, especially in the capital, the above-mentioned neighborhoods of which were the theater of such incidents engendered by the poisoning maneuvers perpetrated by the enemies of the revolution.
> This communique has the merit of tidying up with a single stroke all the great problems of the hour, of supplies in general, foreign questions (Seychelles, foreign bases, etc and even including the Indian Ocean zone of peace.
> A skillfully drafted communique in which two constants are reiterated: the maneuvers of the enemies of the revolution who never lay down their arms in their unavowed design to destabliize the regime by using many stratagems, on the one hand, and on the other, the insufficient ideological and political maturity of a certain fraction of the masses which makes them vulnerable to rumors and "poison."
> Now that people have been reassured, we are in a position to recall succinctly the facts and to report what we believe to be the "objective" reactions of the man on the street, which can be summarized in these two words: "Relief" and "Vigilance."

The two successive communiques of the revolutionary authority disseminated the day before yesterday and yesterday at noon on RTM [Malagasy Radio and Television] on the mid-day "News" unequivocally denouncing the false rumors and poisoning maneuvers were favorably received in the most diverse quarters. Some of those with whom we had a short interview as we walked through the city nevertheless deplore the fact that "such very interesting clarifications were still published a bit late, for the rumors have already resulted in victims, created a certain stir damaging not only to community life but also uselessly upsetting to those for whom life is almost a daily struggle."

One middle-aged person did not hide his astonishment at the fact that the many attempts made here and there by chevroned militants to raise the consciousness of the masses have not yet had sufficient impact. "The proof," he added, "is that here are these people who let themselves be oppressed and exploited by rumors whose aims are perfectly understood: to create an atmosphere of insecurity in order to sabotage the progress of an entire people in its revolutionary struggle, despite the problems inherent in any new undertaking."

As to this female "Philo" [sic] student, she much regrets the mentality of a good number of compatriots whose quite modest degree of ideological or political awareness leaves much to be desired: "But one must nevertheless tell oneself," he continues, "that problems of supply in this or that, the almost-continual inflation are often accompanied by sagging public spirit. In my opinion, it is high time to do whatever is necessary to resolve these supply problems in order that our revolutionary objectives should not suffer."

"It's well known," a taxi driver told me, "that reactionaries on all sides were after something with this "dirty story" of so-called "testicle-removers" or breast-cutters," and I don't think it's enough just to denounce them, we should also take the measures necessary to stop their sordid maneuvers, otherwise one risks willy-nilly playing into their hands. It's a shame."

"There still remains much to do with respect to the effort to change people's ideas," says another interlocutor, "and the main thing is it must be done as quickly as possible for the sake of the country, which has undertaken a political path that is more than ambitious: to build a new society of justice and equity."

These various reflections here and there show that people recognize full well the efforts made by the revolutionary authority in the process of the socio-economic development of the country, but they nevertheless would like to see some of the problems which directly affect the masses, such as those in supplies of basic necessities to be resolved, so that "the field not be ripe for all these poisoning maneuvers aimed at thwarting the effort of an entire people to prepare for the days to come."

REORGANIZATION OF THE ECONOMY SINCE 1974

Paris LE MOIS EN AFRIQUE in French Aug-Sep 80 pp 81-97

[Article by Christian Roux: "The Refocusing and Reorganization of the Malagasy Economy since 1974"]

[Text] An economic approach with the help of indicators such as income, foreign trade, and distribution of production is insufficient in accounting for the Malagasy situation. There are as a matter of fact many risks of underestimating the capacity of the underdeveloped economies but also of extremely simplifying the situation by recommending simplistic solutions which do not sufficiently take into account the nonexplicit structures, the internal contradictions whose short-term effects are often opposed to the anticipated results (rise in purchasing power, savings, hence, accumulation, etc.). For example, savings which are not invested will progressively lead to self-sufficiency. The last two decades amply proved that it was ineffective and even dangerous to try to build the underdeveloped economies along certain development models without viewing the situation of the agrarian structures and the causes that produced that situation. The failure of industrialization in the Third World is to a great extent due to the absence of an analysis of production relations which block the agricultural revolution which is necessary and which must come prior to the development of an industry that can transform the national potential. In this respect, the example of Madagascar seems rather revealing in terms of the multiple blockages and malfunctions which triggered a self-sustained accumulation based on agriculture and whose sources to a great extent come from the remnants left over by colonialism and neocolonialism. The policy pursued over the past 5 years illustrates the specific methods visualized by the Malagasy government when it comes to refocusing and restructuring the economy on the basis of its natural, human, and structural resources.

Malfunctions and Blockages

In Madagascar, particularly, the political facts of life reveal internal tensions and external pressures which in part sprang from a clash of structures between the neocolonialist development method (export crops) and the deliberate transformations which were often government-controlled and which were undertaken since 1971 and, on the other hand, from malfunctions which are the result of an ethnic dualism that has exacerbated but is very long-standing.

The observer cannot take into account the nature of the political process underway in the Malagasy Republic since the phenomena which spring from it are both the result and the means of the policies undertaken and to be undertaken.

The Malagasy Democratic Republic is at the very heart of an area of geopolitical confrontation; this situation in the Indian Ocean does not fail to have its influence on the choice of political structures and forms of cooperation. The British disengagement from the area east of Suez, the closing of the canal between 1967 and 1975, the success of the liberation struggles in southern Africa, the American withdrawal into the Indian Ocean (Bahrein, Diego-Garcia), as well as the loss of French influence in the islands in the southwest are an illustration of the balance of power developing around the reserves of petroleum and strategic metals, along the sealanes (Suez, the Cape, Malacca). The ways in which the equilibrium was upset a short time ago can explain, for Madagascar in particular, the fluctuations in international policy and the complexity of relations with France, the USSR, China, the Arab countries (Libya, Iraq, for example).

As it happens so often in Africa, history in Madagascar, more than anywhere else, explains its difficulties, its contradictions, and its blockages which slow down the country's social-economic development and which block its dynamics.

From time to time, Madagascar (today the Malagasy Democratic Republic) emerges from oblivion and reports and accounts describe the time as it passes for a country in the midst of a crisis, characterized by permanent tensions.

The mutinies of May 1972, the constitution eliminating President Tsiranana in October 1972, the troubles in February 1973, the withdrawal from the franc zone and the OCAM (Common African, Malagasy, and Mauritian Organization); then the December 1974 coup d'etat, the assassination of Col Tatsimandrava on 11 February 1975, the election of President Ratsiraka, the referendum of 1975 (Second Malagasy Republic), the start of long-term socialist planning (until the year 2000)--all of these apparently incoherent facts for the distant observer in reality are the expression of social-economic changes as the condition necessary for the restructuring of any Malagasy production system.

The period of time briefly retraced above was rich in remarkable if not decisive events. It remains for us to figure out whether they created the conditions of irreversibility in the matter of development; I want to talk now about the switch from neocolonialism to socialism as stated by the current president, President Ratsiraka.

According to the authorities, this change was supposed to take place without any transition, almost automatically. In point of fact, a socialist-inspired constitution (submitted for a referendum on 21 December 1975) and an all-around socialist revolutionary charter cannot be sufficient to wipe out enough years of colonialism and neocolonialism which caused conflicts over divisions in this ravaged nation. This is especially true since one may well wonder what a "socialism" remote-controlled by the local dependent bourgeoisies will lead to--groups which act as sources of reinforcement of cultural values born in the dominant central country.

On top of the contradictions of an economic type, we have ethnic and cultural opposition which, if not created, in any case was made worse by the colonial power in order to strengthen its authority and firm up its domination; these conflicts still exist today in a latent form and they are always ready to interfere with the structural transformations that are necessary for the implementation of planning and above all for the agricultural reforms.

Social and economic organization was for a long time dominated by a foreign bourgeoisie[1] which, directly or indirectly, prevented the development of an integrated and autonomous national market; consequently, a "traditional" sector was maintained to make up the sector "which advanced along the lines of logic of transnational operations" (alienation of agriculture in the third world in general; read, on this subject, "Structural Change in Third World Agriculture, as a Result of Neocapitalist Developments," Jacoby, THE DEVELOPING ECONOMIES, September 1977) as well as the acceleration of agricultural growth in the underdeveloped countries as the only response to the worldwide food crisis (J. Chonchol, REVUE TIERS-MONDE, Vol XVI, No 68, 7 July 1975).

This "neocolonial" structure explains a number of recent economic and political malfunctions.

Hence the need for structural reforms in accord with a type of accumulation which demands a certain level of income concentration.

The State of the Dominant Bourgeoisie

Malagasification--which means the rise of industrial interests among the ruling classes--manifests itself above all in the expansion of the role and powers of the state within the economic system. The particular features of that power have to do with its military-technical-bureaucratic components (eight military men in the Supreme Council of the Revolution and 12 civilian ministers charged with drafting, guiding, coordinating, and supervising the functional agencies of the government).

A Military Committee for Development, emerging from the armed forces, was consulted on the entire national defense as well as economic and social development programs (Articles 12 and 14, 11 February 1975 Ordinance of the Directory).

A planning process was instituted for the past three years, following an investment code which was designed to distribute the tasks assigned to the economic agents and that process was to guarantee coherence of government action; in addition to nationalization, sector-related and selective actions in terms of economic policy over the past several years made it possible to promote processing enterprises for agricultural products, the upgrading of products, and the creation of jobs in the rural regions, including tax exemptions, tax reductions, priority allocation of foreign exchange, a quota system, etc.

The overall development strategy is based on the increase in cultivable and cultivated areas so that the economy may turn out to be sufficient in terms of food production. Since May 1978, a socialist enterprise law has been implemented; that law was supposed to be able to revive the spread of the cooperative movement on more productive bases.

In short, systematic government intervention in the organization of the economy seemed to have become necessary in order, on the one hand, to eliminate the forms of foreign dependence and to establish the institutional and economic infrastructures which were indispensable for the restoration of the balance of foreign trade and the balance of payments[2].

For almost 10 years, incredible inertia plus a flood of paperwork and formalities have been symbolizing the persistent adaptation failure of certain government agencies in handling immediate economic problems.

The first stage of the revolution (1974-1978) above all consisted in consolidating the currency, restoring the balance of trade at the risk of discouraging investments, and reorganizing the banking system on the basis of long-term (20 years) planning, made up of medium-term programs. The second phase called for the takeoff of the entire production machinery, the creation of new structures, and the development of investments that must serve industrialization and productivity (1979-1985).

The essential quantitative target for the year 2000 is the quadrupling of the gross domestic output (the sum of added values) through a major increase in the collectivization of the means of production in differentiated form (cooperatives, decentralized groupings of the "fokonolona" type, and government enterprises; the private sector should not represent any more than a puny one-third of the contribution to the makeup of the total output.

The considerable investment effort necessary calls for an appeal for foreign capital to come in and this is how a national investment fund was created at the end of 1979, financed to a great extent through the National Social Security Fund, the Retirement and Savings Funds, as well as the insurance companies and government subsidies.

After 5 years of structural reorganization, it seems that the Malagasy economy intends to open more widely toward the outside world with a view to understanding the problems of its capitalist partners. This turnabout is illustrated by all of the projects which are partly financed with foreign help (Western banks, capitalist industrial firms, etc.). These projects will permit the priority development of the lumber industry, the textile industry, the cement plants, and the utilization of mineral resources (chrome from Andriamena and iron-nickel from Moramanga). The World Bank, Canada, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, the Scandinavian banks, the Chase Manhattan Bank, and the firms of Loesche and Jeumont-Schneider are participating in these investments. The hydroelectric power plant and [as published; at] Namorona was financed primarily by Japanese firms and finance companies. Socialist financial support is relatively marginal if we overlook the free Chinese or Libyan gifts (amounting to 5 percent), military cooperation with the Soviet Union in training pilots for supersonic Mig-17 bombers. Cooperation with the socialist countries has not yet resulted in any major achievements in agriculture or industry, other than geological prospecting, agricultural machinery, a sugar refinery, and the expansion of rice cultivation.

Traditional Structures and Agrarian Reforms

The malfunctions of the production machinery demanded a recentralization of the government, accompanied by evident economic government management but at the same time the traditional cell of the Merina peasantry, the Fokonolona, was progressively reborn. This fundamental social unit had, since the 18th century, under the control of the senior leaders, regulated a strict distribution of land and income; the system of self-discipline perpetuated an unalterable universe of subsistence and local consumption which certainly represents a degree of cohesion and solidarity (Fihavanana) in a country where the concept of national unity is more myth than fact; but this community and its small territory could indeed become excessively restrictive in the light of the new speculative initiative which accompanied the agricultural innovations.

Here again is a contradiction between the need for agrarian transformations and conservative "community" structures perpetuating the cleavages of another age which most often was incompatible with the adaptation of new agricultural techniques.

Just the same, considering the problems of integration and information, the employment of this basic cell and an administrative structure, clearly situated within the hierarchy, did speed up the establishment of contacts between the central authority and a social community that was very much shut off.

The "new" emergence of the Fokonolona must be interpreted as a desire on the part of the government to provide expanded organization for the entire economic and social area since an economic committee (Vatoeka), common interest associations (Firaisam-Fokonolona) of all kinds and on all levels were added. These successive structural stepping stones permitted the democratization of the government while leaving untouched one of the fundamental components of Merina Malagasy culture.

Much however will depend on the degree to which all of the economic agents take charge of the plan.

A distinction must be made between direct production and operations which are more generally intended above all to promote social change; the former is aimed at changing the production and sales conditions while the latter attempt to promote the organization of rural extension work within the "self-managed" communities.

Technically speaking, we have, on the one hand, enterprises demanding huge investments (irrigation on the Mangoky, the Secren, etc.) and those which are more labor-oriented and which are more in line with the problems of underemployment[4].

The prevailing extensive form of agriculture here remains the system best suited for working the soil but growth demands the mastery of soil preparation and cultivation processes. Altered by exogenous colonialist phenomena, the economic structures produced intermediate anti-productive bureaucries facing a peasantry that was barely self-sufficient. The planning now in progress based on the Fokonolona is part of a complex social system which is supposed to avoid becoming the agent of domination by the MPC[5] (it develops according to the setup which still exists between the former and the controlled production methods).

Modernization and Planning

In the context of the international economy's structures in 1979, a simply modernized tropical agriculture did not offer sufficient prospects; besides, the leadership team had committed the Malagasy economy to move toward investments going all the way and it pursued a policy of going into debt (25 percent of the budget or 70 billion FMG [Malagasy francs])[7] in order to finance long-term profitable projects (interview with the president of the republic in December 1978). As in the case of Korea[6], it was necessary to promote industrial growth and to develop agricultural potentials so as to become self-sufficient.

This is the reason behind the development of 5,000 hectares of new rice fields in 1978 in order to slow imports down (5 billion FMG or more than F1 billion), the reorganization of industry toward the manufacture of semi-finished goods, and finally the rationalization of foreign trade. This is the first phase of the plan which furthermore includes control over collection and distribution circuits for the period of 1978-1984. After the infrastructure, the second phase will bring the consolidation of the socialist economy on the basis of the capital goods industry and the modernization of techniques; finally, the last phase, 1993-2000, will permit the full development of the production forces based on the export of processed agricultural products coming from a reinforced public sector.

This rather tough planning approach seems urgent and it looks especially so since--racked by contradictions, stirred by tensions of all kinds--the Malagasy economy was progressively declining. The reforms proposed, the structures established themselves will be sufficient to establish an economic balance in mechanisms that are as yet disjointed. Let us for example take the problem of rice and Malagasy tropical crops.

The rice crop, whose significance in the economy keeps declining, should yield (regarding the exported portion) to much more profitable crops, such as cocoa, coffee, cotton, or aromatic plants, and cloves). But the excessive concentration of monetary revenues produces a situation where the evolution of agriculture depends on politics and the interests of this ruling class which controls private capital and exerts a certain degree of influence of government decisions.

Some economic changes must urgently be contemplated--changes which the plan did not always clearly see; they must come before any other changes which the Malagasy people may hope for and may wish to bring about.

Agricultural Potential[8]

Agriculture: Strategic Actions

This is one of the vulnerable points of the Malagasy economy and, more precisely, we are talking here about rice which will be the main concern, as we emphasized above.

Production is advancing at rates close to 7 percent but, concerning the volume of rice sold, we have a declining trend; it would be dangerous if the volume sold were to level off at 260,000 tons whereas the minimum requirement would be 400,000 tons; the annual shortage would require very heavy imports (6-8 billion FMG).

The structural measures which would permit eliminating these shortages should be organized around several objectives.

Development of means of communication (only 19 percent of the roads are asphalted) and reorganization of supply services.

An agrarian reform must on a priority basis correct the excessive subdivision of tiny rice field plots and promote an expansion of cultivated areas (less than 5 percent of the total surface).

Increased government control over sales alone would regulate the market and would guarantee a minimum for the producers but above all would do away with the speculative prices prevailing on the parallel markets (more than 60 FMG per kilogram on the world market [as published] more than 100 FMG)[9].

A transformation of SINPA (National Agricultural Products Company) whose restrictive structures discourage the peasant who hesitates to deliver his harvest to the collectors who come from the basic rural communities (Fokonolona); this is especially necessary since his savings are hoarded because there is no possibility for him to purchase goods whose imports are subject to a quota system; the same applies furthermore to the establishment of socialist cooperatives on the 120,000 hectares of land recovered by the government as part of the agricultural reform.

The remodeling of the banking system in the rural areas is all the more necessary since it expresses a portion of the remnants of neocolonialism.

Besides, utmost disorder prevails in the agricultural production of coffee, cloves, peanuts, vanilla, tobacco, and pepper. Regarding sugar, an improvement of production techniques would increase the productivity through the indirect means of the nationalization of the sugar companies (Sosuma, Namakia) and the assumption of a majority share [partnership] (up 67 percent in the Brickaville and Nomi-Be companies (measures taken at the end of 1976 and continuing in 1977). There should also be a vigorous revival of the production of sisal, pepper plants, cotton, and tobacco[10].

The recent past points to the way not to go: the rice cultivation productivity operation in the Malagasy highlands was to permit the improvement of the supply to the cities and the constitution of savings to invest in other crops; now, many of those who most readily accepted the innovations were very small growers for whom the value of rice did not add up to the purchasing price paid by the merchants. In Sambirano (in the north), the development of coffee and cocoa production benefitted the big operators although the small rice farmers were not able to increase their output.

Overall, agricultural reorganization was aimed at the following:

The improvement of food crops which were not being produced in sufficient quantities, as well as the reorganization of distribution circuits.

(On that score, the authorities ran into considerable difficulties due to the fact that the villages were supplying themselves locally and due to the unsuitability of the administrative setup.)

Elimination of a certain number of neocolonial export crops for the sake of the more efficient utilization of resources and potentials.

Establishment of a highway and energy infrastructure[11], switch from neocolonial rules to economic and political independence--these demand necessary transitions to be concentrated in the following areas:

Food crops and extensive animal husbandry[12];

Soil fertilization;

The rural economy of the Fokonolona;

Economic anthropology.

Here are some significant figures:

The per-hectare yield for cereals increased 8 percent in 3 years (since 1976), amounting to more than 1,900 kilograms per hectare (more than the African and Asian averages).

The share of rice declined slightly in agricultural output while the share of coffee went up considerably (the share out of world production during the same time, over a period of 10 years, rose from less than 1 percent to more than 2 percent).

The wave of investments so characteristic of the eighties must be viewed parallel to the fluctuations in export earnings and the declining trend in certain items in the agricultural balance of trade, such as coffee, high-grade rice, but above all ordinary rice, sugar, zebu, meat, pepper, cocoa, and bananas.

Agricultural Products Exports

	1973-1979 Average	Maximum Fluctuations over 5 years
Coffee	55,000 t	10,000 t
Sugar	30,000 t	40,000 t
Cloves	10,000 t	20,000 t
Bananas	8,000 t	10,000 t
Meat	3,000 t	6,500 t
Pepper	3,000 t	2,500 t
Vanilla	1,000 t	1,000 t

Similar fluctuations can be reported for mineral product exports:

Chrome	Output 1978	120,000 t	1976	220,000 t
Graphite	1977	15,000 t	1975	18,000 t

Cotton output is a good example of the destabilization and reorganization of the Malagasy economy between 1973 and 1978; as a matter of fact, the per-hectare yield kept declining (2,100 kilograms in 1973 as against 1,500 kilograms in 1978), as did the output and cultivated surface areas compared to 1976 and 1977.

Slightly Industrialized Industry

For the past 2 years, Malagasy industry has been growing at a rate of more than 4 percent but certain branches, which have been in trouble for several years, illustrate the difficulties of industrial "decolonization"; here we might mention the textile industry, refining, construction materials, and lumber. The best results are encountered in the chemical industry and the food industry; apart from the major increase in chrome mining and progress in the sale of mica, the situation of the mining industry is rather mediocre due to the absence of modernization of the equipment and production methods; the underutilization of resources and underexploitation are the two dominant features in Malagasy industry.

Nationalization is offering possibilities for mastering the process of transforming structures but that is not an end in itself.

Here we might mention the example of the nationalization of the Diego-Suarez Arsenal (DCAN [Naval Construction and Naval Weapons Directorate]) which became SECREN under socially and economically irrational conditions. The abruptness of this conversion[13] had irremediable consequences upon the proper operation of this establishment which offers job opportunities and development possibilities that cannot be neglected.

This French company as a matter of fact belonged to the government which used it partly to maintain its fleet in the Indian Ocean and was converted to a general machine-building enterprise (among other things) to turn out agricultural equipment (manufacture of plowshares). It appeared rapidly that little had been done on the French side to facilitate transition in management and in connection with the training of adequate supervisory personnel. This resulted in waste, in the insufficient utilization of the technical potential rather well resembling the aberrations that result from certain technology transfers in the form of engineering.

Let us briefly recall that the resources of the subsoil are underexploited regarding chrome (90,000 tons per year) and graphite (5,000 tons per year); this mining output does not even account for 1 percent of the GNP. While coal and lignite reserves amount to 60 million and 32 million tons, respectively, the output is minute, not to say zero.

Although traditionally oriented toward processing, the industrial structures are out of balance and often concentrated (cement plants and cotton mills in particular) but the same is true of sugar refineries, oil refineries, and mills which have deteriorated as the result of a long period of incoherence and do-nothing attitude in the matter of investments for modernization.

The deficient industrial infrastructures do not permit the sufficient upgrading of intermediate consumption items.

Real nationalization was achieved prior to planning, around 1972-1973 and then in 1975.

Between June and October 1976, the business volumes of companies controlled by the government rose from 12 percent to 60 percent, from 18 percent to 33 percent in industry[14], and from 20 percent to 60 percent in April. Today, the entire banking sector is under the control of central authorities. Industrial dynamics centered on agriculture and capital goods would imply an economic policy based--with the help of government industries--on sector and selective actions in the matter of investments; difficult conversions involving the potential inherited from colonialism in the short run reduce the profitability of operations undertaken and only increase the debt burden for the next 5 years to come, at least.

This situation is all the more preoccupying since the actions undertaken only slightly contribute to the reactivation of agricultural exports because, as we saw, the essence of farm policy is primarily aimed at food production which features a small volume and which is badly sold on the domestic market (requiring mechanical processing, stockpiling, and redistribution)

Various efforts nevertheless are being planned with respect to the processing of agricultural products (instant coffee, fruit juice), the expansion of the sugar mills and the creation of new enterprises in cooperation with the PRC as well as the preparation of a soy bean cultivation plan on 200,000 hectares in the region of Tsiroanomandidy.

Underexploited Tourist Potential

This potential is important but it is deliberately underused in part[15]. A tourist development plan calls for the construction of bungalow-hotels at Tulear and Ihosy, by Novotel at Antanarivo and Nosy-Be in the northwest. Most of the coastline and the outlying islands are underused but infrastructure investments required do not permit sufficient profitability compared to other projects whose profitability and resultant effects would be greater. The undertaking now underway is based on a middle position between the excesses of Bali or the Seychelle Islands and the Albanian keep-out attitude.

This operation of course should be conducted under the control of the community as a whole within the framework of an overall plan which would coordinate the efforts to be made in the matter of equipment, infrastructure, and distribution. A controlled tourist set up would restrict the abuses in terms of imported inflation (see the case of Diego with the influx of French visitors)[15] by limiting the excessive mobilization of capital and above all the intensive and speculative exploitation of facilities which would lead to the destruction of sites and local characteristics and features (as on Bali, in the Seychelle Islands, on Ceylon, etc.). For reasons of political and economic strategy, the government seems to hesitate and be in doubt as illustrated by the original and close cooperation between Air-France and Air-Madagascar.

The Air-Madagascar Company, with more than 80 percent government capital, is 20-percent French-owned, including Air-France with 17 percent; French assistance is continued since about 30 French specialists are involved in the maintenance of the aircraft, particularly the Boeing 747. Air-France is the backer of bank loans (United States and France) and, together with Air-Madagascar, has been running three weekly flights since 3 March 1979 between Paris and Antanarivo. One of its flights is a combined flight, that is to say, the two companies share the cost and the earnings while they alternately manage the flight itself. Since that time we furthermore can detect an increase in the traffic volume averaging 18 percent since April 1979 which might be explained by an increase in contacts between the two countries (it seems mostly on the part of the Malagasy people).

With 1,300 rooms and less than 4,500 vacationers, it is possible at this time to get more than 10 percent of the foreign-exchange earnings out of the tourist market.

An efficient and restricted tourist policy in general is difficult to pursue; the choice in the matter at this time remains relatively secondary and peripheral. The risks of external influence is very great, considering the redeployment of imperialist forces in 1979; the problem of technology transfer comes up in the same terms in the situation of malfunction of the economic structure of underdeveloped countries.

Right now, tourist concentrations are very small except for Nossi-Be [as published] (northwest) (Ambatoloaka, Andilana, Amporaha) and at Antananarivo (formerly Tananarive), the capital which accounts for more than 70 percent of the tourist visits.

Methodological Reflections and Prospects

The by no means incomplete analysis of an economic structure, such as that of an underdeveloped country, creates several problems:

(a) The risk of economism which reduces the reality of phenomena to simple caricatures and eliminates the explanatory interdependence, the hold which the structures have on the country, the forms of domination and development.

(b) The risk of moralism in dealing with a different society which is disorganized as a result of decades of colonialism and at least 12 years of neocolonialism.

(c) The technocratic risk of believing that a planning apparatus is enough to solve the contradictions, to modify the economic, political, and mental structures (the ancestral fear of royal absolutism, the Nova conquests, and the increase in the powers of the Fokovolona, the village chiefs becoming civil servants, and the social-cultural domination of the Merina).

Government policy for too long had been favoring the antinational ambitions of the administrative bourgeoisie and thus threatened national cohesion.

The production structures have for entirely too long been remodeled to the benefit of foreign capital at the time of colonization and then neocolonization until 1972.

The planning and renovation of local autonomous institutions constitute the two basic supports of the Malagasy development effort; here we are on the dividing line between the centralizing Asian production method and the self-management of decentralized enterprises and communities. This makes for a difficult comparison and a rather troublesome evaluation of results and performances of the production system in terms of the exploitation of agricultural potentials with the help of a capital goods industry.

The dualism of government control over the structures involving the government as such and the economic bourgeoisie as well as the three way problem complex involving ethnic divisions, neocolonial contradictions and institutional bottlenecks determine the effectiveness of changes and our estimation of what is going on there, taking into account these constant and always latent features; this can only make us wonder about the original socialist character of this bundle of transformations undertaken.

The prospects for the operational forms of development remain yet to be devised or at least to be constructed by isolating the variables that determine change and by drawing up an inventory of the means to be used. Is it still possible on the national level to plan change in a worldwide economy revolutionized by the internationalization of production and the division of labor in the service of anonymous and transnational capital?

If the Malagasy development blueprint is original, this is not Because it is socialist but because it takes into account the transformations of capitalism on a worldwide scale; let us be careful however not to think that it will suffice to have certain means in order to attain the stated objectives; most often, they only serve minority interests, new attempts at implementing negotiated imperialism (on the Lome and GATT type, etc.), in other words, surreptitious efforts. The experience of the industrialized capitalist countries shows what use is made of plans and crises.

Some Quantitative Data

The share of the public sector between 1970 and 1978 rose from 20 percent to 70 percent of productive activities. Government control today extends to 100 percent of banking activities, 90 percent for energy, and 40 percent for industry (particularly the sugar refineries, textile industry establishments, machine-building establishments, and meat).

For an average population increase of 300,000 per year, it would be necessary to have at least 20,000 hectares of new cultivated land per year (at this time, 50 percent of the territory can be worked).

The production of vanilla,coffee, cloves, and pepper barely reached the 1973 levels.

For the 1978-1980 three-year plan, the amount of foreign aid comes to $100 million as against $50 million in 1977, whereas the gross reserves come to about $48 million.

By slowing indebtedness and investments down since 1975, the Malagasy economy sacrificed growth for the benefit of reorganization of its production machinery which must now face a relatively large population growth rate (up 3 percent per year).

CENTRAL COMMITTEE COMMUNIQUE ON SNASP ANNIVERSARY

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 11 Oct 80 p 1

[Excerpts] A communique of the Permanent Political Committee of the Central Committee of the FRELIMO Party, issued on the occasion of the fifth anniversary of the creation of SNASP [National People's Security Service], exhorts all the Mozambican citizens, all patriots, to engage in people's vigilance. The same document announces the decision of the CPP [Permanent Political Committee] to proclaim 11 October as the Day of People's Vigilance.

The communique points out the already achieved successes of the Security Service in our country, essentially due to the organized participation of the people in detecting and neutralizing enemy actions.

The document defines also the orientation that should guide the activities of the People's Vigilance Groups in this phase of struggle against underdevelopment.

Following is the full text of the communique:

Women and Men of Mozambique.

Members of the People's Vigilance Groups.

Today, 11 October, we celebrate the creation of the SNASP.

In marking this date we reaffirm the popular nature of the SNASP in defense and security of the people and the People's State. The SNASP was born from the long experience of our people's struggle in the great task of people's vigilance during the people's revolutionary war.

That is why it is a force of the people which feeds on active and aware participation of all of us, workers, peasants, revolutionary intellectuals, workers from all walks of life of our country who take upon themselves, daily, everywhere and at all times the task of intransigently defending the victories achieved by our people with so much hardship.

Women and Men of Mozambique.

Members of People's Vigilance Groups.

The victories achieved by the creation and consolidation of the People's Vigilance Groups are another unequivocal testimony of the determination of our people to continue with the Political and Organizational Offensive launched and personally led by Comrade President of the FRELIMO Party, the President of the People's Republic of Mozambique and Commander in Chief of the Defense and Security Forces, Marshal Samora Moises Machel.

Thus, in this specific phase in the history of our people, we have to increase our vigilance by maintaining a closed control against the enemy who by all means is trying to distort the sense and make meaningless the real content of the Political and Organizational Offensive.

We must guarantee that all and any attempts aimed at destroying the victories already achieved by our people and preventing the advance of our revolutionary process, will be implacably neutralized by the People's Vigilance Groups.

The People's Vigilance Groups must continue to be an instrument of defense and consolidation of our conquests and our victories.

They must be a mobilizing instrument of the entire people for the basic task of detection, denunciation and liquidation of sabotage, negligence, incompetence, red tape, carelessness, lack of discipline, banditry, corruption and immorality, arrogance, gossip and all other forms of enemy manifestation.

They must be an instrument reinforcing the ties that exist between the people and the defense and security forces.

They must increase their participation in the protection of production cooperatives, consumer cooperatives, factories, enterprises, schools and hospitals and all people's property in general.

They must increase vigilance in all communal villages, cities and communal neighborhoods.

The consolidation of organized People's Vigilance Groups is the reflection of the level of political awareness achieved in a certain neighborhood or place of work. This means that the leadership role of the party is decisive.

Therefore, the People's Vigilance Groups in coordination with the organizations of the party, the State and mass democratic organizations must make more dynamic the political study and use of the JORNAL DO POVO as the instrument for the education of the people to raise their spirit of revolutionary vigilance.

The People's Vigilance Groups must be a forge where the future members of the party are prepared.

The members of the party by their example, discipline and dedication to the cause of socialism, must constitute the most advanced detachment of this people's organization.

Women and Men of Mozambique,

Members of the People's Vigilance Groups.

The decade of the 1980's is characterized by a battle without truce against poverty, hunger, nakedness, illiteracy and obscurantism and ignorance, in sum, a battle aimed at eliminating from the Mozambican free land the inheritance of colonial society.

Because we want to eradicate underdevelopment in our country, our class enemy will not stop using, openly or covertly, methods that go from economic sabotage, ideological subversion, infiltration of agents among us, to the practice of assassinations and massacres by using organized gangs with the sole objective of trying to place obstacles on the course of our revolution and prevent our victory over underdevelopment.

In the meantime, we are sure that led by the FRELIMO Party in the struggle against our class enemy, the People's Vigilance Groups will continue to be an important instrument in the detection, denunciation and neutralization of all actions and tendencies that are aimed at creating a climate of social instability among us, endanger the power of the workers-peasant alliance, or attempt against the security of the people and the People's State.

Therefore, considering the importance and significance of the creation of SNASP, the Permanent Political Committee of the Central Committee of the FRELIMO Party has decided to proclaim 11 October as the People's Vigilance Day.

SNASP FUNCTION DISCUSSED BY SECURITY MINISTER

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 11 Oct 80 p 3

[Interview with Security Minister Jacinto Veloso on occasion of the fifth anniversary of SNASP]

[Excerpts] The minister of security of the People's Republic of Mozambique, Maj Gen Jacinto Veloso, member of the Permanent Political Committee of the Central Committee of the FRELIMO Party, granted an interview to the national media a few days ago in which he discussed the main aspects of security activity of our country, stressing especially the fundamental role played by people's vigilance in the fight against enemy action.

In the same interview--granted on the occasion of the fifth anniversary of the establishment of SNASP [National People's Security Service]--Minister Jacinto Veloso, who heads that service since its establishment, also stressed the importance of the security service work in the decade of victory over underdevelopment.

Following is the full text of the interview:

Essentially Political Work

Question: How do you characterize the working methods of the security organ?

Answer: The work of SNASP essentially is political work. It is political because it is an instrument of the political-ideological line of the FRELIMO Party. It is political because it is the defender of a state of workers and peasants, because it is the defender of the Mozambican fatherland. It is political because its roots are in the large working masses.

The methods of security action derive directly from two basic factors: On the one hand, the tradition of people's vigilance during the armed national liberation struggle, and on the other hand, the orientation line of our party and the class nature of our state. The popular nature of the FRELIMO Party--to whose leadership SNASP is subordinated--deeply marks and determines the working methods of our security organ. Work with the people is the main aspect of the work of security. Thus, it means to lead the people to assume security as their task once more, because it is the defense of their own interests, of their own victories. From the theoretical and practical points of view, this is only possible because our state is a people's state, because it is the proper instrument of the working classes for achieving their objectives. Therefore, our security organ is, in itself, an instrument at the service of the interests of the people and thus it is the people who conceived it, understand it, and support it. When the people call upon SNASP when they detect any enemy action, they use their own weapon, a weapon which belongs to them and which they take up to neutralize this enemy action.

Therefore, this is the main determining aspect of the action of our security regarding working methods. The Ministry of Security and the other defense forces are the arm of the people, they are their instruments with which to destroy the enemy.

A Parallel With Medicine

I would like to stress also that we should not forget that the security organ is made up of a system of forces, means and measures that are interrelated and dependent on each other, aimed at guaranteeing the security of the people and the people's state against the intentions of the enemy in his subversive and counter-revolutionary activity.

This system has an essentially political, preventive, prophylactic and repressive nature.

We are a preventive organ because our forces, means and measures supported by people's vigilance, form a harmonious whole with the aim of alerting and protecting the interests of the people and the People's State.

We are a prophylactic organ because our action has as its first objective a prophylactic task before applying the cure; and as the last resort, we are a repressive organ because when by means of prevention and prophylactic action we are unable to achieve our objectives, we have to repress enemy action. This means that the political, preventive, prophylactic and repressive tasks are closely linked one to the other because when we carry out political work we are warning and creating conditions to reach our objectives; when we conduct our preventive work well we are diminishing the possibilities of the enemy; when we conduct prophylactic work we are carrying out a political task and, at the same time, a preventive task, and when we have to repress, we are doing preventive and prophylactic tasks at the same time.

Action of the Vigilance Groups

Question: Mr Minister, in the context of your previous reply, could you tell us about the action of the Vigilance Groups since they were established?

Answer: The Vigilance Groups were created about 2 years ago, precisely as a basic instrument for the implementation of this concept of people's security it carrying out the directives of our party. It is through the Vigilance Groups that security becomes specifically a task of thousands and thousands of citizens, a task of the people themselves.

We can define the essential work of the Vigilance Groups in this phase on two levels: At the workplaces and at the places of residence. At the workplace level, the basic task is to guarantee that the fulfillment of the production plans is not affected by any enemy action.

At the place of residence level, the main task is to guard the peace of the residents and to watch, detect and fight crime--which is one of the important factors of social instability--in close cooperation with the defense and security forces.

Throughout the country over 300,000 citizens are actively and correctly participating and enrolled in the People's Vigilance Groups.

Question: Mr Minister, could you tell us what qualities a member of the Vigilance Group must have?

Answer: I am glad you asked this question because there is a misunderstanding concerning this matter. Many people think that to be a member of the People's Vigilance Groups it is necessary to have special qualities or abilities. This is not true. In the first place, vigilance against enemy action and crime must be a constant concern of every citizen. In the second place, every honest and patriotic worker and citizen can be a member of a People's Vigilance Group.

I would like to take this opportunity to alert against some types of action which the enemy surely will continue to try to develop against out party and state. They are:

Attempts against the lives of the leaders of our revolution, economic sabotage, espionage, attempts to ideologically mislead the young people to move them away from patriotic and socialist ideas and, in general, actions of subversion and destabilization in the attempt of preventing our people from winning the battle against underdevelopment.

The action of security of the people and the state is included in the Political and Organizational Offensive launched personally by His Excellency the President of the Republic and is the guarantee that we shall be victorious in this extended war in which we are engaged against underdevelopment, and is the guarantee that we shall build socialism in our fatherland.

IMPROVEMENT OF IDEOLOGICAL WORK IN SCHOOLS NEEDED

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 11 Oct 80 pp 1, 4

[Text] The secretary of the Central Committee for Ideological Work of the FRELIMO Party, Jorge Rebelo, led a debate yesterday afternoon on two topics concerning the relations between the leadership of the schools with the party and the OJM [Mozambique Youth Organization] and the action of the enemy in schools.

This debate is being held in the framework of the meetings of the first national school seminar which has been held in this capital since last Thursday under the leadership of Minister Graca Machel.

Concerning the first topic, the secretary of the Central Committee for Ideological Work of the FRELIMO Party recommended the creation, at the district level, of an office which will have the mission of finding a mechanism to support the enrollment of students in political work in their respective schools. This office will be made up of elements from the DTIP [Department of Party Ideological Propaganda] and the OFM, at the district level, including secretaries of the party cells in schools, teachers and elected representatives of the country and those in charge of education.

It was stated during that plenary session that the creation of this office at the district level, according to the secretary of ideological work, emerges from the need to reinforce party action in schools, which is not being felt as was desired.

As a matter of fact, it was concluded at the end of discussions that a large number of schools of our country so far have no party cells and, on the other hand, where they do exist they are inactive. This results in lack of political work, which is essential in primary and secondary schools.

The new district office, therefore, according to the orientation given by Jorge Rebelo, will collect all the problems now existing at the schools and will analyze them in depth in order to find their respective solutions. According to that leader of our party, the problems which the office in question will not be able to solve will be channeled to provincial offices and, these for their part, will refer them to the central offices if it becomes necessary.

It was also determined during the debate that the party cells in the schools that have them, do not know what is their function. The task of the cell is determined by the condition of the place where it is located. Therefore, it must create its own dynamism, which will determine the tasks it will carry out at each moment. The party cell must have its plan of action--these are the main orientations given to the party cells in the schools concerning their operations.

The Enemy Acts Only Where There Is no Organization

The topic "How the enemy acts in the schools," which has already been taken up in the form of a discussion led by members of security bodies, again received a great deal of attention by those present at the first National School Seminar.

At this time and after an exhaustive review made at yesterday's plenary session about the various incorrect attitudes found in our schools, Jorge Rebelo called attention to the need to know how to distinguish the type of incorrect manifestation in accordance with its characteristic and nature. "We cannot interpret every and any incorrect attitude as an enemy action," said that party leader.

In her speech at the meeting Minister of Education and Culture Graca Machel said that "the enemy acts only when there is no organization. The best defense against the enemy is in our organization, in the correct operation of our institutions. In sum, the secret in this case is in the hands of school directors."

FOREIGN COMPANY TO PROSPECT FOR MINERALS IN WALVIS BAY AREA

Windhoek DIE REPUBLIKEIN in Afrikaans 22 Sep 80 p 2

[Text] -- Walvis Bay -- The town council will be giving conditional support to minerals prospecting in the sand dunes between Walvis Bay and Swakopmund.

This will be done after a careful study is made of the intrusion on the dune ecology and the consequences of exploiting rutile, zircon and ilemite minerals found in the dunes.

A foreign company has requested permission from the commissioner of mining to carry out prospecting work in the dunes by drilling trial holes in the sand as far down as the ground surface. If these tests are successful and explotation of the minerals can be carried out on a profitable basis, then an application will be made for mining rights.

In reply to a question, Jan Wilken, the Walvis Bay city clerk, stated that the process of extracting minerals will result in the removal of the heavy sand leaving only the fine sand after the explotation is completed.

A mobile installation will be employed and this will provide jobs for only about 30 people.

The council is approaching this project very cautiously and will present certain conditions before exploitation takes place.

The chairman of the town's Chamber of Commerce, Werner Timke, said that if the project will have economic advantages for Walvis Bay there is no reason why it should not be permitted.

Timke will, however, put forward conditions for this in view of the fact that the dunes represent an asset for the region. The dunes here present no problems as is the case with the dunes on the southern side of the town.

Timke wants to see to it that a careful study is started on the consequences of the exploitation of minerals and the methods employed. "If sea water is employed this will be turning the dunes into salt lumps," he said. "Nature is one of the assets of the area and it must be protected."

He went on to say that organised business will be looking with interest on this development and on the advantages that this will have for the region.

Still another businessman, E. P. van Rooyen, said that Walvis Bay is already on its knees and he sees no reason why sand, which is so abundant in the region, cannot be processed.

He said that sand is one of the natural resources of the region which can bring in currency and other benefits.

Rutile and zircon are used in the manufacturing of steel and ilemite is used in the chemical industry. If the minerals can be extracted from the dunes the well known black stripes will disappear and the sand will be slightly whiter.

According to a spokesman of the security forces the terrorists attacked in two groups. A group of 30 terrorists attacked from the north while an unknown number attacked from the south. The northern group used 82 mm mortars and the southern group 60 mm mortars. Two terrorists of the northern group were wounded by the security forces. OVAMBO EDUCATION -- During the course of a news conference yesterday the chairman of the Ministerial Council, Dirk Mudge, stated that the Ministerial Council will not prescribe to the Ovambos what to do about their education. Mudge was replying to a question put to him by a newsman as to whether it was true that Pastor C. Ndjoba and others wanted to sabotage the Ovambos plan to make English the language of their instruction. "I am still waiting for information in this respect and I shall be better informed later on today." Mudge stated that the viewpoint of the Ministerial Council is that any representative authority can demand education up to a certain level. "He can do as he wishes with respect to his education. If he wants to establish it in Greek or Hebrew he can do that." Another newspaperman said that if you talk to people in Ovambo you get the impression that certain officials in Ovambo and Windhoek are manipulating education in Ovambo. To this Mudge replied that he is not going to condemn anybody until someone is found guilty. "We are not going to tell the Ovambos what to do. Here where we do have some business of ours, there is no improper interference." In answer to another question, Mudge said that the stage of development has now been reached where shortly the results in the land will soon be more visible. With regards to funds, he does not object to borrowing money for capital development. As for current costs, the country itself must be able to pay for that. KOUNTCHE REVIEWS TALKS HELD ON THREE-COUNTRY TOUR

AB131750 Niamey Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 13 Nov 80

[Text] Colonel Seyni Kountche returned to Niamey yesterday after a friendly visit to Cameroon, Nigeria and Togo. In a press conference yesterday on his trip, the head of state said: I am very much satisfied with the visit which made it possible for us to further strengthen our ties of cooperation. The discussions with the various heads of state whom he met dealt with bilateral relations. But they also surveyed the conflicts which are now posing threats to peace in Africa and in the world in general. Their main worry is the situation in Chad. It is a wound, a shame for our continent, he said with respect to the Chadian conflict.

During his press conference we first asked President Seyni Kountche to take stock of his visit to Cameroon, Nigeria and Togo.

[Begin Kountche recording] First of all, with respect to my visit to Cameroon, I have on several occasions held talks with the Cameroonian head of state, especially during the meetings of our continental organization. But this was the first time I had gone on a visit to this country. We consider Cameroon a reference country because of the various experiences and hardships it has gone through, which can serve a source of inspiration and reflection for us.

At the end of our discussions, we signed a treaty of friendship and cooperation crowned by the setting up of a joint commission. We also took the opportunity to discuss the situation of a common organization of our two countries: the Lake Chad Basin Commission, the activities of which are now at a standstill because of the events in Chad. Of course, we also discussed all issues of the region, the continent and even the world.

Since our country is located on Nigeria's doorstep, it was quite normal for us to have a stopover in that country in order to confer with its president on matters of common interest. We discussed the renewal of the contract for the supply of hydrocarbons to our country. There will be an innovation in the contract which will soon be signed. As a matter of fact, the Kaduna refinery has gone into operation. So we would prefer to obtain refined products rather than crude oil, because the refining poses problems for us. I must point out that thanks to our supplies of oil products from Nigeria, we have been able to maintain a certain price in comparison to the prices prevailing in the subregion.

In addition, within the framework of the construction of the Transaharan road, I had already sent a ministerial mission to meet the Nigerian head of state. So I reminded him of the support that Nigeria is expected to give us within the framework of OPEC, as well as within the European Economic Community, and especially at the level of the regional fund for the construction of the road axis between Zinder and Agadez, the feasibility study for which will soon be embarked upon. Implementation will be carried out not only by OPEC and the Islamic countries, but also by the European Development Fund and the regional fund. So, you can see that this falls within the framework of a multilateral undertaking. For this reason our neighboring state plays a very important role in the economy of our country.

Of course, as we did in Cameroon, we surveyed the matters of our subregion, our region, our continent and (?the world).

Lome port in Togo is a maritime link for our country. During the last few months, we have run out of stock of basic food items. This is not to be attributed to the malfunctioning of the port of Lome alone, but also to other factors. We eventually informed the (?Togolese officials) about this [few words indistinct] and this is why my visit resulted in an agreement to hold a ministerial meeting very soon in order to devise the necessary measures.

As you are aware, the Togolese president has been entrusted with a great mission within the framework of the OAU concerning peace efforts in the Chadian conflict. We are primarily concerned with this problem, and it is quite normal for us to pledge our full support to the Togolese head of state and the OAU ad hoc committee and to give him some clarifications which might be of further use to him in the search for peace. [end recording]

As everyone is aware, the African continent is the one that is most coveted because of its immense riches and economic potentials. Foreign interventions are frequent. Certain countries intervene directly or by proxy in the internal affairs of African countries for personal interests which are most often mean. In doing so, they create disputes here and there. Chad is currently a glaring example. As President Seyni Kountche put it: The Chadian conflict is no longer a dispute among Chadians. There are foreign interventions, and they are numerous.

[Begin Kountche recording] The Chadian conflict was for some time a conflict between Chadians; but it is not any longer. One wonders why the various factions continue to kill one another. In fact, foreign nations are taking part in the Chadian conflict. Unfortunately, the Chadian officials do not understand the seriousness of the situation. I cannot just mention one or two interventions in Chad; there are several interventions. Considering the possible implications and consequences, I believe that there is an urgent need to restore peace in Chad. This can be achieved within the framework of the OAU ad hoc committee, which is presided over by the Togolese head of state, only if two conditions are fulfilled--first, if the various factions that signed the Lagos accords understand the importance of their actions, and second, if all foreign intervention kindling the conflict is removed. As I have said on several occasions, I call this a shame and a wound for the African continent. [end recording]

Niger, Cameroon and Nigeria are the countries neighboring Chad. Officials of these countries have grounds to worry about developments in the conflict. This must be said clearly: There is a need for them to insure security on their borders. As the saying goes, when your neighbor's beard is on fire, you should wet yours. One may also worry about a possible internationalization of the Chadian conflict. What attitude can be adopted? Is it not possible to hold consultations and devise measures? President Kountche said yes, but only if the peace efforts being made by President Eyadema under the auspices of the OAU remain unsuccessful.

[Begin Kountche recording] Whether Cameroon, Nigeria or Niger, we are all directly affected by the Chadian conflict because of the economic and social situation that it has generated. Cameroon is most affected because of the refugees. But as I have just said, some implications and consequences are not to be ruled out. For the time being, we do not want to embark on any steps that may hamper the mission of the OAU ad hoc committee chaired by the Togolese head of state. If it fails, then we will take steps--at the level of the three countries or even at a greater level—in order to find a solution to the conflict. [end recording]

Second solution: In order to avoid the internationalization of the conflict, cannot the OAU and the United Nations be called in? That is also one solution among many others, the head of state said.

[Begin recording] At the OAU economic summit in Lagos, some countries which I do not want to name suggested that solution. [few words indistinct] It was finally rejected in accordance with the majority rule. It was a solution among many others. If the OAU eventually turned out to be helpless, that solution could be brought up again. [end recording]

The Organization of African Unity has practically used up its available resources. Neither the Lagos accords nor the sending of a pan-African neutral force solved the problem. At the Freetown meeting last July the heads of state adopted recommendations for the settlement of the Chadian conflict which can be summarized in three particular points:

1. Give a few months to a committee charged with setting up a pan-African neutral force--another pan-African neutral force;

2. Raise the necessary funds to maintain that force--several billions;

3. If these conditions are not fulfilled within a limited period of time, UN troops will be called in.

Many were sceptical about this solution because the funds needed to maintain the pan-African troops must be supplied by the OAU member states. Each state would contribute several million dollars. When one thinks of the fact that many member states are unable to pay their contributions to the OAU budget, it becomes obvious that things would be no different if these countries were asked to contribute to this fund by cutting down their national budgets.

It was thus suggested that the African countries that would send contingents to the pan-African force--namely the richest African countries--would be in charge of the logistics, and the secretariat general of the OAU would be in charge of [word indistinct].

Later, there were mediation attempts by African heads of state and calls for a cease-fire. But all this remained ineffective. Lastly, there was the Lome OAU-sponsored peace conference attended by the warring factions. The conclusions of this conference are still to be announced.

The Chadian conflict, other conflicts and foreign interventions once more bring up the issue of world security. Concerning Niger precisely, can measures be taken internally? President Kountche said: When your neighbor's hut is on fire, hurry up to protect your own.

[Begin Kountche recording] Insuring security is not only a worldwide problem, but also a continental, regional and subregional one. Uncertainty has prevailed in the world for some time, and this causes worries and preoccupation. There are hotbeds of tension here and there and the least event can spark a conflict. As far as Niger is concerned, I have on several occasions reiterated to fellow countrymen that when your neighbor's hut is on fire, you must take measures to protect your own, and that when your neighbor's beard is burning, put water on your own in order to check the damage. This is why I said a moment ago--and I say this with good reason--that there are possible implications. Certain rumors went around among our pilgrims when they were performing their religious duties. [end recording]

Certainly there is a need for security, but then the security of our economy must also be ensured. The new world economic order is not yet in sight. The north-south dialogue is becoming increasingly engulfed. That is why President Seyni Kountche and his brothers have stressed the need for African countries to join together to safeguard their economic interests by counting first of all on themselves.

[Begin recording] There is insecurity on the planet, not to mention in the world. [As heard] There is real insecurity as concerns the present and even the future of our economies in Africa. It is a pity. [few words indistinct] What the leaders of Africa did before the 1960's. But we are paying the price of living in a state of euphoria, for living above our means, and for counting only on external aid. However, this outside world on which we counted internally, if not collectively, is also facing economic problems that we all know about. In addition the [word indistinct] or the tendency to count on external aid has resulted in our incapacity to feel the need for this real solidarity.

However, we now realize that the dam that could have been built 5 years ago at a cost of 1 billion francs will now cost twice that amount to build. Cameroon and Nigeria well understand the need for African countries to pursue the interests of one another by setting up subregional and regional bodies to face up the affluent nations as far as [word indistinct] is concerned to enable us to develop as well. WELL DRILLING PROGRAM IN TORODI, TERA CANTONS BENEFICIAL

Niamey LE SAHEL in French 30 Sep 80 p 3

[Article by Issaka Garba: "A Victory Over Thirst"]

> [Text] A big step has just been taken in Torodi and Tera cantons with the completion of several drilled wells to meet the need for water in these areas. In those parts of our country where the inhabitants have daily confronted this grievous problem, it is now only a sad memory. No more traveling long distances to draw water from wells and pools, and also no more risks of illness.

The program for completing 130 drilled wells in Torodi and Tera cantons, including 55 in Torodi and 75 in Tera, at a cost of 350 million has been welcome. Eighty percent of this sum is financed by the Central Fund for Economic Cooperation (CCCE) and 20 percent by the Aid and Cooperation Fund (FAC).

In Torodi Canton, of the 55 drilled wells planned, 49 are equipped with pumps and are functioning normally, while in the Tera Arrondissement, of 75 drilled wells, the pump installations are still in progress.

It is in this arrondissement that problems are occurring--problems linked to the condition of certain easily flooded areas, or sometimes it is necessary to drill down to 50 meters before reaching water. There are difficulties of a technical order also: when a part fails, it must be replaced at the site, if it is in stock, or if not the part must be ordered. This will take 1 to 2 months.

But these difficulties will not impede the established program or the work which is continuing normally. The hydraulics minister, Dr Yahaya Tounkara, who was traveling with technicians from the OFEDES [Office of Subsoil Water] and from [the] Hydraulics [Ministry], discussed all this at the sites in order to find immediate or short-term solutions. It does not make sense to drill a well which costs about 3 million and to install a very expensive pump, only to have the people deprived of water afterwards because of a minor difficulty.

Farmer-Mechanics

To avoid this sort of situation, a very happy initiative has been taken. In each village equipped with a drilled well, a villager has been trained to repair a pump as soon as it breaks down. He stocks rapidly wearing piston rings (this is the frequent breakdown) and wrenches to disassemble the pumps. In several villages we were able to attend repair sessions carried out by these villagers. This is an inventive first for on-site training which avoids waiting for technicians in case of breakdown, especially when certain villages are known to be inaccessible during winter periods.

As he has reminded people everywhere, the minister of hydraulics, Dr Yahaya Tounkara, stressed the problem of well maintenance. The government, he said, consented to efforts to complete these wells so that the inhabitants may be free from thirst, but in return it is incumbent on these people to maintain these wells so as to prevent formation of mud around them, which brings pollution and thus illness.

At Torodi, the problem of maintenance is not very acute, to the extent that the inhabitants of the large villages have even cemented the borders of wells, while those of the distant villages have piled up stones and made enclosures around the wells. This work has been done voluntarily by the inhabitants. It is in Tera Arrondissement that this problem is worrisome because while some villagers have indeed placed stones, others have not. Nothing has been done to avoid formation of this mud which they know to be dangerous for their health.

The minister of hydraulics used the occasion to remind them that maintenance of the wells is in their own interest, because cementing the borders of the wells and digging water reservoirs will prevent them from wading in the mud and enable their animals to drink without trouble. Everywhere, the people have approved these remarks and all the village or cantonal chiefs have pledged that they will do the maintenance work.

The Water Problem Mastered

Why, moreover, should they not do this work? These same people applauded when water ran from the drilled wells. They indicated this to the hydraulics minister. Some did not think that they would be able one day to drink water of such good quality. They did not believe that a drilled well would be completed only a few meters from their villages--they who had to go long distances to get water from pools which made them sick because of the presence of Guinea worms.

With well water, there are no more problems of this type, and everybody will be taken care of since some villages have 2 to 3 wells and even more. We can cite as examples Makalondi (3 wells), Banibangou (3 wells also), and Tera, which has 7 wells.

This allows us to predict that with the water problem mastered in these regions, from now on the inhabitants are safe from thirst and certain illnesses. A wager has been made and won.

RADIO CLAIMS CARTER LOSS SETBACK FOR AFRICA

AB071005 Lagos International Service in English 1630 GMT 6 Nov 80

[Text] It is not always that the outcome of American presidential elections runs against all expectations. The total defeat of incumbent President Jimmy Carter, therefore, is the Americans revolting over recent issues that have tarnished the image of their God's own country in the eyes of the world. Jimmy Carter had made it abundantly clear during electioneering that his failure to win the state of New York would mean he would probably not be reelected. So losing in places like New York, Texas and some other big states was a clear indication that the Americans wanted a president who would throw his weight around in the true yankee feeling that this is America the great [few words indistinct].

Carter's record cannot be said to have been quite impressive. [few words indistinct] And the Americans who had been [words indistinct] by economic recession, double digit inflation rates and a tottering international image showed their aversion [few words indistinct] through their vote. It was an unfortunate irony too that Carter's fate had to be determined by Iranians because (?the loss of his votes) were foreseen as a result of the American-Iranian crisis. The equivocal conflict about the release of the American hostages showed that Iran knew that she held the trumpcard to the American elections and she was prepared to play it to her best advantage. [sentence indistinct]

But all too soon the Americans have made their choice while the issue hangs. The fact that Republican Ronald Reagan won 48 states [as heard] with 34 million votes which is 51 percent of the total American turnout is a clear indication of their indignation over Carter's image, which has been more besmirched by the hostages affair in Iran than anything else. And now that the results are known, it becomes necessary to really give the situation an objective analysis.

Jimmy Carter seemed more favored to African and other developing nations because of his all-embracing tactics. But while his forces claimed to be gaining diplomatically on the international scene, he hardly knew he was losing vantage points on the home front. Truly, Carter's defeat represents a setback to African aspirations because at least he seemed more sympathetic towards the Third World countries. He also seemed more inclined towards a better socioeconomic order. Mr Reagan on the other hand did not hide his aversion for collaterals. His main stand is that America is the first and should maintain that position no matter at what expense. A hardcore conservative, his ascendancy to the leadership of the world's most powerful nation is a thing most developing and nonaligned countries must think most seriously about. His stand on Cuba, Afghanistan and the Middle East have given peace lovers sleepless nights. Now that he is going to be in the White House for the next 4 years, one can only hope that Mr Reagan will shove his hardline nature to the background and grapple with issues that are tearing the American image asunder. He must first put his house in order, seek to repair America's stand in the Gulf and get the ayatollah to extricate the 52 hostages who have been victims of circumstances to which they could not have contributed in whatever (?way). He must also take a cue from outgoing President Carter and learn his lessons ahead of time. He can only do this by playing the American image (?safe and sure) and by ensuring that the developing countries are not trampled underfoot.

Already President Shehu Shagari as a tried and tested patriot has expressed the hope that the new Reagan administration will join in the campaign by African nations against racism, imperialism and apartheid. It is the candid wish of the majority of Nigerians, who share their president's hope, that Mr Reagan will live up to African expectations and allow the voice of Third World countries, who are principally the balance in global well-being and survival, to prevail.

Malam Mama assured all the staff of the company of the security of their job as long as they performed their duties diligently. REASONS FOR REAGAN ELECTORAL VICTORY VIEWED

AB111108 Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 5 Nov 80 p 1

[Editorial by Alioune Drame: "The Reaction"]

[Text] Every 4 years Americans elect a president. The person so elected automatically becomes the world's most powerful man whose daily actions will thereafter influence the destiny of the whole planet. That is why the race to the White House is no longer strictly an exclusively American affair. It should be of interest to citizens of every country because it affects them in one way or the other.

Ronald Reagan's election as the 40th president of the United States, beyond its history-making aspect, clearly illustrates a profound American reaction. A reaction of rejection against the loss of a world leadership which was the pride of all American and the whole new world. Ridiculed by Soviet arrogance, disgraced by the taking of hostages in Tehran, America, which was losing its prestige, slipped dangerously to a position little suiting its history, its potential and its dimension.

In choosing Reagan, therefore, Americans wanted to put an end to what they considered to be an abysmal decline and at the same time they advocated the resurrection of the great America.

From his political past as governor of California, from his personality and from the contents of his campaign platform, Ronald Reagan is incontestably a conservative, a pure product of his country. But an observer who knows him well says "he barks more than he bites." In any case, the checks and balances of power are so well established in the United States that he will have to come to terms with a moderate congress with a Democratic majority.

Drawing lessons from the failure of his predecessor, Ronald Reagan will hold seriously to fulfilling his contract. We can therefore expect a vigorous American counter-offensive to hold back the Soviet waves. To achieve this, the United States will draw on every available resource in order not to miss their return to strength and beauty.

Looking at the Republican campaign program we must fear for aid to development and for the fate of Africans still under the yoke of apartheid.

But let us leave Reagan to savor his victory before asking him questions.

SENGHOR ADAPTING PENAL CODE TO FIGHT CORRUPTION

Dakar AFRICA in French Oct 80 pp 31-33

[Article by Joel Decupper--passages between slantlines originally published in italics]

[Text] The way many Senegalese tell it, Dakar must be the capital of corruption, the seat of the worst lying, the most choice field for embezzlement. Huge fortunes (which are made there without ever being lost) arouse rumors that are so extravagant that people believed the revelations allegedly made recently by a large French daily newspaper (not known to be so well-informed) about the "Swiss" billions of several ministers.

Few people were of a mind to reflect that the Senegalese economy was simply incapable of yielding such prebends. It took time (several weeks) for the Senegalese to accept the evidence that the article attributed to LE FIGARO never existed. Just as it took the confession of a Senegalese pamphleteer before 7 judges that his sensational articles were based on nothing more than vague rumors to kill the accusations made against several important personages.

This inclination to believe most anything (most any allegation) about a compatriot raises issues of social psychiatry. It is a symptom that is all the more distrubing as the public peace can be perturbed by "revelations" which have neither the substance, nor the gravity, nor the scandalous character attributed to them either by the man in the street or by "knowledgeable people."

Senegal: An Exception

Money, naturally, as the new criterion of social success, is the villian which increasingly takes precedence over all others. Now it is obvious that the majority of the fortunes that have been made since independence were not acquired by the sweat of one's brow. Now if we look honestly at Senegal itself, as well as Black Africa as a whole (English or French speaking) we are rapidly forced to conclude that the "castles of Dakar" are nothing but maisonnettes and villas compared to the sumptuous lodgings one finds in the South.

The quick fortunes which make the small-time Senegalese wage-earner grind his teeth or turn green with envy would make the "nouveaux riches" beyond our borders smile. By scratching a bit under the surface, one would find that often Senegalese fortunes are as artificial as they are ostentatious, and that banks and other credit establishments, involved lenders on the verge of bankruptcy, are already faintly visible behind quite dubious success stories.

In reality, in Africa, Senegal still cuts the figure of a mere novice in matters of corruption, nepotism, fraud, and peculation of all kinds. And if it is true that for several years we have unfortunately observed a change for the worse in this domain, nevertheless it is far from reaching the proportions it has elsewhere. Morever, the very fact that this deterioration of morality has provoked so much agitation in Senegalese society is a tribute to a level of morality not found widely.

The Anger of Honest Citizens

But the indignation of honest citizens has more and more turned to jealousy, bitterness, rancor, and anger as it has become obvious that those who transgress the laws in various ways and enrich themselves at the expense of the state and the people, are left undistrubed. A minister who told us several years ago that he at least "slept peacefully," recently confessed, disabused, that "apparently the others sleep peacefully too." This thought expresses the state of mind of a large part of the population. More than the misdeeds themselves, it is their impunity which excites tempers to the point of poisoning public opinion, creating a malaise that by the nature of things is in part politicized.

The opposition has certainly not lacked for irregularities and abuses to recount, both those which the democracy established by President Senghor was able to uncover and those denounced by the Abdou Diouf government. Why didn't the authorities go to the logical conclusion of their actions by punishing those responsible? Whether we speak of economic operators whose success is a gaudy as it is mysterious, or functionaries and customs officials living in a style incompatible with their salaries, or of import of furniture or gadgets as poorly justified as they are onerous for the state, of rigged tender offers, of market scandals, of unethical favors, or of monopolies and profits portioned out abnormally--the public was never informed of sanctions, except in a few special cases, such as the weighers with ONCAD [National Office of Cooperation and Assistance for Development]. Merely scapegoats, people will say.

But the authorities were indeed determined to enforce sanctions, as witness the intense activity of the state inspectors corps and the decisions of the court of budgetary discipline published regularly in the official gazette--even if the sentences themselves were light, in accordance with the quite African mildness of the judges. And, too, Senegal is a country ruled by laws, where circumstantial evidence alone is not enough to warrant punishment. There must be proof. Now if one can prove the diversion of public revenues, the proof homes in on matters of corruption. And this latter is precisely what is at the origin of nearly all of the abuses observed in recent years.

A New Offense

This is why the chief of state has decided to adapt the penal code to the particularities of a young country in brutal confrontation with modernism, and with all that goes with it in terms of alienation from traditional morality, and a country so inadequately structured and armed to inhibit and reduce the excesses. The result is the creation of a new violation: /unjustified enrichment./ The decision--one suspects--was not taken lightly by the humanistic president. He gathered around himself the most enlightened counsel, in this case that of the highest magistrates in the country. The bill establishing this new violation was drawn up by them under the direction of the Procurator of the Supreme Court himself. It has just been approved by this court and is presently being reviewed at the level of the council of ministers.

It could be said that this bill aroused some opposition, but one can be confident that, as President Senghor and his prime minister have said, it will be submitted soon to a vote of the national assembly. The latter will not fail to adopt a text which will be a forceful finale in the work of economic recovery undertaken by the prime minister.

The violation that the deputies are going to insert--one must hope--into the penal code will have occurred whenever a person whose "life style" and patrimony are manifestly above his legal income, summoned by the competent authorities, is unable to prove that their origin is above-board. The crime of unjustified enrichment thus established will be punishable by sentence of imprisonment for from 2 to 10 years and by a fine equal to the total of the enrichment.

To Break the Silence of Offenders

Aside from this provision, the bill provides that persons who disclose, before judicial proceedings have been undertaken, the deeds committed by an indicted individual, will not themselves be prosecuted, unless they themselves initiated the corruption. This measure, which probably was inspired by American legislation, aims at weakening the link between corruptor from the corrupted, and at breaking the silence of offenders. Courts will even be authorized to provide the person exempted from prosecution a restitution for his losses, or compensation.

Finally, by virtue of new provisions, professional secrets will not be allowed to stand in the way of officers of the judicial police and of agents of the board of imposts acting in the framework of preliminary investigations pursued on instructions from the procurator of the republic for searching out and proving the offense of unjustified enrichment.

A Flood of Criticism

Senegal would not be Senegal if such a proposal did not give rise to a flood of criticism, both from honest citizens who should be the beneficiaries and from the opposition which reproached the government for doing nothing against offenders. We do not [even] mention the multitudes of businessmen and other habitual beneficiaries of kickbacks or commissions, whose watering holes will be be dried up.

Some say that this is an attack against personal freedoms, that it attacks certain vested rights and even certain principles which constitute the foundation of the laws of society. In reply, one must recall that corruption, the diversion of public monies, and more generally unjustified enrichment constitute an insidious evil, a fearful scourage that creates injustice, mocks individual liberties and the laws of society, paralyzes the development of the country, and in the long run can undermine democracy, leading toward anarchy and dictatorhsip.

Others will maintain that this new law could become a special tool in the hands of the government and be bent toward intimidation, pressure, and extortion.

The Maximum of Precautions

To avoid this, we understand, it would be provided that the public prosecutor at the trial court level, and he alone, would be empowered to make the decision to launch preliminary investigations. He would take this step on the basis of accusations, perhaps on public rumor, too obvious signs of external wealth, press articles...These investigations would at first be semi-official and would allow suspects to defend themselves without any damage to their reputation. A person would only be required to prove the lawful origin of his wealth and income when the public ministry has by preliminary investigations put together serious and mutually supportive indications. This procedure having been concluded, and only then, the prosecutor could charge the accused, and the judges pronounce on their guilt after being thoroughly convinced. As to the officers of the judicial police, they will only be able to act on the request of the prosecutor, which will eliminate the risk of invasions of private life.

Those who will object that this bill violates the principle of non-retroactivity in penal laws inscribed in the constitution will note that if in many cases the offense has already been committed, it will not be [considered] proven until [there are actions committed] after the entry into force of the law.

Similarly, those who consider that the elimination of the professional secret will be an attack on individual liberties can be assured that exceptions to the rule of [respecting] professional secrecy will be dependent on precise instructions from the procurator of the republic and limited to investigation and proof only of the offense of unjustified enrichment.

Scoffers will find in this new statute an admission of the weakness of the regime and its inability to utilize the arsenal of laws already at its disposal. They will see in it an attempt by the authorities to escape from the precise responsibilities which they already have both the human and institutional resources to discharge.

No Other Solution

We have already said that it was often practically impossible to put together the elements of proof in matters of corruption. As to the enrichment which results from it, only the tax agents presently have a right to intervene, but this is [only] for the imposition of taxes, not for the investigation of causes. Professional secrecy forbids them, in principle, from revealing what they were able to discover in the course of their investigations. Finally, and above all, tax inspectors are chosen for their technical competence and not on the basis of integrity that has been tested. Young for the most part, they are poorly prepared to deal with the powerful men of the regime or with financial lords. Must one pursue the point? It is well known what pressure can be wielded by families, what authority by religious leaders.

In face of the problem of creating a special unit, the authorities seem to have opted for entrusting enforcement to the judicial apparatus.

No one could impugn the integrity of the magistrates, but a certain collegiality at the decision-making level just might be helpful in holding at the gate the play of pressure, intimidation, or overly-strong ties.

A Courageous and Wise Action

Taken as a piece, this law is in some respects a special exception, like those usually written by new, even revolutionary, regimes. Really, it is rare for a regime already established to prose this kind of law which runs the risk of disturbing the internal administrative and regulatory structure which the regime itself set up, as well as in associated economic sectors.

At the top, the privilieged class for whom this law will constitute a threat, or at least an impediment, a fetter; at the bottom, activists and other individuals of the Party /anxious to go even further than the law proposed./ President Senghor had to have what we will call in familiar but respectful terms a hell of a lot of courage to seize this tentacled monster by the throat. All is not lost when it is the "old ones" themselves in our Africa who set the example in audacity, lucidity, and forcefulness, in the necessary reconversions.

A Word To the Wise

The political motivations of the move are eficent, but the public also aspires, and the word is really too tame, for a return to order that will permit Senegalese society to regain its self-respect and pride. If the elected representatives of the people were not to join hands with the leader of the nation in fulfilling this task, beware that others do not take the responsibility on their own and in more shattering conditions. People with short memories need not even make an effort to remember. They have only to open their eyes and ears on present reality in the Third World.

STEVENS COMMENTS ON UK VISIT, RECEIVES ENVOYS

AB112109 Freetown Domestic Service in English 2000 GMT 11 Nov 80

[Excerpts] The president, Sir Siaka Stevens, today described present relations between Sierra Leone and Britain as very cordial. Speaking at a formal welcoming ceremony at the State House on his return home after an official visit to Britain, Sir Siaka Stevens recalled that prior to the visit, relations between the two countries had been at a very low ebb. He gave the assurance that Sierra Leone would do everything possible to maintain this restored friendship.

The president disclosed that the British Government has offered a 3.5 million pound development aid to Sierra Leone, which he said would be used to the benefit of the country.

As OAU chairman he said he had kept in constant touch with all the African leaders on problems confronting the continent, especially the refugee problem, the Chad conflict, the Iran-Iraq war and the Ugandan elections. He announced that representatives will be sent to Uganda in December to monitor the forthcoming elections. On the Western Sahara issue he said a solution is being worked out along the lines of the recent discussions in Freetown. Sir Siaka Stevens observed that all of us, as members of a society have a common interest but advised that whatever such interests are, they must seek the interests of the nation first. The head of state warned traders that if they increase the prices of their commodities, the tendency would be to create confusion, and in the final analysis everyone suffers.

Later in the day a special envoy of the UN Secretary General, Mr (Abi Farah), and a UN senior political adviser, Mr (Omed), briefed Sir Siaka Stevens in his capacity as chairman of the OAU on the outcome of recent talks held in Pretoria between the United Nations and the South African Government on the question of Namibia in October last. The UN team is part of a similar briefing mission now being undertaken by the United Nations commissioner for Namibia, Mr (Ahtisari), to leaders of frontline states in southern Africa. The team leaves tomorrow for Nigeria on a similar mission. At the session were the minister of foreign affairs, Dr Abdulai Conteh, who introduced the delegates, and the minister of information and broadcasting, Dr I. M. Fofanah.

It was a very busy day for the head of state as he again received another envoy, this time representing the Palestine Liberation Organization leader, Yasir 'Arafat. Accompanied by Foreign Minister Dr Abdulai Conteh, the envoy, Mr (Sarmani), head of the African Bureau, handed to Sir Siaka Stevens a note from his leader requesting him as OAU chairman to intervene in the Gulf war and use his good offices toward achieving a speedy and peaceful end of the conflict. President Siaka Stevens assured the envoy that both as OAU chairman and president of a Third World country he would do all in his power to assist in the current peace efforts in the Gulf war dispute.

TRIBALISM VIEWED AS ENEMY'S BEST TOOL

Mogadishu HEEGAN in English 24 Oct 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Renewed Faith"]

[Text] Jaalle Siad has declared a state of emergency and has assumed extraordinary powers. The present constitution confers upon the President the power to take such a step. Internal and external conditions have necessitated the promulgation of the present emergency law which summed would have meant loss of independence and sovereignty. Such was the situation that existed before the advent of our Revolution on October 21st, 1969, when our armed forces intervened and assumed power to save the nation from the imminent ruin it was confronted with.

Continued Abyssinian aggression against the SDR and its consequences are the dominant feature of the present crisis with which our Revolution is preparing to grapple. Coupled with this are internal problems that have been created by local reaction. While these can be cited as being nepotism and favouritism and corruption, they are all allied to tribalism, the arch-enemy of the Somali people, and the most convenient tool for all our adversaries. For it is only by dividing our people that our enemies can attain their ends of dominating and exploiting us and of eventually obliterating our existence as a nation.

Thus the present state of emergency is aimed at preserving our hard-won freedom and independence, for which we have been struggling for many years and on which our very survival depends. It could not have come at a better time, because for some time now the need to stem the tide has been apparent.

The present law will certainly drive away all despondency and the present sense of helplessness. And by restoring faith in their own destiny, our people will once more be galvanized into action and march foreward, as united and as impregrable as ever.

'DAILY NEWS' REVIEWS SITUATION IN UGANDA

LD071352 Dar es Salaam Radio in English to Central and Southern Africa 0400 GMT 7 Nov 80 EA

[Article from the "Editorial Review" Program]

[Text] The DAILY NEWS today comments on the situation in Uganda. It writes that the DAILY NEWS today comments on the situation in Uganda. It writes that the situation in Uganda has not pleased many and in particular those who reaped personal benefits from the ousted dictatorial regime. It is these people who are opposed to democracy in that country. And all this is happening at a time when the people of Uganda have clearly stated that they are going to have free and fair elections, leading to a popular elected government.

The paper points out that Uganda is a sovereign state. It is not a colony. Therefore, the responsibility for and participation in the politics of that country is that of the people of Uganda.

Some neighboring countries are dictating terms to the people of Uganda. They are saying that there can be no free and fair elections in the country until all foreign troops have been withdrawn.

This is a reference to the Tanzanian troops in Uganda, that are there at the request of the successive governments. They are in Uganda helping out with the security problem and in training the new Uganda army.

The DAILY NEWS says Tanzania is not asking for credit from any neighboring country, some of which are either being sustained by or harbor foreign troops for no peaceful purposes. They are abetting aggression.

But one thing should be made clear. Tanzania does not believe that it would be wise to pull out her troops from Uganda before they accomplish the responsibility they undertook at the request of the people of Uganda.

The Uganda military commission is serious about returning to law and order, creating an effective administration throughout the country and holding elections before the end of this year. The paper points out that there has been a great improvement in the security situation in Uganda.

It is for this reason that political parties are campaigning for the forthcoming elections. Whatever trouble there is, it is not too far different from some of the countries opposed to democracy in Uganda.

The paper believes that Ugandans are reasonably capable of holding free and fair elections if only ill-intentioned neighbors can shut up and come out in support of a people that is serious about democracy.

Let Ugandan detractors come to their senses and be advised that those who live in glass houses should not throw stones.

OBOTE ADDRESS TO UPC CONFERENCE REPORTED

LD071346 Kampala Domestic Service in English 0400 GMT 7 Nov 80 EA

[Excerpt] The president of the Uganda People's Congress, [UPC] and former president of Uganda, Dr Apolo Milton Obote, has said that the UPC manifesto is a document for unity and dignity.

Addressing the closing session of the UPC annual delegates conference at the international conference center in Kampala, Dr Obote said tha UPC is genuine and sincere in all the promises made in the manifesto.

The party president observed that UPC, which led the liberation struggle against the fascist regime of Idi Amin, is the only party which will provide Uganda with an effective government, adding that UPC is back in Uganda firmly against its detractors wish that it would never rise again. [sentence as heard]

During the liberation war, especially when the war advanced toward Kampala, he said, very many people expected the UPC to form a government. Dr Obote noted that, during the UNLF government of Professor Lule, men who had been poor in exile, within 68 days had become multimillionaires. He revealed that when UPC was in government, we never sent money abroad, as was the case with Lule government.

He said that the Lule government was essentially a Democratic Party [DP] government because its leader, Professor Lule, has been a member of DP for 20 years. He said that the present sufferings of the people of Uganda are partly caused by Professor Lule and Binaisa, who provided ineffective governments. The UPC leader explained that the wealth of a country is not determined by the amount of money in circulation in the country.

Dr Obote promised the country that after the elections, if voted to power, the UPC will provide an effective government which will deal squarely with the present ills in the country, as stipulated in the UPC 1980 election manifesto.

He said that since 1971 the local press, the East African press and the Western press had been saying that Obote was very unpopular in Uganda. He said that the 10 December elections will prove to the contrary when UPC wins elections with a landslide majority.

He said that at this critical time of reconstruction and rehabilitation, Uganda cannot afford governments of experiments, and appealed to all Ugandans to vote UPC, which had been tested before.

BRIEFS

DEMOCRATIC PARTY LEADERS' WARNING--The Democratic Party president general, Mr Paul Semwogerere, has appealed to members of the security forces not to allow individuals to manipulate them. Addressing a public rally at the city square in Kampala, Mr Semwogerere encouraged them to join political parties of their choice but to remain professional and impartial while on duty. He added that a DP government cannot victimize any member of the security forces because of his political belief. Mr Semwogerere further told all Ugandans to consider themselves as children of God and prevent the creation of any other dictator in Uganda. He said a government which is undemocratic will help political turmoil, and eventually killings of innocent citizens which do not exempt even security men. He said his party, since its birth over 30 years ago, believes in solving national problems democratically. He said a leader who does not seek the mandate of the people is undemocratic and a dictator. The rally was also addressed by the party vice president general, Mr Teberio Okenyi, who appealed to the government to do more to solve the problem of insecurity in the country. KAMPALA DEATHS, UGANDAN REFUGEES--At least 600 persons were killed in Kampala in various armed attacks during October, according to a 1 November report. This figure includes only the bodies registered at the morgue and at the central hospital and does not count those at three other hospitals and at the private clinics in the Ugandan capital. In another connection, more than 15,000 Ugandans took refuge in the southern part of Sudan after the recent armed attacks in northern Uganda according to an official communique from Khartoum bringing the number of Ugandan refugees in Sudan to more than 50,000. CEAO'S STRENGTH, WEAKNESS VIEWED

London WEST AFRICA in English 3 Nov 80 p 2160

[Text] It is a bond that is not necessarily borne out of profound affection. Relations between CEAO members have often been marred by suspicions: Ivory Coast has tended to feel that it has given too much and not had enough in return and has therefore baulked at some of its commitments; Mali and Niger are reluctant to participate in the defence and non-aggression agreements as enthusiastically as Senegal.

Rather, as this latest Heads of State summit has shown, these countries need each other because of their economic plight. Not even Niger, with all its uranium, has escaped the bitter feeling of disappointment about which the Ivorians have talked so much recently, when commodity prices fall and national development projects suffer.

One hopes that people have paid heed to President Senghor's sincere call for more co-operation between CEAO and ECOWAS. Whereas comments of a similar type have been made in the past they have usually been too impregnated with the diplomatic niceties that relations between such organisations demand. In this case, however, there is a marked difference. President Senghor's was a plea for the whole of West Africa. It was also a plea to Nigeria, which is the cornerstone of ECOWAS. If dependence on foreign assistance has to be reduced, as the CEAO leaders have said, then integration is an essential first step.

THE LATEST summit of the CEAO, the Francophone West African economic community, in Niamey has pointed to both the strengths and the weaknesses of the organisation.

Once again, it is worth repeating that this is perhaps the most advanced regional organisation on the continent. It is a linguistic community — in government, at least; it is territorially contiguous; its member states bear the same powerful imprint of their French colonial past: they have close ties with France today and most important of all they are all linked to the franc zone.

This has permitted a modest, but nonetheless impressive customs union which will eventually be of great value to the members' industrialisation policies (see West Africa, October 27, 1980). The list of projects and regional institutions to be set up over the next few years is an indication of the confidence the member states have in each other.

ASSOCIATION OF EAST AFRICA PORTS OPENS MEETING IN MAPUTO

Member Countries Listed

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 6 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] Opening today in the Mozambican capital is the eighth annual meeting of the Association of East Africa Ports (PMAEA). As of the end of the week, the eight member countries--Ethiopia, Madagascar, Mozambique, Kenya, the Seychelles, Somalia, Sudan, and Tanzania--had confirmed that they would attend.

Malawi, Uganda, Djibouti, and the Comoros will also attend as invited guests.

As far as the presence of international institutions is concerned, the following had announced their participation as of yesterday: the IAPH (International Association of Ports and Harbors), the ECA (Economic Commission for Africa), the World Bank, the ESAMI [expansion unknown] (a training institution based in Tanzania), and UNCTAD. Those international organizations will participate by sending speakers.

Under its bylaws, the PMAEA permits membership by countries and institutions linked to port activity in the African hinterland and the East African region if they use the ports of countries already belonging to the association. The following are therefore eligible to apply for membership: Botswana, Lesotho, Swaziland, Malawi, Zambia, Zimbabwe, Burundi, Rwanda, Uganda, the Comoro Islands, Djibouti, and Mauritius.

During the meeting in Maputo, the participants will analyze the association's activity during the past year and discuss specific matters through working groups. As in other annual meetings, the exchange of experiences is to include the sectors of statistics, management, and training.

A joint training school does not yet exist, and from what the AIM [MOZAMBIQUE INFORMATION AGENCY] was able to learn, the establishment of such a school is not foreseen for the moment. But there are port training schools in some of the association's member countries, and one of the actions in view consists of sending workers from the various countries to those schools under UN programs or on grants. There is also the prospect of training port workers in technologically more advanced schools in that field. It is expected that scholarships for that purpose will be granted by international bodies.

The meeting in Maputo will end on 11 October, and the Mozambican delegation will be headed by Subhaschandra Balf, national director of ports and land transport.

Unity Stressed

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 7 Oct 80 p 1

[Excerpt] "The weapon of the poor is unity, and we are determined to defend unity within our association." So said Alcantara Santos, minister of ports and land transport of the RPM [People's Republic of Mozambique], as he presided yesterday afternoon in Maputo over the opening of the eighth annual meeting of the Association of East Africa Ports.

Immediately following the formal opening of the meeting, the work of that association's eighth annual meeting began with presentation of the agenda by Chairman Peter Kinyanjui. At his side were the representatives of Somalia and Ethiopia, respectively deputy chairman and secretary general.

Also during the first work session, membership in the association was applied for by the representatives of the Federal Republic of the Comoros and the Republic of Djibouti. With the addition of those two countries, whose membership was approved by acclamation, 10 countries are now members of the Association of East Africa Ports.

For their part, the delegates from the Republic of Malawi, who were participating for the first time and as observers, expressed their interest in becoming members of the association. They emphasized, however, that the final decision as to their entry into the PMAEA would be made later by their country's government.

The establishment of a permanent secretariat for the PMAEA is one of the important matters to be debated during the meeting that began yesterday in the Mozambican capital.

Discussing the position of our country's government on maritime activity in this region of the African continent, the Mozambican minister of ports and land transport was to say that the RPM pursues a policy of peace and unity in the region of which it is a part and that that policy reflects the aspirations of our people.

Minister Alcantara Santos emphasized that in the field of our maritime activity, we defend the Indian Ocean as a denuclearized zone of peace, support all actions against pollution of the sea, and grant free access and right of transit in our ports for peaceful purposes.

On the question of unity as a basic condition for achieving the objectives advocated by the Association of East Africa Ports, the minister of ports and land transport said, "We struggle for unity among the countries in this region, a unity based on economic complementarity, mutual respect, and the search for mutually advantageous solutions."

He also said that the winning of independence by the people of Zimbabwe has laid a great responsibility on our infrastructures, specifically our ports.

On the same subject, Alcantara Santos added that in order to achieve a high level of efficiency in implementing the new objectives, the nine countries in southern Africa having majority governments have set up in Maputo a special commission on transport and communications.

Chairman Interviewed

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 8 Oct 80 p 3

[Interview by Mozambican reporters with PMAEA Chairman Peter Kinyanjui]

> [Excerpt] In an interview with Mozambican reporters, Peter Kinyanjui, chairman of the PMAEA, said that the development of relations of cooperation among the member countries of the PMAEA, particularly in the areas of personnel training and port operation, constitutes one of the main issues being debated during the eighth annual meeting now underway in the capital of the RPM. Establishment of a permanent secretariat for the association is another key point on the agenda for the eighth annual meeting.

Question: Mr Chairman, we would like to know which major issues will be discussed at the meeting in Maputo.

Peter Kinyanjui: In this meeting, we will discuss our association's future as it concerns the question of technical cooperation in the areas of personnel training and port operation among the PMAEA's member countries. We are developing countries, and I believe that we face common problems. That is why, in this meeting, we are going to discuss those common issues. We will also have the opportunity to elect officers for the association, some of them for a 2-year period, and I believe that as far as possible, those officers will be elected under a rotating system so that every member country will participate fully in the association's activity.

Question: What are the main tasks of the Association of East Africa Ports?

Peter Kinyanjui: The PMAEA's basic task is to organize and coordinate cooperation in port management among the countries in this region. It organizes the annual conferences at which we analyze and discuss questions related to port management in this region of the African continent.

Landlocked Countries Can Become PMAEA Members

Question: Is there also room in the PMAEA for countries that do not have an outlet to the sea?

Peter Kinyanjui: I am glad you asked that question, because the countries without access to the sea have an important role to play in our association. That is why we allow landlocked countries in this region to participate as full members. This is because even though they have no ocean ports themselves, they use the ports of this region.

Question: According to your speech at the opening session of this meeting, a few problems exist in connection with the payment of assessments by member countries. How serious is the situation?

Peter Kinyanjui: It is true that we are having problems with the payment of assessments by our member countries, but I personally feel that no country is unaware of its duty to pay those assessments. Often, however, exchange problems arise--the transfer of money from one country to another--and I do not know how this can be resolved.

If, for example, a country wants to transfer money to another country, it cannot do so directly, but must do so through U.S. banks or European banks.

As you can see from that example, we do in fact have problems with the transfer of money, but as our association grows and becomes more capable, I believe that we will be able to solve this problem.

Immediate Tasks for Permanent Secretariat

Question: Has anyone already offered to provide a home for the PMAEA Permanent Secretariat that will be organized during this meeting?

Peter Kinyanjui: So far, no. Until now our secretariat's headquarters have been in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, but we do not have organized offices in that country.

Because of that, we now feel that we must establish a permanent secretariat, and during this conference we are going to invite the delegates from the member countries to offer the permanent secretariat a home.

As I said in my initial speech, the host country for the secretariat will have to provide offices properly equipped with the indispensable conveniences--for example, telephones and telex--and we will be responsible for recruiting the support personnel. That personnel will include an assistant secretary general, who will be a full-time officer, a permanent secretary and, probably, a liaison officer. Initially, we will have a group of three persons for running the permanent secretariat.

Question: In addition to the normal duties of the permanent secretariat, what are its immediate tasks?

Peter Kinyanjui: The main immediate tasks include the identification of specific areas for study. For example, there is already one--that of harmonizing statistics. At the moment, port authorities in Mozambique use a statistical methodology differing from that used in the ports of Dar-es-Salaam, Mombasa, Ethiopia, and so on.

Because of that, we have decided to study a way of harmonizing the statistical process, and I can say that the United Nations, through its specialized agency, UNCTAD, has been supporting and in fact is financing that study. Once that study is completed, I hope that it will constitute the start of other similar studies, specifically on questions of port operations and their harmonization in this region.

DISCUSSION ON SOUTHERN AFRICA'S MIGRATORY LABOR REVIEWED

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 23, 24 Oct 80

[Article: "Exporting of Labor to the SA Mines"]

[23 Oct 80, pp 3, 7]

[Excerpts] Every year, tens of thousands of workers from nearly all over Southern Africa head for South Africa, where they sell their work force, especially in the mines. If we were to reckon the value of this immense drain of work force that has lasted over eight decades, we would certainly be faced with an astronomical resource. We would, to a great extent, be confronted with the size of the gap that exists between the level of economic development in South Africa in comparison with that of the countries supplying that labor.

Mozambique occupies the status of the heart in this vast labor market, which is like the circulatory system of the economic body of this part of Africa, and which feeds the leading sector of South African industry. Since the beginning of this century, our country has provided virtually as many work contracts as all the other nations combined.

This crisis once again attests to the fact that the role of supplier of services reserved for Mozambique has become subject to the crises in the South African economy and to the economic and political strategies and whims of its ruling class.

Although perhaps not so serious, the situation is more or less the same in the other countries of Southern Africa.

With their economies distorted as a result of a colonial past and a state of dependence in relation to South Africa, all the nations of the region find it impossible to stop this migration promptly. On the contrary, even here they have witnessed, helplessly, the degrading working conditions to which their citizens are subjected in the by now notorious "compounds" in the mining complexes.

Associating the recent meeting in Mbabane with the effort that is being made by the countries hurt by the consequences of the migratory labor system with workers going to South Africa was a predominant topic at the meeting with Minister Teodata Hunguana. Major steps have already been taken between the meetings in Maseru, in Lesotho, during 1977 and the one being held now in Mbabane. In April 1978, at a meeting in Lusaka, delegations from Mozambique, Lesotho, Botswana, Swaziland and Angola, as well as Ethiopia, Kenya, Madagascar, Somalia, Tanzania and Zambia, and from the liberation movements of Southern Africa, approved the "Charter of Rights of Emigrant Workers From Southern Africa."

In addition to this important document, another decision made since that time has brought about action by the countries hurt by the intervention of the South African economy in the region, forcing them to export their labor at a low price and under degrading working conditions or else, as an alternative, keeping them in a state of unemployment.

This involved the creation of SALC (Southern African Labour Commission). Minister Teodato Hunguana explained: "It is an entity which will make it possible for the countries supplying South Africa with labor to deal with all the problems related to migratory labor. Its main objective was established as the elimination of the present system of migratory labor for the South African mines."

The Lusaka meeting was followed by a meeting in Gaberone, held in January of this year, at which SALC was officially established.

At the current meeting in Mbabane, where for the first time all the countries involved in this problem are represented on the ministerial level, and also for the first time, there is a delegation from Zimbabwe present, the participating delegations have been able to undertake the debates with already defined goals.

For example, there have been discussions of the problems of recruitment and the living conditions of the migratory worker in South Africa; a revision of the pay systems; identification of specific development plans to absorb the migratory labor when it returns from South Africa; and, finally, the mobilization of international assistance in the technical and financial areas, to implement these plans.

Minister Teodato Hunguana cited an important aspect of the meeting currently under way in Mbabane.

"A distinction (...) was made between the concept of migratory labor and the present system of migratory labor in South Africa. This distinction was considered necessary in order to make a correct determination of what we must do, and what the target of our battle is."

And the determination of that aim has now been achieved to a large extent. Teodato Hunguana said: "We realize that the target is not migratory labor per se. The target of our battle is the present system on which that migratory labor is based;" repeating, "It is the present system." He then explained the reason for this determination.

"First, because it was a system conceived by colonialism to serve the development of South Africa, and not to serve our countries or our workers. Second, that system is still dominated by South Africa, which always uses it according to its needs."

The Target Is the Present System Dominated by SA

This view of the problem is shared by all the countries supplying labor to South Africa. This was one of the major results of the meeting in Mbabane.

The determination of this common target for the countries of Southern Africa hurt by that system was a conquest, because there are several problems posed here. To summarize, these problems are concentrated on the political and ideological differences among the various regimes, which cause differing views of the issue and also in the way in which each of the countries is hurt by the present migratory labor system. Referring specifically to these difficulties that arose and have now been surmounted to a large degree, Minister Teodato Hunguana said:

"For example, there are countries which, when they mentioned the elimination of the migratory labor system, considered this to be an immediate, massive withdrawal of workers from the South African mines. A crucial problem arises in this respect: Whom would that serve at the present time? Who is in a position to do so?"

He continued: "Actually, when we say that the system is still dominated by South Africa and that we must eliminate it as a system dominated by South Africa, we mean that we must emerge from this situation wherein South Africa is playing with the various countries in this regard, deriving the greatest advantages and profits, and not allowing those countries to have negotiating positions which are strong positions that would enable them to really impose terms."

Subsequently, in the interview with the press, the minister of justice also noted: "We think that South Africa is continuing to impose terms and to dictate the ground-rules with respect to the majority of those countries. It is that situation which we need to eliminate. This is what we call the present migratory labor system."

Helping to make this idea accepted by the other participants in the meeting at Mbabane, the head of our delegation declared on that occasion:.

"We wish to make it clear here that, to us, it is not a question of the migratory labor's being evil per se. In fact, it is the system under which that work is done which is evil, and must be abolished. Migratory labor can be found on all continents. It is the conditions under which each system operates that make the difference."

In the same speech, he also emphasized: "Southern Africa is a region wherein geography has determined the economic relations between our countries and South Africa. The issue with which we are concerned is how to change our relations with that country; in other words, how to eliminate our dependence. The main issue is not to abolish the relations, but to abolish the present system of relations which has made us unilaterally dependent with respect to South Africa: This is our common battle; this is our common goal."

It was in still another portion of the same address that Teodato Hunguana stressed the fact that speaking of the elimination of the present migratory system means saying that "our countries' independence must be reflected in a radical change in the system; because South Africa is no longer dealing with colonies, but rather with free, independent and sovereign states."

With regard to the debates held at that meeting on this issue, that member of the Mozambican Government remarked in his statements to the press that, "Our analysis went beyond the present situation, in the sense that we think that the present migratory labor could continue to exist under different conditions."

He explained: "However, under the conditions that the present correlation of forces in Southern Africa is attempting to impose on South Africa, it was felt that the migratory labor would probably continue to exist even after the downfall of the 'apartheid' system, under drastically different conditions: under conditions of normal relations among the nations of the region."

In addition to these aspects of the matter directly related to the dominating and dependent features entailed in the present system of migratory labor, Teodato Hunguana also discussed another side of the issue which makes that system equally unacceptable: the working and living conditions of the workers.

At the meeting with the press, Teodato Hunguana explained: "There is an aspect with which we must be familiar: what we call working and living conditions of the immigrants in South Africa. If we visit one of the most modern mines in South Africa, we may find there what are ostensibly excellent conditions: facilities, lunch rooms, games, recreation television, a certain amount of cleanliness and sanitation. However, the point is that those conditions are not being provided to human beings, but rather to parts of a machine to guarantee high production and productivity."

He added: "We say that those conditions must be drastically changed, because the workers are limited, for example, in their opportunities to bring their families, and to lead a normal family life."

Elsewhere in his statements to the press, that minister also commented: "The raising of wages is a major aspect, for which the workers and the governments of their native countries are fighting; but a stress that is being made with increasing insistency is on the change in the working and living conditions. We are battling for the principle that the migrant worker has fundamental rights which the South African mining industry must guarantee and respect."

[Excerpts] A Solution Resulting From the Overall Strategy

Discussing his participation in the Mbabane meeting, the head of the Mozambican delegation reported: "The RPM's intervention was aimed at establishing the elimination of the present migratory labor system in the context of the economic development of each country and of the social justice being promoted there."

The minister of justice added: "It was a unanimous conclusion that the handling of this issue, which began even before the start of this joint action on the part of the countries supplying labor to the South African mines, accelerated by the independence of Zimbabwe, should be made part of the overall strategy which is under way."

Teodato Hunguana noted: "It is the pursuit of that strategy that will create a new correlation of forces in the economic area. It is that overall strategy which will convert the correlation of political forces now in existence into a new correlation of forces in the economic area. And we must view the evolution of the migratory labor problem as part of those dynamics, not in an isolated fashion. I do not think that a real change in the migratory labor system is possible without those dynamics."

He added: "It is a mistake to view this issue in an isolated manner, because migratory labor is not the only problem in our relations with South Africa."

However, Mozambique already has some views of its own regarding the solution to the problem. The research report prepared by the Center of African Studies, which served as a basic document for our delegation's intervention in the meeting on migratory labor in Southern Africa, held in 1978 at Lusaka, begins by citing the historical conditions surrounding this matter.

The document relates the solution to the migratory labor problem to the country's industrial plans which are being devised.

With respect to the industrialization plans, the aforementioned document notes: "This will create the conditions for starting major industrial projects which, during the first phase, will most likely be concentrated in the provinces of Manica and Tete, containing vast mineral resources, in addition to the possibility of benefiting from cheap energy supplied by the Cahora-Bassa dam. The mining exploitation of coal and iron and the creation of a steel industry, as well as other major branches of industry, such as lumber and paper, will be possible. This process will be accompanied by new types of production already being developed in the rural areas.

"The socialization of the rural areas and the overall development of the country will demand increasingly larger volumes of labor. And we shall reach a point where the existing labor will be insufficient to perform our country's great tasks," added Teodato Hunguana who, at the end of the meeting also remarked, on this subject, that since "this is our experience, we shall try to share it with our comrades in other countries. We are trying to convey this idea now, at the meeting in Mbabane."

South Africa: What Response?

It is inevitable that South Africa will react to this joint effort and to the positive steps that have already been taken. When questioned as to South Africa's possible position, Teodato Hunguana explained:

"There is no doubt whatsoever that this activity is of concern to South Africa, because it is much easier to deal with us divided; it is much easier to deal with these countries in a colonialist or neocolonialist position, wherein South Africa counts on the presence of underdevelopment, on various levels, in those countries, in order to keep them in a situation of supplying cheap labor."

That member of the Mozambican Government added: "When there is a certain amount of coordination among these countries, there is a possibility that, when those same countries enter into negotiations with South Africa, they will appear in a stronger position than what they have now, or had in the past." However, he observed that this coordination "does not represent a platform for mutual negotiations with South Africa; it represents coordination and agreement on positions among the countries supplying labor, so that South Africa will not use our differences against us."

Teodato Hunguana explained: "Nevertheless, we think that South Africa has retained a certain amount of maneuvering capacity, and that it has alternative sources of recruitment. One alternative that it has been creating since 1975, precisely to retain a dominant position with respect to the supplying countries and to reinforce the dependence of those countries on the South African system is the internal labor market in the 'homelands' and the Bantu lands."

The minister of justice told the press: "In spite of everything, South Africa's maneuvering capacity will remain limited, because it will continue to need labor with a certain amount of specialization and experience in order to be able to insure minimal levels of productivity." He added:

"Let us observe the case of Mozambique, for example. The Mozambican labor in South Africa is considerable, not only from a quantitative standpoint, but from a qualitative standpoint in particular. People sometimes think that the Mozambican labor going to South Africa is illiterate and unskilled. This notion is not based on reality. It is the Mozambican labor in the South African mines that holds a larger number of positions requiring qualifications. It is a labor which has become skilled through occupational experience gained in the mines themselves.

"So, the mining industry is still interested in recruiting labor. Our problem is to change the system whereby the migratory labor is operated, because it still has all the features of the colonial period, reflected in a certain amount of domination of the supplying countries by SA."

South Africa is, therefore, unable to dispense, suddenly, with the workers coming from foreign countries, regardless of its level of mechanization. In fact, from 1970 to 1976, the foreign labor accounted for about 76, 78, 79, 80, 75, 67 and 57 percent of all the workers in each year of that period.

The CEA [Center of African Studies] also points out: "With the resumption of the recruitment of labor from Malawi, which appears to be used in a group of mines, especially those containing low mineral content, in competition with the Mozambican labor, it is possible that the Chamber of Mines is attempting to put the two nations in competition; which would be in accordance with its general strategy toward the supplying countries on the subcontinent."

But it is precisely in view of this type of maneuver that there has emerged the activity of SALC [Southern Africa Labour Commission] which, although it has not sought a "platform for mutual negotiations with South Africa," has already taken some rather firm steps toward the necessary coordination for preventing "South Africa from using our differences against us."

The Subculture Inherent in This System

The handling of the present migratory labor system involving the South African mines needs further treatment. It must also be handled taking cultural aspects into consideration. In the areas which, several decades ago, became converted into labor suppliers for the South African mining industry, it is customary to hear, among other ideas, that "a man can only be a man when he goes to the mines," or, "a woman can only marry a man who has gone to the mines, because a man is only strong under those conditions."

At first glance, comments of this kind reveal the entrenchment of certain cultural values which cannot be disregarded, because the population in those areas cannot break away from them overnight.

When questioned on this aspect of the current problem of migratory labor, Teodata Hunguana stated:

"Ideas have been generated which dominate and influence, motivating people for migratory labor."

And in concluding his comments on this issue, the head of the Mozambican delegation to the meeting in Mbabane stressed: "But the origin of this subculture is associated with the economic conditions that have stemmed from the relations between the Portuguese colonialists and South Africa. These relations have caused the Mozambican economy to have as its function that of an economy of services and labor supplies for the South African mines; and, where our country is concerned, mainly in the area south of Save."

APPOINTMENT OF NEW AMBASSADORS, PROVINCIAL OFFICIAL

Beira NOTICIAS DA BEIRA in Portuguese 29 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] By means of two decrees made public in Luanda on Saturday, Jose Eduardo dos Santos, the president of the MPLA-Labor Party and the People's Republic of Angola, appointed Mawete Joao Baptista and Luis Dokui Paulo de Castro to the posts of ambassadors extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the Republic of Cuba and the USSR respectively.

The decrees point out that the implementation of the country's foreign policy recommends sending diplomatic representatives to various regions of the world to publicize the situation in Angola, protect the interests of the People's Republic of Angola and preserve the political line of the party in its relations with other states.

It is to be remembered that Mawete Joao Baptista formerly held the post of ambassador of the People's Republic of Angola in the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria.

Another presidential decree appointed Simao David Martins to the post of deputy provincial commissioner of Zaire Province.

IMPORTANT ROLE OF AGRICULTURE STRESSED, REVIEWED

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 15 Oct 80 p 1

[Editorial: "A Task For All the People"]

[Text] In referring to agriculture--at the historical full meeting on 23-29 October 1976--as the foundation and industry as the decisive factor in the country's economic development, the Central Committee of what at that time was the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola made a very basic decision, approved by the First Congress, determining the orientation given to the phase of national reconstruction and the direction to be followed in the construction of the material and technical foundations necessary for the establishment of socialism in the People's Republic of Angola.

In short-range terms, this option was aimed at guiding the national economy so that the foreseeable increase in production would be given priority in an effort to meet the most urgent needs of the popular masses and so that it would then guarantee the country's harmonious social-economic development, starting with the hide-bound structures inherited from colonialism and the realistic premise that more than 80 percent of the active population live in the rural areas.

Giving agriculture priority along these lines was one of the fundamental decisions made at the First Congress which also defined the goals and objectives to be attained by this sector during the 3-year term of 1978-1980.

Directly tied to the satisfaction of the immediate needs of our people--since it produces the major portion of goods intended for food--the agriculture and livestock sector undoubtedly was the sector that underwent the most changes after independence, primarily, because of its gigantic size and then because of the special features of the rural areas where, as we know, colonialism imposed production relations in which strong positions of slavery predominated--positions which were permitted by the administrative machinery of the Portuguese colonial government.

This is the perspective from which the militants of the MPLA-Labor Party must critically--in the basic party structures--analyze the activities carried out in the agriculture and livestock sector over the past 3 years so that the fundamental documents to be submitted for examination by the First Special Congress will not be caught between narrow horizons or exaggerated optimism, such as they were behind some of the economic goals established by the congress in 1977.

Over the past 3 years, the agriculture and livestock sector intensely experienced the convulsions deriving from the profound changes in production relations springing from government and cooperative property growth which in the field of agriculture alone in 1979 covered more than half of the total cultivated area in 1973. However, the rise in the influence of the socialist production system in the rural areas was not always accompanied by better organizational measures nor by the many-fold support given to the agricultural units and workers who contributed to the increase in output and productivity.

Outstanding efforts were made to give the rural areas agricultural machinery and tools as well as fertilizer and seeds. During this 3-year term, more than 2,000 tractors were imported; but from that it was not possible to derive the desired yield either due to lack of skilled operators or shortages of spare parts, fuel, and lubricants but also due to defective planning and operation regarding the entire machinery pool.

On the other hand, the low development level of the production forces and the lack of technicians--which the Agriculture Ministry tried to remedy by resorting to cooperation and to the accelerated training of domestic cadres both at home and abroad--were behind the deficient organization of the labor force which sometimes proved to be not in line with the real production needs.

All of these conditions influenced the low output indexes in the agriculture and livestock sector which were far below the goals established by the First Congress.

If we look at government-controlled mercantile production--coming from the government, cooperative, and private sectors--we will see that most of the products attained only about 25 percent of the goals established. However, because we are dealing here with controlled output and, taking into account, on the other hand, the existence of parallel distribution circuits and the poor shipment and merchandise circulation capacity between provinces, we could think that the real output indexes should be on considerably higher levels.

The crux of the problem in this case fundamentally involves the lack of control over production and the poor functioning of the exchange mechanism between the city and the rural areas.

The analysis of the activities of the agricultural-livestock sector during the 3-year term of 1978-1980 suggests good prospects for production to us in short-range terms, looking at cereals, vegetables, and citrus fruits and a reliable although slow recovery of long-term indexes in some products intended for export. During the same period of time, the sale of beef cattle tripled and is about 30 percent of the total number of cattle slaughtered in 1973. In the meantime we must report that the government sector only has about 12 percent of the total number of head of beef cattle in the country; the traditional cattle ranchers in the peasant sector hold about 90 percent, mostly in the provinces of Huila, Ounene, Mocamedes, and Benguela.

The greatest difficulties in the agriculture-livestock sector are to be found in the areas of coffee, forest operations, hog raising, and the production of chickens and eggs; this is why they are presently the subject of a profound reorganization and redimensioning which could lead to the eventual collapse of the overblown enterprises, such as ENCAFE [National Coffee Company], EMPROF, something which, by the way, has already happened in the case of ENASU and ENAVE.

As a result of the progressive rise in the level of production forces and the consolidation, in the rural areas, of socialist production relations, the agriculture-livestock sector--since it was given priority by the party and the government--will be able, during the 5-year term of 1980-1985, to play an important role in national reconstruction and to provide impetus for the country's harmonious economic development.

Keeping in mind the strategic guidelines of the MPLA, according to which agriculture is considered the basis of the country's economic growth and the need for quickly solving the main problems of the people, the agriculture-livestock sector should increase agricultural, livestock, and forestry output in order to meet national needs, both in terms of consumer products going directly to the population as well as the processing industry, so as to eliminate, by the end of this 5-year term, the country's dependence on basic products from abroad which can be produced at home and which might even yield enough for export.

This is why special attention must be devoted by the various government agencies to raising the level of the living and working conditions of the agricultural workers and the peasants, channeling the resources necessary for the development of the production forces to the rural areas so as to support the consolidation of the socialist sector of agriculture and animal husbandry in the area of government property and cooperatives.

After these objectives have been attained, we will have cleared an important stage in the fight for economic independence.

The struggle continues. Victory is certain.

CUNENE PROVINCE COURAGE, DETERMINATION PRAISED

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 15 Oct 80 p2

> [Excerpts] Ondjiva (From the special correspondent of ANGOP [ANGOLAN PRESS AGENCY])--Very early in the morning, when the first rays of the sun announce the birth of a new day, the people of this heroic and hard-fighting province of Cunene get up fearlessly to accomplish their honorable tasks of national reconstruction and to make every effort to increase output and productivity constituting the essential base of the construction of socialism.

This determination can be seen on all faces and is even more evident in the children whose enthusiasm and joy shows us that they are no longer afraid of the Mirage, Puma, and Canberra aircraft of the Air Force of the backward regime of Pretoria which constantly fly over the province.

They, the future members of our revolution, courageously go out to the schools and do their job which is to learn in order to serve better.

Cunene, whose capital is Ondjiva, in the southern part of the country, is the front-line trench of the Angolan revolution. It consists of six townships and 13 communities and has approximately 205,000 inhabitants, most of whom are employed in agriculture, particularly pasturage and cattle raising. Although agriculture is the main job here, its development is rather limited above all because of the dry climate characterizing the province.

Nevertheless, in spite of weather conditions, the population in the province does not retreat and continues to build its future. The strong commitment to production tasks as a matter of fact clearly shows that the population of Cunene is always ready to carry out the tasks of the revolution.

As a matter of fact, the peasants in their cooperatives and the workers in their shops, the officials in their offices, the military personnel, whose fighting spirit is high, the students and teachers in the schools--all of them prove that national unity is the grand standard which can be used to oppose the Machiavellian designs put together by imperialism which seeks to obstruct the Liberation Movement of Africa, especially in this southern part.

This disproves the belief of many unrealistic persons who insist in believing that Cunene is [illegible passage in original] ravaged by war, terror, reaction, in other words, a dead land. Indeed, Cunene is the province closest to Namibia, an African country whose people still suffers the hardships visited upon it by the hideous apartheid regime. But, talking about the beauty and charm of this province does not imply blasphemy.

Indeed, its capital, Ondjiva, although small, does not fail to offer its charms and attractions.

Right now, the population of Cunene is experiencing moments of euphoria, following the election of its deputies to the Provincial People's Assembly, the highest body of government authority, on the provincial level, which to the extent possible seeks to make every effort to promote the development of the province. Parallel to the tasks of the people's government, cultural and sports activities have been carried out in support of the First Special Party Congress to be held on 10 December.

Regarding the government sector, on which we will in the future present some interviews with some ministerial delegates, the situation is more or less satisfactory but we do not wish to fail to report that some sectors are facing serious difficulties whose resolution must be accomplished on short notice. By way of example we might say that Ondjiva has only one doctor. Looking at the sports sector, there is no equipment to support the enormous enthusiasm of the young people.

BRIEFS

SPANISH COOPERATION DELEGATION LEAVES--A Spanish delegation, made up of technicians from Tecniberia (Engineering Consultants Association), Adaro (National Mining Enterprise), of the Association of Civil [engineering] Construction, as well as Shoe and Electrical Appliance Manufacturers, headed by engineer Adolfo Nunes, president of Tecniberia, left Luanda yesterday, headed for Madrid, at the end of a working visit to Angola. During its stay, the Spanish delegation discussed possibilities of cooperation with representatives of the ministries of construction, fishing, transportation, industry, agriculture, and petroleum. Along with this, integral development projects were being studied in the fields of agriculture, prefabricated products, as well as fishing and mining exploration. Emilio Cassinelo, ambassador of the Kingdom of Spain accredited in Angola, who had joined his country's delegation during the conversations, announced that a delegation is also scheduled to arrive from the Foreign Bank of Spain to hold talks with officials of the National Bank of Angola for the purpose of discussing ways of cooperation in the field of finance. NEW FACULTY--A cabinet decree, signed by President of the Republic Comrade Jose Eduardo dos Santos, within the framework of the University of Angola, created the School of Law and Administration. This decree, published recently in DIARIO DA REPUBLICA, adds that the fundamental objective of that school is to provide higher-level education for specialists who will, in terms of the law and politics, be capable of performing functions in the country's administration of justice. According to the decree, likewise, it is up to the recently created Institute of Higher Education to train teaching personnel for all levels of instruction in the field of law, especially for higher education, along with the promotion and stimulation of scientific research in related fields. DOS SANTOS CONGRATULATORY MESSAGE--Luanda, 8 Nov (AFP)--The Angolan head of state, Mr Jose Eduardo dos Santos, has sent a congratulatory message to Mr Leonid Brezhnev on the occasion of the 63rd anniversary of the October revolution. The concrete steps made in the field of detente and disarmament are obvious proof of the desire for peace, cooperation and peaceful coexistence which motivates the Soviet Union, Mr Jose Eduardo dos Santos writes. Its position of unflinching support for the legitimate right of peoples to self-determination and the consistent fight against colonialism and neocolonialism make the USSR a reliable ally of all people who love freedom, peace and social progress, he added. On this occasion, we express our conviction that the friendly bonds between our parties, our governments and peoples will continue to be the firm expression of our free and sovereign will to further strengthen the many forms of solidarity and cooperation between the two countries, Mr dos Santos indicated, while reaffirming Angola's choice of Marxist-Leninism and the general friendship treaty signed between the late President Agostinho Neto and Leonid Brezhnev.

UNITA IN CUANDO CUBANGO--Lisbon--Angolan President Jose Eduardo dos Santos announced fresh measures to bolster the Marxist government's control in the south of the country where dissident guerrillas are giving the ruling MPLA plenty of trouble. Angola's press agency reported that President dos Santos recently visited the southeastern province of Cuando Cubango. He announced a new development program for the region. So far the ruling party had quite obviously not lived up to the expectations of the population in that area. According to ANGOP (ANGOLAN PRESS AGENCY), Cuando Cubango is the region where the South African supported UNITA guerrillas center their attacks. Dos Santos accused UNITA of abducting young Angolans across the border into SWA/Namibia. There they are trained by the South African defense force. After being provided by Pretoria with weapons, money and transportation they are reinfiltrated across the border into Angola "to massacre our people." A South African defense force spokesperson opined that Dos Santos is probably seeking sympathy for his domestic problems. [Text] [Windhoek ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG in German 31 Oct 80 p 1]

APPEAL TO WEST--Lisbon: Angolan President Jose Eduardo Dos Santos has called on the West to help bring about a peaceful transition to independence in SWA the Angolan news agency Angop reported at the weekend. Speaking in Luanda, the Angolan leader stressed that while Angola sought a diplomatic solution to the South West African question, it would continue to support the guerrilla struggle of SWAPO. President Dos Santos said South African intransigence in negotiating an internationally acceptable independence settlement for SWA was only possible because of connivance by Western powers. Addressing the closing session of Angola's provisional legislature, the Council of the Revolution, he said the Western powers could, if they wished, play an importand part in solving South West Africas problem. [as published] President Dos Santos said Angola remained in favour of creating a demilitarised zone between Angola and SWA of rapid implementation of UN Resolution 435 on the Territory. This abolished SA'S mandate to govern SWA which was granted by the League of Nations after the First World War. The President accused of ignoring UN decisions and those taken by the Organisation of African Unity.--Sapa Reuter [Text] [Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 3 Nov 80 p 2]

KEREKOU ADDRESSES SESSION OF RULING PARTY CENTRAL COMMITTEE

AB131228 Cotonou Domestic Service in French 1930 GMT 12 Nov 80

[Address by Beninese President Mathieu Kerekou to the Third Session of the Third Central Committee of the Beninese People's Revolutionary Party in Cotonou on 12 November--Recorded]

[Excerpts] Comrade members of the Central Committee, a detailed examination of our national situation reveals that the numerous unresolved or newly created problems confronting us in the various fields of our national liberation struggle have begun to insidiously tarnish the beautiful image of the spectacular achievements of the democratic and popular Beninese revolution. There is no doubt that the tours recently undertaken by our comrades, the political commissioners, offered them the precious opportunity to conduct direct inquiries on the spot and among the masses in our towns and rural areas. As everyone knows, the only objective of these tours was to assess without any complacency the results achieved by our vanguard party--the Beninese People's Revolutionary Party--in its national task of revolutionary organization, information, mobilization, leadership and education of our popular masses in the interest of the following permanent tasks facing the revolution: national production; national construction; patriotic, ideological and premilitary training of all the people at all levels; defense of the fatherland and of the revolution; elimination of illiteracy among the masses; and sound management of all our production units.

Following their tours of the 84 districts of our six provinces, our comrades the political commissioners unanimously reached the following conclusions which we sum up briefly as follows:

1--The situation on the spot is characterized by a veritable standstill of the revolution ary activities of all the militants of the democratic and popular Beninese revolution.

2--A slackening of militant action is evident in all sectors and at all levels.

3--Now that we must execute the new revolutionary tasks necessitated by the consistent application of our constitution, the militants of the revolutionary bodies and of the various mass organizations are living in a wait and see attitude, passivity and lethargy. This being the case, comrade members of the Central Committee, one can easily understand why the reactionary forces in coalition inside and outside our country are engaged--with rare arrogance and impunity--in counterrevolutionary activities throughout the national territory with the culpable complicity of some political and administrative authorities who have been paralyzed by their opportunist ideological contradictions. The rational implementation of our policies and the correct execution of all the tasks relating to the final institutionalization of revolutionary, democratic and popular power in our country demand that a number of contradictions and antagonisms at the level of our vanguard party and its central committee should be eliminated.

During this session, we will also examine the dossier relating to the organization of popular justice in our country. We will also study the dossier dealing with the problem of the patriotic, ideological and premilitary training of the people, not only because of its importance in the revolutionary education of the people but especially because it is a great instrument in the class struggle aimed at awakening and developing the proletarian awareness of the working masses in our towns and rural areas who alone constitute the really active, conscious and responsible builders of our new Beninese society, the society of popular democracy freed from all systems of human oppression and exploitation--the socialist society. Scientific socialism is our path to development. Marxism-Leninism is our philosophical guide. Ready for the revolution. The struggle continues.

MOJA'S PROGRAM, SUPPORT DISCUSSED

London WEST AFRICA in English 3 Nov 80 pp 2271-2272

[Text] SLOGANS calling for support for MOJA, painted on walls and buildings in and-around Banjul by unknown persons, are a manifestation of the disillusioned state in which those who seek to change the political order through the established political parties find themselves. In their frustration, they turn to an external organisation little known in the country.

Some of their complaints, however, deserve consideration although their methods are at best questionable. For example, by omitting to proffer reasons for the dismissal of a minister or senior official about whom there were unflattering rumours the powers that be are, perhaps unwittingly, encouraging adverse speculation. The contention is that not only must they be dismissed but they must be seen to be appropriately dealt with in cases of grave misconduct. Also, the sudden and apparently justified rise to a position of prominence by someone whose only qualification would appear to be relation or connection with an influential personality could understandably provoke allegations of nepotism.

The way to "right" such "wrongs", it is argued, lies not only in exposing them but by nipping them in the bud before they assume epidemic proportions. For that political power is needed. The established opposition parties have proved too ineffective a vehicle, plagued as they are by desertions. The United Party ceased to be a political party in any meaningful sense of that word long ago. The sole Member of Parliament elected under its banner, with massive National Convention Party support, crossed the floor of the House to join the ruling party.

As for the NCP, reports of desertions from its ranks since its defeat at the April, 1977, general elections appear to have been borne out by the results of the March, 1979, municipal elections. They failed to control any of the Area Councils in the Provinces in spite of teaming up with the UP. In two or three councils, they did not even put up a token fight as they failed to put up candidates in most wards. They fared no better in Banjul and suburban areas.

But the greatest blow to rank and file morale was the loss to the PPP of Mr. Lamin Juwara, an executive committee member. Putting a brave face to an obviously embarrassing development, the NCP dismissed it as being of no consequence, emphasising that Mr. Juwara was expelled for anti-party activities and for trying to usurp power. He was also accused of opportunism.

For his part, Mr. Juwara insisted that he resigned in disgust after failing to reorient the party from a secretarian organisation to a national one. He said he has been even less successful in his efforts to give the executive a national character. "Some parts of the country are not even represented. The membership is all people from Baddibu handpicked by the leader. As far as the NCP is concerned, it is all a Mandinka affair," he said, adding that a party cannot be run on personal or tribal considerations. He also complained of refusal by the party leadership to make known the membership of what in public is supposed to be a national political party.

As for the accusation of opportunism, he said the NCP needs him much more than he ever needed it. As an independent candidate at the 1977 elections, he said, he had beaten the official NCP candidate to a poor third in a four-cornered fight for the Sabach-Sanjal constituency in the Baddibu District.

It is this political situation that the advocates of support for MOJA seek to exploit.

A BRANCH of the Movement for Justice in Africa (MOJA) is beginning to make its voice heard in The Gambia. Founded in 1979, MOJA — Gambia aims to change what it describes as a situation where "the whole wealth of the country is at the disposal of the political and administrative ruling clique". It alleges nepotism, corruption and patronage at the top, shareholding in foreign companies by government officials and profitable collaboration in the development of tourism to the detriment of local culture. MOJA — Gambia also alleges political intimidation, and increasing repression.

Here, the movement recalls the Societies Act of 1971 and says this legislation may soon be enforced against it if the government feels the need. The Act empowers the President to declare unlawful any society "which in his opinion is, or is being used for purposes prejudicial to or incompatible with the interests of the defence of the Republic, public safety, public order, public morality or public health or which is or is being used for interfering with the rights or freedoms of other persons". A society is defined under the Act as "any club, company, partnership, or association of seven or more persons whatever its nature or object, whether temporary or permanent". The Act confers powers of entry, search and arrest to any police officer above the rank of Sub-Inspector for any premises which he has reason to believe is connected with a society he has reason to believe is unlawful. The identity of any informers involved in prosecuting the case is protected unless the Court feels this is likely to result in a miscarriage of justice.

There is an important section on presumptions to the effect that "where it is proved that a club, company, partnership or association is in existence, it shall be presumed that such club, company, partnership or association is a society within the meaning unless the contrary is proved"; and "it shall not be necessary for the prosecution to prove that a society possesses a name or that it has been constituted or is known under a particular name". The state can presume membership or connection with an unlawful society by virtue of any literature, insignia or accounts found on a person or in his premises, and by virtue of a person being in, or leaving premises believed to have been used for unlawful purposes. Maximum penalties for office-holders of unlawful associations are five years, and four and three years for various offences such as membership, invitation to membership and procuring subscriptions.

MOJA — Gambia describes the current situation in The Gambia as one where corruption is rife, unemployment rising as is the crime rate, and describes a system of political control and patronage that aims to stifle any political expression outside the ruling party. MOJA — Gambia says it aims to work for free political activity and mass control of the political institutions, to work for ending foreign economic and military control, and to work for full employment, equal development of all languages and cultures, and for African unity.

REASONS FOR'DISAPPOINTING' TOURIST SEASON NOTED

London WEST AFRICA in English 3 Nov 80 pp 2172-2173

[Text] WHEN in Europe the 1973/74 winter turned out to be a mild one, officials involved in the tourist trade in The Gambia blamed the disappointing tourist performance of that season on the European weather.

Last season's results, which may well fall below expectation, cannot be simply the fault of the European winter.

In normal circumstances, this should have been a boom year in Gambian tourism. The Gambia is one of the few warm sunny countries that operate winter tourism with the Scandinavian countries as targets.

Those countries experienced their coldest winter for a long time. A severe winter is the story told in all the affluent countries of the temperate zone this year.

Since it is maintained by officialdom that the bad weather in Scandinavia should be a favouriable tourist reason for The Gambia, we should examine some of the reasons why the touristic momentum of the early 1970s has not been kept up.

The first batch of charter tourists arrived in The Gambia in the 1966/67 winter. At the end of that season, when there were only 162 hotel beds in the country, 528 tourists were registered as having been to The Gambia, coming almost exclusively from Sweden.

The following season saw a rise of 50 per cent with the arrival into the country of 796 pleasure travellers. There followed a rapid successive rise, touching 15,166 tourists for 1971/72 and rising to 25,000 in 1975/76. In a few short years The Gambia became a favourite for Scandinavian tourists.

But in Sweden, meanwhile, newspaper reports of the adverse effects of tourism on The Gambia were appearing. Stories of licence by tourists, and its alleged corrupting influence on Gambian morals, began to make headlines in the Scandinavian press, especially the Swedish newspapers.

It has also been made widely known in the press of those largely humanist people that the Scandinavian tourist trade did not benefit the ordinary Gambian in a way that would justify its continued support by the broad mass of Swedes.

People who do not know Sweden may not easily understand why most Swedes should frown on permissiveness and commercial exploitation that, after all, is perpetrated by Swedish nationals abroad. Puritanical Sweden (a fact generally misunderstood outside the country) will not come out strongly in favour of a trade that is manifestly not helping the economy and the people of an underdeveloped country.

The great majority of the Swedes whom I have met in Europe have never been at ease with themselves over a feeling that their country was helping to debase Gambian cultural and social values. Whether that is the correct situation or not, it is the general picture in the minds of most Swedes.

But the unexpected poor showing in Gambian tourism cannot be attributed solely to general Swedish refusal to patronise the traffic on purely moral grounds. A sector of the national economy that has been officially recognised as a major foreign exchange earner has not received the promotional attention it should.

Over the years the job of tourism promotion in The Gambia has been left entirely in the hands of foreign operators, such as the Swedish firm Vingressor, and the Danish firms Spies and Unisol. These are multinational bodies with business interests in many countries, in which their Gambian activities are not of paramount importance to them.

In view of the tourist trade's special importance to The Gambia, agencies should be set up in those countries from where tourists are being attracted. These agencies could do a lot to "sell The Gambia abroad". Part of the investment on tourism could be devoted to that end. The occasional official visits of prominent Gambian officials to foreign countries do not really contribute towards promotion. Promotion work can best be undertaken by such bodies that are specifically oriented to that task, and can be much better accomplished by those Gambian nationals who know the lands and people of the target countries.

The Scandinavian tour undertaken by the Minister of Tourism in 1976 might easily have been a success had the Minister's delegation included a Gambian with a sound knowledge of Sweden and the Swedish language. The Swedes would have been more receptive to any appeals made in their language than to translated version of the same appeals. Again, perhaps one has to know the Swedes to see what differences such an arrangement could make.

Of the greatest importance in attracting tourists into The Gambia is the price level of the goods and services used by them. It is a fact that hotel accommodation, drinks and food in hotels cost more in The Gambia than they generally do in the Scandinavian countries or in Germany, in Switzerland and Holland, the countries of origin of most of The Gambia's tourists.

In those countries where tourism is a major industry and which compete strongly in the same market, with countries such as Spain, Portugal, Greece, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Romania and Turkey, the price range of goods and services for tourists is considerably lower than in The Gambia, Senegal, Ivory Coast or Nigeria. That is a situation that cannot be explained in simple economic language.

What The Gambia will have to do sometime is to take a greater share in the importation and management of tourists. Far too often Government regulations on prices have been ignored by foreign hotel proprietors, who do their best to extract maximum profits from the tourist trade.

Because drinks don't come under the category of controlled goods, hoteliers have found it easy to increase the price of beer and soft drinks by 300 per cent over the last three years. Coke, Fanta, Seven-Ups and beer now go for D2.5 or more in hotels instead of the 75 bututs as in 1974.

World-wide inflation is not the sole cause of this fantastic rise in prices, especially considering that Gambian hotel staff are paid lower salaries than their European counterparts. Prices in hotels can be brought down and kept low if sufficient attention is paid to this task by the competent Gambian authorities.

Also a lot more could be done for the Gambian members of the hotel staff. At present there are ten or so Gambians, fully-qualified in hotel management, who have not been given chances in managerial capacities, or even responsible jobs. It suits the foreign hotel proprietor to import foreign personnel, sometimes in violation of the Government ruling through the Expatriate Quota Allocation Board.

Perhaps the most important way of ensuring greater success for the tourist trade is to create, identify and promote tourist attractions in the country and offer them "for sale" to foreign visitors to The Gambia.

PAPER FAVORS BANNING TRIBAL ASSOCIATIONS ON CAMPUS

AB101755 Accra Domestic Service in English 1300 GMT 10 Nov 80

[Press review]

[Excerpts] Both the GRAPHIC and TIMES give prominence to the concern expressed by the vice chancellor of the University of Ghana, Professor Adzei Bekoe, about the formation of racial and tribal associations on the campus. This is the subject for comment in the daily GRAPHIC's editorial headed "Uproot Tribalism."

The paper says this caused concern and notes that tribalism is the disease plaguing Ghana's development. It says no one can lose sight of the fact that tribalism ultimately leads to sectionalism and divisiveness which can destroy the nation and its institutions.

The GRAPHIC says there are cases in point when tribal associations have gone to the extent of warning their members not to accept postings to regions other than their own to do their national service. It continues: Some associations normally make deliberate attempts to rig student representative councils and hold elections in order to put their corrupt tribesmen at the helm of student affairs to the detriment of the whole university administration. All kinds of corrupt practices including buying goods, rigging elections, impersonation, tribalism, etc, which are all condoned and conived [passage indistinct]

In this regard, the paper thinks that new appeals by the vice chancellor are not enough to discourage such actions. The GRAPHIC (?advocates) that no time be wasted in banning all (?these) tribal associations on the campus.

HIGHER COCOA PRICES DEMANDED--Farmers in Sunyani have asked the government to raise the cocoa producer price to ¢800 (from ¢120). They threatened not to sell their cocoa to the CMB it it failed to increase the producer price because they felt the government was not interested in the industry. [as published] This was demonstrated ted by the fact that the greater percentage of harvested cocoa was at the moment in sheds and bushes with no efforts being made to purchase and cart it to the ports for export. At a one-day meeting with the Cocoa Production Division chief officer, Mr. A. A. Gyamfi organised by the farmers to acquaint him with their problems, the formers lamented the blockage of all roads leading to cocoa-producing areas which "locked-up" several tonnes of cocoa. Mr. Gyamfi said the CMB would do all it could to evacuate the cocoa, and advised the farmers not to take advantage of the delay to smuggle it to neighbouring countries. AIRCRAFT LEASE AGREEMENT WITH KML--Ghana Airways will start operating a DC-10 aircraft between Accra-Rome-London from December 16. This follows the signing in Accra of a lease agreement with KLM Royal Dutch Airlines. Captain T. E. Agyare acting managing director, and Mr. E. Heyning, vice-president and head of the KLM logistics division, signed for the two parties. Mr. Harry Sawyerr, Minister of Transport and Communications said at the ceremony that the Cabinet had already approved the lease agreement costing Ghana $1m. per month. A Ghana Airways statement said the lease of the DC-10 had become necessary "because the VC-10, for technical reasons, will not be operational at the end of 1980." The VC-10 has been in service since 1965. The lease agreement will last until Ghana Airways takes delivery of its own DC-10, which will be 1982 according to Mr. Harry Sawyerr. KLM will provide training for Ghanaian pilots, engineers, technicians, cabin crew and other ground staff "in due course". The statement said a training programme for Ghanaian cabin crews had already been drawn up for their conversion to DC-10 operations. Captain Agyare said the occasion marked the beginning of a new era of co-operation between Ghana Airways and KLM, and also a new horizon for Ghana Airways. He said it could now compete with other airlines that had been using wide-bodied jets on the West Coast for the past few years. [Excerpts] [London WEST AFRICA in English 3 Nov 80 p 2196]

FOREIGN MINISTER COMMENTS ON ECONOMIC SITUATION

London WEST AFRICA in English 3 Nov 80 pp 2168-2170

[Article by Alex Rondos]

[Excerpt PERHAPS the most difficult cross that Mali has had to bear since the late sixties has been the devaluation of its currency. The decision by Modibo Keita's government in 1967 to opt out of the CFA franc, while remaining within the franc zone, resulted in a Malian franc that had been devalued 50 per cent. It is a condition which has sent Malian traders abroad, teachers to neighbouring countries and crops clandestinely across the frontiers to the more lucrative markets of Senegal, Ivory Coast and Upper Volta where the producer prices have been twice as high as those in Mali.

Whether the decision was a disastrous one or not, it merits sympathy. For as Maître Alioune Blondin Beye, the Mali's Foreign Minister, commented in a interview, the measure, for all the difficulty it has caused Mali, was taken in the hope that Mali's independence could be consolidated. The Minister has an interesting interpretation of Mali post-independence history. Continuity, he said, was a theme that can be detected in all of Mali's policies, domestic and external. The desire to bolster national independence was continued with the wish to see Africa break down the barriers of disunity which were inherited from the colonial era.

In January, 1981, an extraordinary congress of the country's only party, the Union Démocratique du Peuple Malien, will take place. It has been convoked because, as President Traore said in his national day speech, the present system had failed. The Foreign Minister confirmed that one could expect changes both in structure and personalities in order to improve the working of the party political machinery. The simple fact is that the party has failed to inspire enthusiastic support in a public which has always been very political and which after 10 years of dour military rule had become impatient for more freedom in political expression.

Another aspect of continuity was the state sector. The Minister made no excuses for the poor performance of what have become plethoric state enterprises. Any decision to reform them, which means reducing them, will require political courage. But, as Maître Beye emphasised, faith in the concept of a state sector remains undiminished. It is rather a "human problem" of insufficient training and inefficiency.

The Minister took a positive view of Mali's economy. Given the disadvantage of the devalued Malian franc, it was surprising, he thought, how well the economy had managed to sustain itself in recent years. So much was this so that other authorities have noticed recently that the Malian franc has been sought after in neighbouring states. When pressed on the point of the franc zone, the Minister admitted that if the Malian franc was on the same parity as the CFA franc the economy would be "flourishing". His view of the franc zone, which, as he admitted, may give the impression that the member states are too dependent on Paris, was pragmatic. Compared with Nigeria, with its vast domestic market, Mali with its relatively small population has to make use of whatever advantages are offered to build up an economy.

The same principle applied to regional organisations. As one of the more enthusiastic participants of the Communauté Economique de l'Afrique de l'Ouest, Mali knew, the Minister said, that perhaps some of the coastal members stood to gain more in the immediate future. They need a regional market for their expanding industries. This is particularly the case with Ivory Coast. Yet Mali, in his view, cannot afford to be concerned with "les miettes de toute a l'heure" (the immediate breadcrumbs), when there were greater things in the offing in the longer term. To him the CEAO is not antagonistic to ECOWAS. Rather it should be seen as a welcome attempt in Africa to create unity, exploiting advantages which all the member states shared; they were all part of colonial French West Africa, and that unity, in his view, should not break apart.

The Minister was on his way to the CEAO summit in Niamey, where among other topics he would be continuing discussions on the non-aggression and defence agreement. Though non-aggression is not a point of debate, the defence of other member states should they be attacked caused problems, though the Minister insisted that this was no longer the case.

Libya's interests in the regions have always been associated with the reluctance of certain CEAO states to support the agreement. Two weeks before the summit Col. Gaddafi decided to inform the Tuaregs of Mali and Niger, who he said were suffering from neglect and imprisonment, that they should know that they have the support of Libya. Maître Beye countered both points. Frequent missions from Libya have confirmed that Libya has no intention of meddling in Malian affairs. This was particularly after a report was published that some Malians based in Libya were receiving Libyan support to form an army that would invade Mali. Col. Gaddafi's emissaries conveyed his assurance that this was all untrue. The Minister said that should anyone try to violate Malian territory they would find the defence well prepared. As to the Tuaregs, the Minister felt that in recent years the populations of the north had been given sufficient reason to believe that they should support the government in Bamako.

Something that has been particularly frustrating too for Maître Beye, and all Malian planners for that matter, has been the stalling in the financing of the OMVS projects. He finds it unreasonable that when the member states have already received commitments covering 85 per cent of the finance required for the OMVS programme the Senagal River Development project which comprises Mali, Mauritania and Senegal, the creditors are now insisting that there should be a 100 per cent commitment before the money is actually disbursed. Indeed, all the member states are experiencing the same irritation. Not only will the cost of the projects have increased dramatically the longer one waits, but as the Minister observed, there is something decidedly perverse in witholding the finance for such vital projects when the country is suffering another year of desperate food shortages after the latest drought.

SECONDARY, HIGHER EDUCATION RESUMES AFTER DISRUPTIONS

AB102036 Bamako Domestic Service in French 1500 GMT 10 Nov 80

[Excerpts] It is now an official fact that secondary and higher education institutions will reopen on 15 November. This was announced by the minister of national education, Lt Col Sekou Ly. This governmental decision was disclosed to parents and democratic organizations this morning during a meeting chaired by the minister of national education at the teacher training institute. In a speech addressed to the parents, Lt Col Sekou Ly touched on all the problems involved in the forthcoming reopening of classes in secondary and higher institutions. The minister spoke in particular about the change in the structure of secondary education, the means of access to higher educational institutions, the distribution of scholarships and the regionalization of teaching.

At the end of this meeting the minister of national education was interviewed by Baba Dara:

[Begin recording] [Question] Mr Minister, the school year was seriously disrupted. Could you tell us the proportion of students who sat for their examinations this year?

[Answer] The rate of participation in the first and second sessions of the advanced level examinations was very low, an average of 7 percent.

[Question] Mr Minister, on the occasion of the reopening of classes in secondary and higher institutions of learning, what appeal would you like to make?

[Answer] We will continue to stress the need for the creation of a sane atmosphere within our schools to enable teachers to carry out their duties correctly and regularly, to enable students to benefit from the teaching they are given, and finally, to enable the country to benefit from its investments in order and unity. To attain such an objective it is indispensable for all the interested parties to join their efforts and succeed in reabsorbing--through mutual understanding founded on objective bases--sterile tensions which are highly prejudicial to the interests of our people. The events which shook the educational sector should provide food for thought. [End recording]

UDPM FIRST EXTRAORDINARY CONGRESS--Bamako, 13 Nov (AFP)--According to an official communique issued in Bamako, the First Extraordinary Congress of the Malian People's Democratic Union (UDPM), Mali's only party, will be held during the first fortnight of February 1981. Official sources say that the aim of the extraordinary session of the UDPM will be to revitalize the political structures of the party which do not function satisfactorily. The decision to convene this congress, the communique points out, was reached during a meeting of the UDPM's Central Executive Bureau held on Tuesday under the chairmanship of its secretary general, Gen Moussa Traore, who is also head of the Malian Government. Observers had initially expected this session to be held in 1980. A national party council meeting on economic problems was to have preceded the congress. The UDPM was created on 31 March 1979 to put an end to 10 1/2 years of military rule and to restore constitutional rule to Mali. [Text] [AB131810 Paris AFP in French 1522 GMT 13 Nov 80]

U. S. INDIAN OCEAN PRESENCE TERMED 'SINISTER'

Beira NOTICIAS DA BEIRA in Portuguese 1 Oct 80 p 8

[Editorial]

[Text] The clumsy Washington propaganda tricks and its military adventures more and more often end in failure. Thus it ended by abandoning the turban of "Islam's friend and defender" that it put on in the fact of events in Iran and Afghanistan--the face of an imperialist and oppressor which one could guess inside was too ferocious. In the same way it aborted the attempt to distract the attention of Moslems from the real danger toward the fictitious danger, when it attempted to justify an increased U. S. military presence in the Indian Ocean and the Persian Gulf.

The real objectives of the Pentagon are formulated in the confession published in its insider magazine: AVIATION WEEK AND SPACE TECHNOLOGY: "The events that occurred in the Middle East and the Persian Gulf, in addition to those in Iran, lead one to believe that it is precisely in that area that U. S. intervention forces will act".

So, we are faced with a situation that endangers the security of the petroleum countries that tend to follow an independent foreign policy, and above all the security of Iran, a country that put an end to the antipopular regime of the shah, and with him to the harmful dependence on the United States. We are dealing with a complex of large-scale U. S. military preparations oriented toward the creation in the region of a network extended to several aggression bridgeheads concentrating armed forces around Iran and forming a "rapid reaction force" with police functions, dragging its NATO partners and other countries into the projected military adventures.

In raising the threatening fist over the Persian Gulf, the Pentagon is using a system of military bases situated near the Gulf, as well as in the middle and around the Indian Ocean. Special importance is to be given to a large air and naval base on Diego Garcia Island which, according to the former U. S. chief of naval operations, Admiral Zumwalt, is as good as several aircraft carriers. As a result of lengthening the runway, the base can handle large cargo planes. At this time work is in progress on the adaptation of the base for B-52 strategic bombers. In addition, Diego Garcia allows the stationing of floating bases for torpedo boat destroyers and submarines and large freighters that transport weapons and ammunition.

Diego Garcia Island, being made into a center of U. S. military presence in the Indian Ocean, is located halfway between the Persian Gulf and western Africa and western Australia. In these regions support points for aggression are also being installed. Washington was able to impose the conclusion of agreements on the utilization of the port of Mombaca, military airports of Nanyuki and Embakasi in Kenya and the port of Berbera and other military installations in Somalia. There are plans to keep there the weapons and war materiel and to maintain "service contingents" in charge of--according to the ASSOCIATED PRESS--the mission of maintaining all the installations "permanently ready to enter into operation as soon as the order for action arrives" in the Persian Gulf, Aden and the Red Sea. The Pentagon is not refusing, according to all indications, the services of the racist Pretoria regime which willingly declared itself ready to place at the service of Washington, in the name of protection of the interests of "Free West", its naval base in Simonstown.

In the north, the chain of Pentagon bases in the Indian Ocean ends with the ports and airports of Oman and Masira Island which also for some time have served as transshipment points for supplies of the U. S. naval force which includes approximately 30 warships and auxiliary vessels, and which is stationed in the Sea of Oman and the Persian Gulf.

Cargo for the aircraft carriers will be transported by planes and for other warships by helicopters. Starting from the bases in Oman, access to the Persian Gulf will be controlled. This is the reason for its important role in case of intervention or other kinds of U. S. aggression against Iran and other countries of the region. Moreover, the world already is aware of a precedent for such activity: the airports of Oman received the U. S. planes which at the end of last April participated in the unsuccessful operation which the Pentagon staged in Iran.

To blockade the Persian Gulf zone in the west, Washington is hurrying to form the Tel Aviv-Cairo axis, making them the springboard for Iran and the Arab countries. Egypt already started receiving fighter bombers, tanks, artillery pieces and other war materiel "made in U. S. A." The large Rabanas base, located on the Red Sea coast, has received special attention from Washington, because--according to WASHINGTON POST--Saudi Arabia, which occupies the other coast of the sea, did not authorize the United States to install military bases on its territory.

As to the Israeli regime, it has long ago transformed the country into a bastion of U. S. imperialism in the Middle East.

A network of bases taking in the area of the Indian Ocean has as its main objective the servicing of the "rapid deployment force", the main shock force Washington intends to use to impose its will on other countries. The personnel and equipment of this "force" with over 200,000 troops is made up of selected units representing all branches of the armed forces and considered the core of the 5-year military program recently approved. General P. Kelly, chief of the interventionist "force", brags of his "readiness to launch his troops to the Middle East or the Persian Gulf" as soon as he receives the order to "strike a preventive blow to occupy any territory".

U. S. IMPERIALISM BLOCKS HUMANITY'S PROGRESS

Beira NOTICIAS DA BEIRA in Portuguese 1 Oct 80 p 8

[Commentary]

[Text] Houses in ruins, remains of burnt vehicles, corpses in the streets, that was the sad panorama in May in Miami, the resort city in the southern United States. The explosion of discontent by the population caught the authorities unprepared. They could find only one solution: to reduce the "black" neighborhood to ashes. Did Washington expect that a nationwide insurrection would occur on the same days in its South Korean possession? The first reaction of Washington was dictated by the instinct of imperialism: proclaiming its support to the dictatorial regime, the United States put American troops stationed in South Korea on alert and sent, with all haste, aircraft carriers to its shores. During this time, the army of South Korean puppets was destroying no longer isolated neighborhoods, but an entire city: Kwangju.

Which will be the next city or the next country? In El Salvador, for example, imperialism and reaction obviously prepared bloody actions, as a way of compensation for the defeat suffered in nearby Nicaragua. What would have happened if the American incursion in the Iranian desert would have been successful? What would have happened if the "plot" of General Oveissi--the former chief of military administration of Tehran who still in the times of the shah did not hesitate to shoot at peaceful demonstrators--had not been broken up in time? Washington seems not to want to curb the vengeful instincts of its proteges.

Of course, every conflict has its specific causes. However, can we consider the fact that the struggle between imperialism, led by reactionary circles of the United States, and the liberation movement that encompasses ever greater masses in various regions of the world, even in the United States itself, as mere coincidence? Of course not.

There are different explanations for it. Sometimes they reach the extreme of reducing everything to the influence of solar activity, especially strong this spring, and to the "configuration of the stars". Let us leave to the scientists to deal with the influence of these natural phenomena--still insufficiently studied--over the psyche of men. However it is not very difficult to discover common sociopolitical and economic factors that are at the root of the aggravation of global confrontation between imperialism and the forces of freedom. They are: first, inflation, growing unemployment, slowdown of production and other phenomena of the economic crisis of capitalism. Attempts are being made to throw the entire weight of this on the backs of the oppressed. Is this not a reason for calling for a most resolute, legitimate and fair response?

Then, there is the sharpened militarist tendencies and the arms race that are also reflected in the policies of imperialist powers, mainly the United States, toward developing countries where they try to obtain obedience by force. In addition, internal racism accompanies the imperialist and neocolonialist orientation of the United States in international affairs, orientation based on scorn, racist by nature, toward the rights of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America.

Is it strange that these continents perceive the crimes perpetrated in Miami as a demonstration of deep hostility of American imperialism and the capitalist system itself toward the basic aspirations of their peoples? "As the system of 'apartheid' in South Africa," said the leadership of the South African Trade Unions Congress, "the economic and political system of the United States is based on the exploitation of colored people who are denied the most basic rights."

The Carter administration has tripped itself up with its uproar over "human rights". This is because people who are not very bright took seriously the political demagoguery that is now being directed at Washington.

The essential thing is that life itself and the objective and logical march of events tear down the positions of imperialism. However, imperialism does not want to recognize this. It cannot and does not want to adapt itself to this "unprecedented political awakening of the masses" that Brzezinski recognized 2-1/2 years ago.

Washington responded with tanks and aircraft carriers. It is impossible to underestimate the danger. We are dealing with attempts to block the path to the future for the majority of humanity.

PILOTS TRAINING IN USSR VISITED AT KREMENTCHUNG

Beira NOTICIAS DA BEIRA in Portuguese 9 Oct 80 p 3

[Article by Vladimir Kolinko]

[Excerpts] Cooperation in cadre training is one of the most noteworthy aspects of the development of relations between the People's Republic of Mozambique and the Soviet Union. Various agreements have been signed between the two countries for bilateral cooperation in this respect. An article appearing in the magazine A VIDA SOVIETICA gives us a picture of the process of the training of Mozambican pilots in the USSR.

The helicopter rose slowly and hovered 2 or 3 meters from the ground. Vladimir Shorokov, commander of the group of pilots, commented: "What is that young man's name? Alvaro Martins? The boy has a future as a pilot!"

The flight school's air field is near the city of Krementchung.

The flight chief radioed various instructions to the aircraft overhead. Seated on the ground, a group of young men waited their turn. There were Ukranians, Latvians, Russians, Bulgarians, Africans and Cubans. One sensed an air of excitement in all of them. This would be their first solo flight.

A helicopter landed and a tall serious looking youth emerged. His name is Alvaro Martins de Sa Sandu, and he comes from Mozambique.

I had been introduced to the two Mozambican students that morning. Alvaro has a compatriot here, Adelino da Silva, who is taking the same course. "In the autumn, we will get our 'wings'. Then we will go home to our country, where a big job is waiting for us."

High Quality Pilots

The flight school is a small city within a city. It is located on the east side, near the majestic Dnieper. Along the river are ranged the dormitories practical classrooms, laboratories and flight simulation halls. On the other side of the street is a stadium with a soccer field and a track.

Adelino dos Santos continued: "The school is attended by many young men from various republics of the Soviet Union. Because we are living together, we have come to know various aspects of life in your country very well."

These young men will soon return to their country. Will they be highly qualified specialists? I put the question to Vassil Brigadirenko, vice director of the school.

"We teach higher-level material, such as mechanical theory and metals technology. We feel that the pilots must have an extensive mastery of theory. Regarding the young men from Mozambique, I can assure you that they are among the most dedicated students. They apply themselves to their studies with the same determination with which the older ones fought colonialism ...."

OVERVIEW OF ROMANIAN COOPERATION, TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

Beira NOTICIAS DA BEIRA in Portuguese 7 Oct 80 p 8

[Excerpt] Based on the principles of respect for national independence and sovereignty, noninterference in internal affairs, equality of rights and mutual advantage, Romania is broadening and developing its economic relations with all the nations of the world.

Within this framework is the fruitful cooperation between Romania and Mozambique, cooperation strongly stimulated by meetings and discussions at the highest levels.

In view of the need to develop the two economies, specific measures have been established, leading to increased cooperation in various areas of activity, at long range, to the benefit of both parties. In this manner, through cooperative action in production, Romania is participating in the installation of a production line for railway cars, to produce 100 coaches per year, in the construction of a tractor factory with an initial capacity of 2,000 tractors a year, and in construction of a clothing factory and a group of companies for the manufacture of cotton goods. Bilateral cooperation appears in the agricultural sector as well, with effective action in animal husbandry and in land improvement, in particular.

At the same time, Romania is providing technical assistance to initiate and export some Mozambican industrial units, as well as assistance in the training of specialists in construction and public works, health, geology, mining and the textile industry.

LIST OF FIELDS COVERED IN GDR COOPERATION AGREEMENT

Beira NOTICIAS DA BEIRA in Portuguese 7 Oct 80 p 8

[Excerpts] According to the long-range program signed into agreement between the GDR and Mozambique, there will be a dynamic development of economic cooperation to the benefit of both countries. Political and economic relations have been intensified, particularly after the Mozambican visit of a party and government delegation led by Erich Honecker, secretary general of the SED and president of the GDR Council of State. The friendship and cooperation accord between the two countries, signed in Maputo, represents a solid foundation for the development of friendly and fruitful relations in all sectors of social life. Both countries start from the principle that political and ideological agreement should be accompanied by ever closer economic cooperation. Considering the growing volume of bilateral economic relations, a joint economic commission has been created to bring about conditions for a stable long-term development of these relations. The joint project has already achieved noticeable results.

For example, steps have been taken to coordinate programs, and the increase volume of trade exchange demonstrates that the national economies of the two countries complement each other to advantage.

During his visit to the GDR, Julio Carrilho, Mozambican chairman of the joint economic commission, member of the FRELIMO Central Committee and minister of industry and energy, underlined the significance of cooperation with the GDR in carrying out the goals established during the Third FRELIMO Party Congress with respect to the planned development of important sectors in the nation's economy. Among these sectors, for example, is the systematic exploitation of mineral resources, in which the GDR is providing important aid. The assistance provided by GDR miners to their Mozambican colleagues in Moatize following the large explosion in the Chapanga III mine is only one illustration of the cooperation between the GDR and Mozambique. Meanwhile, cooperation has been extended to other branches of industry.

GDR industrial and business firms are helping to build a textile factory and a truck assembly plant in Mozambique. There is also close collaboration in communications, transportation, agriculture, education and other sectors.

According to the corresponding agreements, 100 young Mozambicans are in the GDR, receiving sound training in various companies, and Mozambican cadres who will one day be employed as managers of state and cooperative agricultural enterprises are being trained by GDR specialists at the Agricultural Institute in Chimoio.

Among the widely varied relations, foreign trade has a distinguished place. In the first place, the GDR is providing complete factory installations, machinery and vehicles, including agricultural and construction equipment. From Mozambique, the GDR buys copra, cashew nuts, citrus fruits and other agricultural products, as well as mineral raw materials, for industrial and consumer use.

The rice harvest in the Limpopo region would have been inconceivable without the use of modern combines from Fortschritt, a GDR state company. Transport and water tank trucks of the W-50 line are already seen on roads all over Mozambique. This year the GDR began to supply tractors for agriculture and transport.

This commercial trade system is advantageous to both countries, consistent with the GDR's interest in importing Mozambican agricultural products and Mozambique's interest in importing capital goods from the GDR, as well. Economic relations between the GDR and the People's Republic of Mozambique are not restricted to trade exchange, but are instrumental in fomenting the industrialization of Mozambique and in expanding its export capacity.

PHYSICIAN ESTABLISHES FRIENDSHIP ASSOCIATION WITH ITALY

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 29 Oct 80 pp 1, 4

[Excerpts] An Italy-Mozambique Friendship Association was established recently in Brescia, a city in the region of Lombardy, in the northern part of that European country. This was revealed yesterday morning in Maputo by the association's president, Dr Luigi Corti in the course of an interview he gave to the Mozambican media.

Dr Luigi Corti, who worked as a cooperation officer in the People's Republic of Mozambique for 4 years, came to this country with a delegation from the International Cooperation Department of the Italian Ministry of Foreign Affairs for the purpose of establishing contact with the Mozambican government in the area of bilateral cooperation between the two countries.

Talking on this occasion about one of the main motives leading to the establishment of the association, Dr Corti stressed the importance and necessity of mutual knowledge and aid between the Mozambican and Italian peoples. The association consists of personalities from the communities of Brescia and Reggio Emilia, members of various political parties and labor unions.

Dr Luigi Corti developed the idea of establishing this association on the basis of a real knowledge of the Mozambican situation, the friendship and sympathy encountered during his stay in Mozambique, as he said. During an interview he stated that, upon arriving in Italy about 10 months ago, he established contacts with friends of the Mozambican people, some of whom had already been in Mozambique, with the objective of constituting the Italy-Mozambique Friendship Association. He also talked about the work done in Brescia by Fr Cesar Bertult, who is also from that province. He said, regarding this matter, that this clergyman, who had been supporting the Mozambican people ever since the armed national liberation struggle and who was expelled from the country by the colonial authorities, is also one of the founders of the association.

The support to be given to the Mozambican people will be in accord with the priorities stated by them and in conformity with the association's possibilities. Regarding particularly the field of health, the physician-gynecologist said that, when it comes to the materialization of the organization's ideals, it will be possible to support the RPM [People's Republic of Mozambique] in training cadres where there are still great difficulties.

The Italy-Mozambique Friendship Association will also periodically publish a magazine on the RPM in an effort to describe the real situation in Mozambique to the Italian people. Dr Luigi Corti said that this initiative is of special importance in view of the existence, in Italy, of newspapers and magazines which print much about Mozambique without having a real knowledge of what goes on here.

VIEIRA PRAISES BERLIN CONFERENCE DESPITE DIFFERENCE IN VIEWPOINTS

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 30 Oct 80 pp 1, 4

> [Text] The conference of parties which took place in Berlin constituted the highest manifestation so far of the unity and strength of the contemporary revolutionary movement. This statement was made by FRELIMO Party Central Committee member and minister-governor of the Bank of Mozambique Sergio Vieira shortly after his arrival in Maputo.

In addition to having attended that meeting, which took place in the capital of the GDR, where he headed the delegation of the FRELIMO Party, Sergio Vieira officially visited Bulgaria and Hungary in response to an invitation from the presidents of the national banks of those two socialist countries.

Referring to the communication presented by the FRELIMO Party to the Berlin conference, the third out of the four addresses constituting the basic topic, Sergio Vieira said that the communication was very well received and "to a great extent characterized the conference as such since it took up a series of new experiences." On that point and referring to remarks by the secretary-general of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany, Erich Honecker, the FRELIMO leader said that "Our party in many respects was entering virgin territory and in doing so it is seeking correct solutions to the specific problems which have come up and which have been enriched as a result of the discussion; I once again want to express my appreciation to comrade Erich Honecker, to the practice and theory of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism."

In a brief commentary on the dimension of that meeting, which was attended by 116 communist parties and organizations, Sergio Vieira observed that, "In addition to different viewpoints which might arise on one or the other specific problem, the conference created a great feeling of unity around the struggle for peace, around the struggle for national liberation and for the social emancipation of peoples, unity against imperialism, unity for the construction of socialism."

He noted that, in the course of the work which took place between 20 and 24 October, the three working commissions recorded 195 reports, with the active participation of practically all communist and worker parties, liberation movements, and various progressive forces of the contemporary world.

Talking about the official visit he made to the People's Republic of Bulgaria and the People's Republic of Hungary, in response to invitations from the presidents of the national banks of those countries, Prof Vasselin Nikoforov and Dr Matyas Timar, the minister-governor of the Bank of Mozambique said that these visits were successful. He also mentioned participation in the autumn sessions of the International Investment Bank and the International Economic Cooperation Bank which are banking agencies of the CEMA member countries. He underscored the importance of strengthening links and establishing closer relations with the central banks of the CEMA member countries.

During the visit to the People's Republic of Bulgaria, Sergio Vieira was received by President Todor Zhivkov to whom he transmitted a message from the supreme leader of the Mozambican Revolution, President Samora Machel.

The minister-governor of the Bank of Mozambique then said that, during his passage through the French capital, he had discussions with financial groups that have relations with the People's Republic of Mozambique. In this connection he said that he met with Jean-Baptiste Doumeng, president and general manager of INTERAGRA. He noted that this group will launch an important protein [as published; protean] project in Mozambique to supply the city of Maputo. He also had a meeting with the president of the Bank of Paris, Mr Mussa, in the course of which new prospects of cooperation were touched upon. At the end of his stay in Paris, the minister-governor of the Bank of Mozambique had a friendly and very interesting meeting with the French minister of foreign trade.

CPSU OFFERS BOOKS FOR CADRE TRAINING

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 31 Oct 80 pp 1, 4

[Text] "This offer is an extremely important contribution to our party in the context of the process of permanently training cadres to direct the revolution." These words came from Jose Luis Cabaco, member, FRELIMO Party Central Committee, and minister of information, when, yesterday afternoon, he received an offer of 5,000 books at national party headquarters in Maputo.

This offer was made by the CPSU to the FRELIMO Part and consists essentially of the classical authors of Marxism-Leninism and other textbooks.

The Party Central Committee member said on that occasion that the books will be distributed through the party's libraries and training centers throughout the country.

Jose Luis Cabaco also at this point stressed the political and ideological identity between the FRELIMO Party and CPSU which, according to him, will be intensified by the coming visit of President Samora Machel to the USSR.

"Through this offer we can see that the Soviet Union as in the past, once again is at our side at this moment when we are involved in the construction of socialism and particularly in the ideological battle," the information minister emphasized in talking about relations between Mozambique and the USSR.

In conclusion he said that, "armed with more of these instruments, we will firmly continue our revolutionary march."

The ambassador of the Soviet Union in Mozambique said, in turn, that the books are a major contribution at this moment when the Mozambican people is committed to the construction of a socialist society.

This offer, said the ambassador, is of particular significance to the CPSU because the people of the Soviet Union at this moment is engaged in preparation for the celebration of another anniversary of the October Revolution.

We recall that the CPSU has already made various other offers of books to FRELIMO as contributions to the training of cadres in our party.

MACHEL GREETINGS TO PRC ON ANNIVERSARY

[Text] The People's Republic of China marked the 31st anniversary of its founding yesterday. President Samora Machel sent a message of greetings to the Chinese authorities on the occasion of this historic date, to which the struggle carried out by the Communist Party of China and by the late Chairman Mao Zedong, decisively contributed.

In Machel's message, the chief of the Mozambican state extends to the Chinese Communist Party, the government of the People's Republic of China and the Chinese people "warm greetings on the occasion of this date", expressing wishes that "the relations of friendship, solidarity and cooperation existing between the parties, governments and peoples of the two countries may develop more and more".

ADEQUATE FOOD SUPPLY SYSTEM HAS POLITICAL IMPLICATIONS

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 19 Oct 80 pp 1, 4

> [Text] One of the major goals of the conference held yesterday in Maputo and chaired by Aranda da Silva, minister of domestic trade, was to create conditions to publicize the mechanisms and function of the new supply system more fully in the districts of the capital.

The basic purpose of the conference was to meet with members of the party and mass democratic organizations, provincial assembly deputies and invited representatives of various government agencies, to explain the functioning of the supply system, which is scheduled to go into effect at the end of this year in Greater Maputo.

"We want the people to take part in implementing the tasks assigned by our party", the minister of domestic trade said in the course of the meeting.

"Our party leadership has determined that a correct method must be organized for the distribution of products to the people, through the implementation of a new supply system. Without public participation, however, it is impossible to organize distribution", the government official added.

Da Silva appealed to the public to respond to our party's desire to solve the supply problems, declaring that "the major factor in the resolution of these problems is increased production and productivity, but this effort should be repaid by seeing that the product is properly distributed to the people".

According to the document studied by the participants in this conference, the new supply system is a method for the just distribution of the existing essential goods, insuring that the people obtain a minimum of the basic necessities.

In addition to explaining how the new system will work, the document also explained the background for its creation. The explanations covered everything from the preliminary work to the acquisition of the supply card by which each family will be assigned to a particular store or consumer cooperative.

It is noted that the document on the new supply system was fully analyzed in working groups and then in plenary session, which made it possible to clear up the questions of some of the participants.

Political Aspects

"To resolve the supply problem is to resolve most of the political problems in the city of Maputo", said Minister da Silva, defining one of the major goals of the new system. In a first phase, the system will go into effect in the capital, and will then be extended to other urban centers, with priority given to the large cities.

Placing the process within the framework of the political and organizational offensive launched by President Samora Machel, the domestic trade minister said this is one of the basic items in the implementation of the given guidelines.

On the other hand, Minister da Silva warned that the enemy was sure to be active during the implementation of the new system.

"The profiteers and speculators are not going to like this system. Hence we must be prepared for the reaction that will come, because the enemy will act; it will try to see that the new supply system is not correctly applied. We must be on guard against this."

Mario Guerreiro, director of the Office of Organization of Supply for the City of Maputo, presented a situation report on the progress of the preparations to implement the new system.

The participants at the conference made a contribution of 480.00 meticals to assist the victims of the drought that is devastating the national territory.

MACHEL STRESSES CLASS IDEOLOGY OF BANK WORKERS

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 5 Oct 80 p 4

[Excerpts] President Samora Machel praised the great patriotic spirit displayed by bank workers from Rovuma to Maputo, in a meeting held early yesterday afternoon in Maputo. He stressed the need for their continued maximum dedication and effort, so that the goals established with the founding of the state bank in the People's Republic of Mozambique are reached in the shortest time possible.

During this meeting, held after a visit to the headquarters of the Bank of Mozambique, Marshal Samora Machel emphasized the fact that, in other parts of the world, the bank is always an instrument of the classes in power and therefore at the service of an ideology. Our country is no exception to this rule. Here, too, the bank serves the interests of the working masses and is guided by an ideology, Marxism-Leninism, the ideology of the FRELIMO Party. The party is represented in the state bank by local cells, which are the vanguard and are made up of those elements who have proved in practice that they deserve to represent all the others.

The meeting was held in the large public auditorium of the main branch of the Bank of Mozambique. Hundreds of workers from various Maputo banking institutions were present, representing their colleagues all over the country.

President Samora Machel was accompanied by the Bank of Mozambique's minister and deputy minister, governors Sergio Vieira and Prakash Ratilal, respectively, and by the president cabinet chief, Luis Bernardo Honwana.

Various state bank leaders, administrators and guests were also present.

The meeting started with a speech by the Bank of Mozambique's minister, Governor Sergio Vieira who, in the name of all the bank workers, welcomed President Samora Machel.

Some Steps Were Taken

"We officials and workers cannot yet say that our mission has been accomplished, comrade commander-in-chief. It is only correct to state that some steps were taken," declared Sergio Vieira, adding: "We have the nucleus, the flame, which is the party's cell. Today, workers are in the party ranks, and most important the great majority in the cadres of vigilante groups and mass organizations are asserting their patriotic conscience and are growing politically."

However, within this process, there were elements who deserted the fight, there were elements who committed treason. As the bank's minister-governor stated, "There was a leader and even a vice-governor, there were administrators, managers and workers who opted for desertion, treason and flight."

Nevertheless, this purification was beneficial as Sergio Vieira stressed, since it improved our quality and made us gain new strength.

In connection with "new strength" the Bank of Mozambique's minister-governor noted that this year 300 youths from all provinces of the country were admitted to state bank schools. The training of these elements will contribute to the easing of the staff shortages affecting the state bank.

As a matter of fact, according to Sergio Vieira, about 80 percent of the state bank workers have a scholastic level below the 9th grade. "We cannot implement the bank's complex tasks with such a frail basis," said Sergio Vieira, adding: "Increasing our knowledge is a condition for survival."

President Samora's Words

Later, the FRELIMO Party chairman and president of the People's Republic of Mozambique, Marshal Samora Moises Machel, addressed the audience.

In his speech, the top party and governmental official started by praising the qualities of the Mozambican people: "Talented men, good students, hard workers, determined, altruistic, dedicated to their country and their people. Men who are not individualists, chauvinists, vain, but proud to be Mozambican, learning by experience."

President Samora Machel then said that the revolution in the country is a daily endeavor. It is against opposition to change, against fatalism. It liberates our self-confidence, it increases the value of man and the intellectual capacity of each, it gives men the necessary strength to win. But this strength is only possible because our country has a party, the FRELIMO party, with a strong ideology.

Speaking more specifically about the bank, the Mozambican chief of state declared that in other parts of the world, the bank is at the service of the classes in in power and of their ideologies. In our country the bank is at the service of the people and of the proletariat's ideology, and this ideology emanates from the FRELIMO Party, guide and leader of our entire society.

As an example, Samora Machel noted that in Western capitalist nations the banks are in the hands of the bourgeoisie. The exploiting class in power uses the bank to perpetuate its exploitation. There are countries where big bankers choose the president of the republic most suited to their needs, the one who will not raise a finger against the exploiting class.

The party is established in the Mozambique state bank. "There are not many members of the party in the bank yet," said President Samora Machel, adding, however, that the few existing ones are the "absolute majority" because they represent all the people who selected them.

Meeting With Party Members

Before proceeding to the general meeting with the bank workers, President Samora Machel had a brief meeting with party members in the Bank of Mozambique, impressing on them the need to intensify their political work among their colleagues, in an attempt to mobilize them and gain new members for the party.

He also said that party members in the Bank of Mozambique should daily cultivate those qualities for which they were chosen as the people's representatives.

EGYPTIAN, ITALIAN, PORTUGUESE AMBASSADORS PRESENT CREDENTIALS

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 5 Oct 80 pp 1-3

[Text] Friday, appointed ambassadors from the Arab Republic of Egypt Mohamed Bassioni, from the Italian Republic, Patrizio Schmidlin and from the Republic of Portugal, Jose Pires Cutileiro, presented their credentials to the president of the People's Republic of Mozambique, Samora Machel.

During the three separate ceremonies, President Samora Machel stressed his intention to develop the best cooperation ties between our country and theirs.

During the meeting with the new Egyptian ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary, Samora Machel stressed that "the African countries must strive for the total liberation of the continent, play an adequate role in the OAU and the nonalined movement, and must engage themselves in economic development, the recovery of their dignity and personality and the utilization of natural resources for the good of their people."

During his speech, Italian Ambassador Patrizio Schmidlin, referred to the existing cooperation ties between the two countries and expressed hope that collaboration efforts between Mozambique and Italy in the technical, scientific, economic and commercial sectors will be strengthened. Praising the spirit of independence of the People's Republic of Mozambique, Patriozio Schmidlin noted the specific willingness of the Italian side to cooperate in the transportation and communication plan, in geological prospecting and in medical-sanitary support. The Italian diplomat underlined the willingness of his government to exert its influence in the financial circles of the European Economic Community, adding that his country will be represented at the governmental level at the next economic summit in southern Africa, to be held in Maputo in November.

The Italian ambassador showed an interest in cooperating with Zimbabwe and in the role that Mozambique could play there. He concluded by extending an invitation from his government to President Samora Machel to visit Italy.

In reply, President Samora Machel expressed his conviction that the cooperation between Mozambique and Italy will be developed and increased, emphasizing "the need for accelerated steps to increasingly shorten the distance between the two countries."

The last ambassador to present his credentials was Jose Pires Cutileiro. On the occasion, the Portuguese representative to the People's Republic of Mozambique delivered a message from Prime Minister Sa Carneiro to President Samora Machel.

The Mozambican chief of state made some remarks about relations between the two countries.

Samora Machel said that there is a common desire on both sides to develop the best of relations, a fact which has been influenced by the delegations which have visited the country and have had an effect on relations of state.

The Mozambican president stated that it is necessary to identify the areas of possible cooperation, thereby creating a solid basis within a context of mutual advantage.

Samora Machel formulated the wish that future steps in cooperation between Mozambique and Portugal will result in exemplary relations between two independent countries.

The last Portuguese ambassador left Mozambique in July 1979. Diplomatic representation has so far been carried out by a charge d'affaires.

YOUTH ORGANIZATION'S PROVINCIAL SECRETARIAT DISSOLVED

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 5 Oct 80 p 4

[Excerpts] For failure to carry out its duties and lack of liaison with the districts, the Mozambique Youth Organization provincial secretariat was dissolved in Maputo, Zacarias Kupela, secretary general of that mass organization announced in a meeting held yesterday morning at Maputo's School of Commerce.

This decision was taken during a provincial meeting of the OJM [Mozambique Youth Organization] secretariats after a survey of the situation of this democratic mass organization by a brigade of the national secretariat which has been working in the districts, suburbs, schools and businesses in this province.

After a brief speech by the OJM secretary general, a member of this organization's national secretariat presented a report by the brigade appointed for Maputo Province, which noted, among other uncovered irregularities, the failure of the provincial secretariat and district secretariats to carry out their duties, the nonexistence of structures of this mass organization in some districts and the lack of coordination between province and districts.

That member of the national secretariat stressed that these actions have discredited the OJM.

In the context of the work that was carried out, he pointed out some successes in the participation of the youth in the development of Niassa, the construction of a maternity clinic in the Magude district, the reconstruction of the areas devastated by the war in the Gaza, Manica and Tete provinces, and the organiztion of recreational facilities.

Following the analysis of the situation of the OJM in this province, marred by the above-mentioned irregularities, the secretary general of this organization, Zacarias Kupela, announced the dissolution of the old secretariat and decided to appoint Adao Covane as provincial secretary and Udorico Dengo for the city of Maputo.

FUNCTIONS, PROBLEMS OF IMMIGRATION SERVICE DESCRIBED

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 12 Oct 80 p 1

[Excerpts] As part of the celebration of 11 October--Popular Vigilance Day and the fifth anniversary of the creation of SNASP [National People's Security Service]--the new facilities of the National Immigration Service [DNM] were inaugurated yesterday in Maputo.

At the inaugural ceremony, Jacinto Soares Veloso, Mozambique's minister of security, made a lengthy tour of the new facilities.

As an official of the National Immigration Service explained to the press, the facilities were moved from Avenida Eduardo Mondlane to Avenida Ho Chi Minh mainly in order to improve service to the public, since the old facilities were inadequate for the proper function of an institution whose responsibilities have been increasing year by year.

The main duty of the DNM is to control the movement of individuals into and out of the country. Thus the DNM is principally engaged in issuing passports and entry and exit visas. It also deals with questions related to the authorization for establishment of residence by foreigners in the country, as well as issuance of their identity papers.

According to the DNM official, the service passed through a difficult phase from 1975 to 1978. Today, the institution has improved considerably in its service to the public, although the work is now more intensive and complex. Now, for example, it takes from 1 to 15 days, at most, to issue a passport, depending on the degree or urgency and the priority of the matter. There are cases, however, in which certain citizens residing outside Maputo send their requests directly to the National Service instead of using the provincial offices, which often causes delays of up to 30 days.

Another difficulty still facing the DNM has to do with the issuance of entry visas. In effect, many foreigners residing in countries where the People's Republic of Mozambique has no diplomatic representation are obliged to request an entry visa by writing directly to the DNM, which makes the process slow. A visa that could be obtained within 15 days may take as long as a month.

Finally, the DNM official reported that, on occasion, foreign residents neglect to renew their documents of residency and identity, which gives rise to annoyance and anxiety, because the DNM may be obliged to levy fines or withdraw authorization enabling these citizens to remain in the country.

INHAMBANE PORT OPERATION OPENS NEW PHASE IN TRANSPORTATION

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 16 Oct 80 pp 1-2

[Report by Benjamin Faduco]

[Excerpts] The reopening of the port of Inhambane constitutes a point of departure for greater control and even savings with respect to cargo transport, which is currently undergoing a crisis, particularly in this province.

In effect, control in this sector is now extremely lax, which inevitable leads to a diversion of products and even of raw materials needed in the production centers.

Various products, predominantly copra and citrus fruits, are shipped by truck every day from Inhambane to Maputo. Instead of being properly delivered to the factories, they are simply diverted and sold at highly speculative prices, with no regard for the needs of our industry.

To prevent this, it is urgent that the Cargo Information Centers become dynamic and operative as quickly as possible. Specifically, they must supervise the cargo movements in the province and determine what type of transport should be used, maritime or overland.

If measures to this end are not taken, the effort spent reactivating the port will be wasted. The new transport situation in this province created by the reopening of the port of Inhambane dictates that some alternatives to the extensive use of the highway fleet be defined immediately.

Actually, it is not advisable, much less profitable, to continue long-distance overland shipping between Inhambane and Maputo Provinces, or even to Sofala and Manica. With regular coastal shipping between Maputo and Inhambane (there is already a Beira connection), it is no longer necessary to use highway transport. Moreover, the latter affords smaller cargo capacity and is much less profitable commercially, considering increased fuel costs.

In the region south of the Rio Save, highway transport should be used mainly at the interdistrict level, and not at interprovince or regional levels, for the reasons cited above.

POPULATION PERCEIVES ADVANTAGES OF COMMUNAL VILLAGES

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 29 Oct 80 p 3

[Article by Benjamin Faduco: "Population Feels Advantages of Living in Communal Villages in Daily Life"]

> [Excerpts] Conditions are favorable and support and organization are absolutely necessary. The real value of collectively organized life and production in the communal villages is now beginning to be realized by the major portion of the population who still live scattered and today suffers from the scourge of hunger in the Province of Inhambane. Conditions are favorable and a specific support and organization program must be implemented immediately.

While the people who today live in a communal village being set up in Cometela, Rumbatsatsa, Mahungane, in the district of Vilanculos or in the localities and sections of Mabote, Jofane, Macovane, Save, Papatane, in the district of Govuro, gets food products at its place of residence, others have to walk between 50 and 80 kilometers to get their supplies.

This is where we come to the difference between living an organized life and living scattered, without the possibility of immediate support in case of emergency situations, such as the drought which is currently severely hitting hundreds of thousands of Mozambicans.

In the localities of Muapsa, Cometela, and Mahungane, in the Vilanculos district, we had an opportunity to talk to many persons who still live in isolation and we saw that they are beginning to recognize the advantages deriving from community life.

These are the localities where the future rural cities are now forcefully and vigorously springing up--the cities which are now communal villages, along with some of the persons who come in to get supplies and who are now beginning to be attracted by the relatively easy way in which the inhabitants of those localities are managing to resolve some of their problems.

Some of those people are even beginning to ask to be allowed to settle down in the communal village.

Due to some of the advantages which the communal villages offer already today--although this is true to a relatively minor degree (since we must not forget that everything cannot be built overnight)--we can currently observe great adherence to the movement for the formation of organized collective life centers.

Even in those regions where the population is still strongly linked to ways of life inherited from the feudal and traditional societies, the people are today aware of the importance of the communal villages as the only way to guarantee an improvement in their social and economic life.

When There is No Incentive, There is Relaxation and Retreat

Following the mobilization of the population for the formation of communal villages and the execution of other tasks, it is necessary always to guarantee continuity and support which can be provided through incentives. When this does not happen--and this precisely is the biggest problem of some of the communal villages now being formed--then there is relaxation and retreat, in summary, there is a contradiction between theory and practice.

Talking to various peasants who are busy building the communal villages in the various localities and sections in the districts of Vilanculos and Govuro, we found that the biggest difficulty they are facing springs from the lack of procurement of some materials.

In addition to the difficulties which we pointed out earlier and which constitute an obstacle to the progress of the communal villages, there are other situations whose correction we believe is urgent.

This is true, for example, involving the large quantities of poles which are stacked up at the edge of the forest and which have to be transported to the places where the future communal villages will be erected. The transportation requirement arises and is justified by the great distance separating the pole-cutting areas from the sections marked for housing construction.

As far as the movement for the formation of communal villages particularly in regions currently hit by the drought is concerned, we can say that, on the one hand, there is great enthusiasm among the majority of the local population whereas, on the other hand, we continue to observe a rather poor follow-up, as well as a lack of effective support and organization, adding up to a situation that must be corrected as quickly as possible.

UN PEACE PLAN MAY TAKE EFFECT IN MARCH 1981

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 3 Nov 80 p 2

[Text] THE RED letter day for the start of the UN independence operations in SWA might be set for March 15.

Richard Walker of the Rand Daily Mail reports that this date was proposed in closed-door Security Council consultations. But, South African officials are warned against over-optimism.

The March date is keyed into hopes of achieving internationally recognised independence by the end of next year, it is understood.

The UN General Assembly this month is expected to demand a launch date by the end of this year, with SWA admitted as a UN member a year from now.

In a bid to clinch Pretoria's acceptance of a date, and with a firm commitment to the long stalled UN plan, assorted diplomatic forces have been pushing for prior all-party talks under UN auspices. But their form and nature remain vague.

Swapo and its backers want them to deal only with "the modalities" of the UN plan, while SA sees them expanded to tackle such big issues as White rights and the Republic's relationship with the future state.

In a continuing whirl of diplomatic activity, Secretary General Kurt Waldheim held private discussions on the issue with a special envoy dispatched by President Kaunda and then with Mr Patrick Bolokor, Nigeria's Minister of State for Foreign Affairs.

West German Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has also been in contact by phone.

With reports being alternately pessimistic and optimistic, the UN's Pretoria mission leader Mr Brian Urquhart hinted at step-by-step progress, but he remained very guarded.

Dr Waldheim's spokesman said that things were at a very sensitive stage and he declined to speculate when the formal report to the Security Council will be made.

Angola has long been seen as the key to delivering Swapo in any deal and diplomats in New York took seriously the Portuguese report that Angola has offered to cut off military support for Swapo in exchange for SA ceasing its support for Unita. Direct talks between SA and Angola have several times been reported.

But UN mission appeared concerned at some reports of a "breakthrough" and officials stressed that the UN still has to meet Pretoria's criteria of impartiality before anything can be agreed upon.

NDJOBA RESIGNS FROM DTA, NATIONAL ASSEMBLY

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 3 Nov 80 p 4

[Text] WINDHOEK: The Owambo leader, Pastor Cornelius Ndjoba, had written a letter to the executive of the ruling DTA in the SWA National Assembly, resigning as DTA President and member of the National Assembly.

The Chief Secretary of the DTA, Mr Johan de Waal disclosed in Windhoek on Friday that Pastor Ndjoba's resignation would only be formally announced once the DTA executive had discussed it and once the National Assembly had had its next sitting.

Mr De Waal said the DTA executive would meet during next month to discuss Pastor Ndjoba's letter of resignation.

Pastor Ndjoba, the second president of the DTA, is also chairman of the Owambo Executive Committee and formerly Chief Minister of Owambo in the old dispensation.

The first president of the DTA was the assassinated Herero Paramount Chief, Chief Clemens Kapuuc.

Mr De Waal said it had been clear from Pastor Ndjoba's letter of resignation that he was only resigning as National Assembly member and DTA executive, but he still supported the DTA.

He said it was common cause that Pastor Ndjoba, as traditional leader of the Owambos, had worried a great deal about his people in the north while he was in Windhoek for National Assembly sittings.

Owambo, which borders on Angola in the north, bears the main brunt of the SWA bush war.

In his letter, Pastor Ndjoba wrote he had decided to resign from the DTA and National Assembly because his people needed him and he had no time to fulfil his function as president of the alliance, Mr De Waal said.

"I wish to thank you and the executive (of the DTA) sincerely for the cooperation and support during my period of office and I wish you strength in your difficult task," Pastor Ndjoba said in his letter.

"Please be assured of my full support of the DTA and that of my people." — Sapa

MUDGE COMMENTS ON NDJOBA'S RESIGNATION

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 3 Nov 80 p 4

[Text]

MR DIRK MUDGE, Chairman of the DTA and the SWA Ministers' Council reacted last night to the resignation of Pastor Cornelius Ndjoba of Owambo as President of the DTA and member of the National Assembly and said there was no hidden meaning in Pastor Ndjoba's decision to step out of first tier politics.

Mr Mudge told The Advertiser that Pastor Ndjoba's resignation from the National Assembly was a consequence of Proclamation AG 8 of 1980, which specified that a chairman of an Executive Committee would not be allowed to sit in the National Assembly.

Pastor Ndjoba preferred to remain Chairman of the Owambo Executive Committee and therefore had to resign. He decided to make his decision public at this stage because there would be no election in Owambo and he didn't see any reason to delay the announcement.

Referring to Pastor Ndjoba's resignation as President of the DTA, Mr Mudge said the case had been discussed in depth and the decision was reached that this was not the type of position for someone who preferred to concentrate on second-tier politics as Pastor Ndjoba had now decided to do.

The DTA was a political alliance concerned with politics on a national level, Mr Mudge said.

EDITORIAL URGES SENSE OF NATIONAL UNITY

Windhoek ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG in German 28 Oct 80 p 2

[Editorial by Joachim Puetz: "A Territory Without a People"]

[Text] Peoples have disappeared from the annals of history through loss of their territories, their homelands. Likewise, countries have vanished from the map because dissension among the population invited armed aggression from neighboring countries. Peoples that were plunged into domestic power struggles, stemming from religious, class or ethnic differences, lost the dynamism, the patriotism and love for one's country, needed to preserve their territorial boundaries. Many peoples have craved territorial expansion and have stamped their own identity on neighboring countries. By the same token, other peoples have lost their territories through domestic wrangling.

Is Southwest Africa a territory without a people? An assemblage of domestic factions trampling the national interest in a jousting match with one another? Is it possible for a people to continue to exist in today's Africa without an identity and without patriotism? Many observers of the country's recent history respond with a resounding yes to the first questions and with an equally unequivocal no to the last question. Anyone doubting or wishing to confirm this diagnosis need only ask any of our fellow countrymen on the street what he is. Practically nine times out of ten the reply will be: "Herero, German, Afrikaner, Bushman, Portuguese, etc." The reply will not be: "I am a Southwester." Only when abroad do some occasionally admit to being "Southwesters."

Anyone taking time out from the daily rat race and looking around level-headedly is forced to conclude that: 1) color consciousness (black/white) tops the list of national priorities with ethnic consciousness (German, Afrikaner, Herero, Ovambo, etc.) ranking second; 2) this "pseudo-nationalism" in its various guises almost completely supersedes genuine nationalism (patriotism).

If these conclusions hold, it means simply that SWAPO or any other "interested party" has an open invitation to strike down the existing order at the earliest opportunity. Then the successor to white imperialism (black "nationalism") will not delay in taking over our territory.

The bitter irony of this situation is that it is precisely the champions of so-called "nationalism" who are stabbing patriotism in the back. In their blind zeal these sometimes deluded and occasionally hostile zealots for "racial purity" continue to drive wedges between the different population groups. They spark rivalry just when they could give the country a single people through unity. Our only salvation lies in mutual empathy among all the citizens and a love of country nourished by a common destiny. Meantime, these blind zealots are importing a 30-year-old racism into a continent that is just giving birth to its own reverse racism--black nationalism. Such would-be nationalists and their somewhat less enthusiastic cohorts will most likely simply succeed in inflaming the two racisms against one another. Then one day there will be a bloody tooth and nail confrontation to decide the issue. Need we remind such "would-be Spartans" that Sparta succumbed?

But even those using cultural (not racial) interests as a catchword for tightening the screws spark dissension. An unrelenting demand for rights simply unleashes a "me-too" chain reaction. It makes all the other groups continually conscious again of their self-identity. Recognition of one's proper cultural should be sought in oneself not from others.

Enough of pluralism and group interests! The nation of Southwest Africa is aborning and there is still no people of Southwest Africa. The time cries for national unity. Anyone not acknowledging this need should just as well pack his bags and hide away to where he can revel at will in his own down-home culture trove. Africa bids him adieu.

SWAPO REPORTEDLY RELOCATING BASES IN ANGOLA

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 5 Nov 80 p 2

[Text] WINDHOEK: The SWA Ministers' Council has said in Windhoek that it had received reliable information that Swapo was moving its own armed bases as close as possible to MPLA government installations in Angola so that it could "shelter" behind that country's forces.

The Council warned that the organisation's "cowardly ploy" to seek refuge from South African and SWA security forces when "it attacks and murders innocent people" in the Territory would not succeed.

The people of SWA wanted to live in peace with their northern neighbours in Angola.

It was important that peace and stability prevailed in this part of the continent and that solutions were found to outstanding political problems.

"But people who offer protection to Swapo instead must accept that they themselves may get hurt in the process," the Council said.

It was tragic, the Council said, that Swapo's senseless violence was even further prolonged while all the elements already existed for a political settlement in SWA.

All parties involved with the SWA question had agree that the Territory should be granted independence and the fact that Swapo still continued its violence could be attributed to little else but the personal aspirations of people like Mr Sam Nujoma, the Swapo leader.

Mr Nujoma had never once subjected himself to a democratic election, not even within his own organisation, and his claims that he represented the SWA people were also untested, the Council added.

It warned the Swapo leader that the SWA peole could not be robbed of their birthright — even at gunpoint.

The Ministers' Council also expressed disappointment that no attempt had been made by the UN to prove its impartiality in the SWA independence issue, as had been requested during the recent Pretoria talks with UN officials. — Sapa

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS--SWA will in future handle its own imports and exports, a task which was formerly carried out by the South African Government, according to a statement by the SWA Secretary for Economic Affairs. The statement said that control over all imports and exports to the Territory which was presently being enforced by the SA Director of Imports and Exports in Pretoria, would be taken over by the SWA department of Economic Affairs with effect from November 5. Details and regulations would be published soon in the SWA Official Gazette, it said.--Sapa [Text] [Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 4 Nov 80 p 2]

MINE EXPLOSION DEATHS--Another seven people have been killed in landmine explosions in northern SWA, bringing to 14 the number of civilians who are known to have died in landmine incidents in the Territory's operational border area since Sunday. The Secretary of the Owambo Adminstration, Mr Daan Oosthuizen, said the latest dead were the victims of two seperate landmine blasts in central Owambo. [as published] The explosion took place on Tuesday morning and, in both instances, double mines were used. Five people were killed and another four seriously injured in the first incident, which occurred about 12 km west of Ombalantu on the Ruacana road. The second explosion, which claimed two lives, took place only 18 km east of Ogongo, also on the Ruacana route. A single landmine incident on Sunday claimed the lives of seven poeple, three of them children, near Ondangwa, the Owambo administrative centre.--Sapa [Text] [Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 6 Nov 80 p 3]

SHIPANGA ACCUSED--UNPP, the United Namibia Peoples Party, has accused Mr Andreas Shipanga, leader of SWAPO of making "a false and detestable statement" by saying that the those who had formed the new UNPP were former SWAPO D members who broke away. [as published] In a statement to the press from the Steering Committee of the UNPP (Mr Hizipo Shikondombolo, Mr Matheus Haikali, Titus Henguva and Erastus Homateni) it was said that there was no truth in Mr Shipanga's statement that two of the members who had broken away from SWAPO D were unemployed. Reacting to Mr Shipanga's question as to who the members or office-bearers of the new party were, the UNPP said that it would like to inform Mr Shipanga that the Party's National Excecutive Committee consisted of more than 20 members in comparison to SWAPO D's former Executive Committee which only had six members. [as published] The following people, according to the statement, were office-bearers in the UNPP: H Shikondombolo--President; M Haikali--Secretary General; T Henguva--National Tressurer; S Ndeikwila--Secretary for Information and Publicity; E Kasheeta--National Organiser and E Homateni--Secretary for Foreign Affairs. LOCAL STEEL PLANTS SAID HARMED BY IMPORTS

[Article by Henry Atenaga]

[Text] Nigeria's indigenous steel industry is being threatened by cheaper and freely imported steel rods from European and Japanese producers.

One of the indigenous companies Nigersteel Company Limited Enugu is so threatened that in recent times it had to cut prices by 20 per cent and now sells below cost.

According to the Company's General Manager Mr N. N. Arya, Nigersteel has about seven hundred tons of steel rods of various sizes pilled up in its stockyard for want of customers. [as published]

The imported rods are cheaper because being long established, the foreign producers enjoy benefits of mass production including their home Government's subsidy of exported steel.

In addition, because of their nearness to source of supply both plant installation cost and raw materials are cheaper for them than producers here.

To make matters worse for the indigenous producers, NEPA's bill per ton of steel is about N65, a figure which industry sources maintain is the highest in the world. Then there is the question of import and excise duties they presently pay on all steel inputs and products.

Further, in the wake of the recent Government guideline on N100 minimum wage and benefits perks for junior workers, indigenous rolling mill workers have been agitating for their own entitlements.

"It may be desirable" declared Mr N. N. Arya in desperation "for the Federal and State governments to come to the aid of the industry by subsidizing its products".

"It may also be necessary to increase the duty on imported steel rods and the raw materials for re-rolling mills...so that the wholly indigenous products can compete favourably with the imported ones" and the young industry "could survive and look forward to a better future".

STEEL WORKERS TO HAVE NEW PAY, FRINGE BENEFITS STRUCTURE

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 25 Oct 80 p 1

[Article by Dipo Akinsiku]

[Text] AJAOKUTA and Aladja steel plants when commissioned will be run as strictly profit making government concerns.

They will not be parastatals under any government department or ministry.

The acting Minister of Steel, Malam Mamman Ali-Makele, made this clear in Lagos yesterday.

He was speaking at a weekly personality interview programme, 'gateway' organised by the Association of Airport Correspondents (ACA).

He said that to this end a salary structure for the employees of the plants, which would be independent of the civil service grade level (GL) salary structure was being worked out.

The salary structure was being aimed at encouraging personnel trained to man the plants stay on their jobs, he said.

Malam Mamman Makele disclosed that about 500 million Naira had so far been spent on Ajaokuta Plant to date while the Aladja Direct Reduction Steel Plant had consumed 400 million Naira.

More than 3 billion Naira is expected to be spent to get the steel plants off the ground, the minister said.

He disclosed that the Ajaokuta plant would employ about 10,000 Nigerians while 6,000 workers would be engaged in the production of iron rods and billets at Aladja Plant in Warri, Bendel State.

The minister reiterated that trial production of billets and iron rods would begin in July next year at Aladja while steel would roll from Ajaokuta in Kwara State by June 1983.

The minister said that plans were under way for the establishment of two steel training schools at Ajaokuta and Onitsha in Anambra State.

The Ajaokuta Training School would have an initial intake of 2,000 students annually, he said.

According to Malam Mamman Makele, 2,000 Nigerians are undergoing training in India, Germany, the Soviet Union and some East European countries on steel production and its technicalities.

He revealed that arrangements have also been completed for the expansion of the present Ajaokuta airstrip to take big aircraft like the F28 type.

Speaking on the housing programme for expatriate and Nigerian employees of the plants, Malam Mamman Makele said about 15,000 housing units would be constructed.

There would also be recreational facilities like cinemas, hotels, clubs and other conveniences.

NEWLY INAUGURATED KADUNA OIL REFINERY DESCRIBED

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 25 Oct 80 pp I, IX

[Article by Dr Ike Nwobodo, edited by Raymond Anyamikegh: "Towards Self Sufficiency"]

[Text] THE opening of the Kaduna Refinery will go a long way towards helping the country cope with its fast rising demand for fuel.

With a capacity of 100,000 barrels per stream day [BPSD], is an integrated refinery that will produce a variety of petroleum products and by-products when fully operational.

The refinery consists of two distinct refining units, each with a capacity of 50,000 BPSD. One unit processes light Nigerian crude oil, while the second will process heavy imported crude oil.

The Nigerian light crude, from Gulf's Escravos crude and possibly from Shell's UOCC (Ughelli Quality Control Centre) crude oil, is basically naphtanic and will be used mostly to process fuel products. The heavy crude, which will be imported from Venezuela, Kuwait or Saudi Arabia, is paraffinic and will be used mainly for the production of lubricating oils, waxes and asphalt. It is necessary to import the heavy foreign crude because the Nigerian crude oil alone is not suitable for the production of lubricants.

PRODUCTS

The products of the refinery are based on processing 50,000 BPSD Nigerian crude for fuels and 50,000 BPSD of foreign crude oil lubricants. For the fuels, the products are:

L.P.G. — Propane/Butane mixture 10,000 metric tonnes per year (MT/Y).

Gasoline — Super and Five Star 1,211,000 MT/Y

Kerosine — Dual Purpose 260,000 MT/Y minimum and maximum of 1,040,000 MT/Y.

Gas Oil — 800,000 MT/Y.

Fuel Oil — Low and High Pour point 415,000 MT/Y.

FOR THE LUBE BASE OIL THE PRODUCTS ARE:

Lubricating Oil (Base Oils) — 250,000 MT/Y.

Wax (Basic) — 25,000 MT/Y.

Asphalt — 845,000 MT/Y Maximum.

Sulphur — 2,300 MT/Y.

These latter products — lubricating oil, wax, asphalt and sulphur — have not previously been produced in the country and had had to be imported. With the refinery at full gear, it is anticipated we will be exporting some of these products. In addition to the products from the fuel and lubricating complexes, there is a drum manufacturing plant that will produce 3,380 drums per day, a kerosine tin plant which will produce 2,400 eighteen-litre tins per hour and a wax mouldine and packaging unit which will handle about 770 cubic meters of wax per day.

The refinery complex was constructed in a record time of just under three years by Chiyoda Chemical Engineering and Construction Company Limited of Yokohama, Japan. The contract was signed on June 15, 1977 and the project was mechanically completed on April 15, 1980.

The project cost of N603 million includes the refinery proper, the administration building, a medical center, a 2,510 square meter warehouse, a restaurant, a laboratory, the main control building, raw water intake point and treatment plant, and its own power plant. It also includes a staff housing estate of 260 units complete with its infrastructure and necessary utilities.

With the raw water treatment plant and power plant, the refinery is independent and self sufficient in the production of its utilities. Raw water is drawn from the Kaduna River through a pipeline 14 kilometers long. There are two storage tanks with a total capacity of 150,000 cubic meters — enough water for 10 days. The power plant has an installed capacity of 42 mega watts of power with provisions to increase it to 56 megawatts.

The efficiency and effectiveness of the Kaduna Refinery will be enhanced by the network of pipelines and depots' all over the country. The widespread and alarming fuel shortage of the mid-seventies, which was blamed on growing demand and very poor and inadequate distribution of available stock, gave birth to the idea of not just a third refinery but also a comprehensive network of pipelines and storage depots around the country.

Three of the depots are attached directly to the three refineries. The other 16 are strategically scattered around the country with eight of them already functioning. The other eight are in advanced stages of completion and will become functional soon. Built at a cost of N196 million, the depots will bring the storage capacity to 90 days total supply and with the three refineries operating, should make the regular fuel shortage mostly a thing of the past.

The need for a third refinery was discerned through studies even before the second refinery at Warri was completed. It was felt that with the location of the first two refineries in the crude-oil producing areas in the South, siting a third refinery in the same area would increase the cost per litre of refined products to consumers in the northern part of the country. Thus as demand for refined petroleum products was increasing very rapidly, it was decided to site the third refinery in the north for cost and strategic reasons, hence the choice of Kaduna.

It was determined that it would be less involved and would cost less to transport crude oil by a pipeline to the north than to transport refined products to the growing northern markets by road or rail. Instead of building several pipelines, each to pump a different product from a refinery in the south to northern depots, or in the alternative pumping different products through the same pipeline with its inherent difficulties, costs and risks, it was decided to locate the refinery in the north.

From there refined products will be pumped to the northern depots while the two refineries in the south will continue to pump to the depots in the south and the middle regions of the country. This will eliminate long distance haulage by rail and road tankers with the consequent accidents and wear and tear on the roads.

There is also a strategic reason for siting refinery in the north. Locating all three refineries in the same geographic area would make the country much too vulnerable to sabotage or attacks in the case of any hostilities.

Another reason is that the existence of a refinery in Kaduna will stimulate the growth of a lot of industries in the area and help achieve the objective of spreading development opportunities across the country.

Kaduna city is, itself, situated in the center of the northern section of the country and can be described as the never center of industrial, commercial and administrative activities in the area. It is well linked by air, road and rail to all parts of the country.

ECONOMIC IMPACT:

It is anticipated that the Kaduna Refinery will have a tremendous positive impact on the national economy.

A major benefit is the provision of jobs and employment directly and indirectly to those engaged in providing services to the employees of the refinery. The refinery currently employs some 1,100 Nigerians and is expected to employ 1,500 persons ultimately.

The presence of the refinery will promote stable industrial growth by helping ensure sufficient fuel supply for both industrial domestic uses. The refinery will be a direct source of saving and a foreign exchange earner for the country.

It would be a shame, and indeed expensive, if the country at this stage were to depend on imported refined petroleum products for domestic and industrial uses while exporting in excess of two million barrels a day of crude oil. That the Kaduna Refinery will help alleviate this dependence on imports will be a big boost to the economy and the nation both financially and psychologically.

The country will be able to save money by exporting less crude and importing less refined products, especially lubricating oils.

SHELL PETROLEUM WORKERS REPORTED OUT ON STRIKE

Lagos BUSINESS TIMES in English 21 Oct 80 p 1

[Article by Jackson Imafidon]

[Text] Over 2,500 junior workers with the Shell Petroleum Development Company have gone on strike over the implementation of the 15% Federal Government's wages guidelines.

The industrial action started at the Warri and Port Harcourt locations of the company on Wednesday last week. Workers in the Lagos zone joined the following day.

Shell, a major oil company, produces about 60% of the total oil production in Nigeria and an industrial action within the company would be detrimental to the oil industry.

An official of the National Union of Petroleum and Natural Gas Workers, Mr. E. Okougbo, said that all previous efforts to get the management of the company to implement the 15% wages guidelines have not been successful.

He said that the meeting held between the leaders of the workers and the management of the company last week Monday ended in a disagreement. Mr Okougbo expressed surprise that an oil company such as Shell which makes a yearly profit of over ₦6 million could not afford to spend ₦1 million on salaries and maintenance of its workers.

Mr Chris Williams of the "PAFL" Division of the Shell Company, said that the cause of the dispute arose from the method applied by his company in implementing the 15% wages guidelines. He however refused to reveal the method his company used in implementing the guidelines when the BUSINESS TIMES asked last week.

Mr. Williams said that adequate efforts are being made to ensure that operations in all locations of the company inspite of the industrial action are not halted.

Early this year the Federal Government came out with an Incomes and wages guidelines for the 1980/82 period. The limit for wages increase for junior workers shall be 15% within the period and not more than 10% for senior workers.

The spokesman for the Shell Company said that this is the second industrial action being declared by the junior workers within this month, the first being two weeks ago.

He said that the industrial action was promptly called off to allow for peaceful negotiations between the management of the company and the union leaders.

An official of the Workers' Union, said that the industrial action was called off in the interest of the national economy but the workers decided to go back on their action when the management of Shell did show similar interest at resolving the dispute peacefully.

A top official in the industrial Relations Division of the Federal Ministry of Employment, Labour and Productivity confirmed that the ministry is aware of the industrial dispute between the management of Shell Company and its junior employees. He said that the ministry has stepped into the dispute but he would however not state the ministry's actions taken so far.

The oil industry used to be one of the essential sector of the economy under the military rule, that strikes by workers in the industry were forbidden by law. But officials in the Federal Ministry of Employment, Labour and Productivity would not say what operates now in the oil industry whether the laws have been relaxed or are being flouted.

VICE PRESIDENT-BACKED LAWYER ACCUSED OF SHADY DEALS

Enugu DAILY STAR in English 27 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] Our Political Investigation Bureau last week completed the first stage of a full-scale investigation into the mysterious sources of the wealth of an Enugu lawyer who now fronts for the Vice-President, Dr Alex Ekwueme, on the WEEKLY TRUMPET, the Nwobodophobist scandal sheet.

It is the story of a man who is all out to become a millionaire standing behind an organ which is busy fabricating rumours and scandals against his political opponents.

The name of the lawyer is Patrick Nwakoby.

When the Vice-President chose him as one of his frontmen on the WEEKLY TRUMPET the question of how clear he was himself did not apparently arise.

Dr Ekwueme's task then was how to find people to publish false reports to run down the Anambra State Governor, Chief Jim Nwobodo and his administration and to scandalise Dr Nnamdi Azikiwe into the bargain.

Barrister Nwakoby appeared then to have escaped any check on his past.

But among interesting facts uncovered by our political investigation bureau for a start is that the now weathly Mr Nwakoby has in fact not been practising the law which is his profession for years now.

The other revelations are these:

Revelation No 1: To begin with, Mr Nwakoby proved ungrateful to his brother who was said to have mismanaged funds to pay for his education. Patrick later went his own way, abandoned his poor brother and concentrated in amassing his own wealth. That brother of his later died in misery.

Revelation No. 2: While the Israelis were busy putting up the estate and the other buildings in Enugu and Lagos, did Nwakoby not start a four storeyed building of his own around Enugu at the same time--all in less than three years of his assuming office as the executive secretary of the African Real Estate and Investment Company, or more presisely since his return from overseas studies? [as published]

There is no need to go into the land deals he made at the end of the war for more details will follow soon.

Under the reorganisation, the department will be split into three divisions, namely domestic services, public enlightenment and external publicity divisions. Each of the divisions will be headed by a director and the directors will be responsible to the permanent secretary in the information department. ABUJA PLANS--All urban design and infrastructural consultants undertaking various projects at the new Federal Capital, Abuja, are to submit their implementation programmes to the Federal Capital Development Authority, FCDA. This is to enable to FCDA to determine the feasibility and acceptance of each project. The decision to follow this line of assessment was reached at a co-ordination meeting between the

FCDA, the designers and consultants held at the Murtala Muhammed Square, Kaduna, yesterday. The meeting which was convened to review the progress of work made by each consultant resolved to hold a quarterly meeting between the FCDA and its consultants from January next year. MAIZE IMPORT RESTRICTIONS--The Minister of State in the Ministry of Agriculture, Mr. Emmanuel Aguma, said in Ibadan that the Federal Government would place the importation of maize on restricted license. The minister told the News Agency of Nigeria (NAN) that poultry farmers should try to cope with the temporary inconvenience of the ban on the importation of maize. He stated that the importation should be seen as supplementary to the maize produced locally. The Minister pointed out that the importation of maize and other commodities discouraged the development of the local industry. COTTON SEED--About 150,000 tonnes of cotton seed will be bought this season by the licenced buying agents (LBAs). Domestic textile requirements of cotton lint has considerably improved to about 300,000 bales. These facts were contained in a speech delivered by the Purchasing Manager of the Nigerian Cotton Board (NCB), Alhaji Maikudi Kankia when declaring the 1980/81 cotton buying season open in Malumfashi on Monday. Lack of buying facilities was one of the principal factors that caused the decline of cotton production in the country, Alhaji Maikudi said. Other factors were lack of efficient improved techniques of production and the effective extension services for improved technology. Cotton seed production in the last four years were 246,154 tonnes in 1976/77 season but dropped to 117,191 tonnes in 1977/78. In 1978/79, he said, a record of 109,759 tonnes was achieved while in 1979/80 production of cotton dropped to 85,733 tonnes. UNONGO CLEARED--The former minister for special duties in charge of Steel projects, Mr Paul Unongo has been cleared by the Federal Government. A release by the chief press secretary to the President, Mr Charles Igo declared that Mr Unongo was merely a victim of speculations in view of the allegations made against him. He also claimed that President Shagari did not receive any copy of the anonymous letter containing the allegations. The statement disclosed that Mr Unongo was asked to proceed on a normal leave to which every minister is entitled adding that during his leave, some discreet investigations were conducted to ascertain whether or not there was any element of truth in the allegation contained in the anonymous letter. "Nothing of substance came out of this investigation," he said. The anonymous letter had claimed that Mr Unongo's wife had ₦20,000 sterling offered by BSC from Barclays Bank Limited. Mr Unongo also refuted that no person gave him ₦80,000 sterling for shopping or ₦56,000 to his wife on leaving London. [Excerpt] [Enugu DAILY STAR in English 24 Oct 80 pp 1, 3]

PAPER SHORTAGE PREDICTION--It has been predicted that by 1980, there would be worldwide acute shortage of papers and newsprints. Already the scarcity has been evident for some years now. In Nigeria, a paper production agreement has been reached between the Federal Government, Morgan Grenfell and Co. and a syndicate of banks totalling 100 million dollars for the Nigerian Newsprint Manufacturing Co. Ltd., at Oku-Iboku, Cross River State. British and French contractors will undertake the project with Parsons, Whittemore, Lyddon as consultants. Our foreign partners in this business must be sufficiently briefed about the industrial problems of this country such as wood, water and power supply. With no sufficient amount of forest reserve for wood stock, and given the erratic power supply system of this country plus the perennial shortage of water, it is difficult to see how the company could make it if no adequate arrangements are made well in advance to meet these needs. PDS SEEKING NATIONAL UNITY GOVERNMENT TO REPLACE PS

[Text] The pitch of Senegalese politics remains high, writes a correspondent. Some ten days ago word came out, reported in some newspapers, that President Senghor was preparing to resign to allow the Prime Minister, M. Abdou Diouf, to take over. This would give the latter time to settle in at the Presidency before the next election in February 1983.

In Dakar, meanwhile, a meeting of the teachers union, SUDES, resulted in violence. The meeting had been called to protest against measures taken by the government which were deemed unacceptable by the union. The government had moved a number of teachers from their posts to the provinces and had suspended 110 teachers following dissatisfaction earlier in the summer at the way in which examinations were being corrected. To resolve the immediate problem French technical assistance had been called in. The meeting, which took place in the centre of Dakar, had called together important delegations of teachers from all over the country. The attendance was much higher than the SUDES organisers had expected, and though the meeting had been banned by the governor of the Cap Vert region, the delegates assembled at the meeting point only to be dispersed by the police. There were several injuries. Four of the leading SUDES personalities, including the Secretary General, M. Mamadou N'Doye, have been requested by the authorities to hold themselves at the disposal of the justice department pending further inquiries.

This is the sort of incident which heightens the tension at the highest levels in the country. That President Senghor wishes to retire at a propitious moment to devote himself to his literary studies is no secret. Le Monde reported two weeks ago that the President may well announce his decision to retire during his traditional end of the year address to the nation, to be succeeded by M. Abdou Diouf. Under the constitution which was modified in 1976, the Prime Minister automatically succeeds the President until the end of the latter's mandate.

The problem facing the President is that in a year of considerable economic difficulty, the man seen as his successor has become the target for widespread criticism in political circles. There are doubts as to whether he has the political flair necessary to be President, though his technical abilities are never questioned. For President Senghor, the dilemma is whether he should resign soon to give his successor time to consolidate his position before the February 1983 elections or to hang on while political indecision reigns in the leadership of the ruling Parti Socialiste. M. Abdou Diouf has many enemies among those who of his contemporaries who rose to power in the early seventies. The President also knows that the longer he remains in power while the succession is undecided the greater the uncertainty that will grow in the country.

The opposition, notably the Parti Démocratique Senegalais, led by Maître Abdoulaye Wade — it has 15 of the 100 seats in the National Assembly — continues to insist that it is the best capable of uniting the opposition in forming an alternative government to that of the Parti Socialiste. During the recent PDS Congress, Maître Wade repeated his criticism of the government economic reforms, and won considerable support when the government was obliged to embark on a series of reforms in the administration, especially in the abolition of ONCAD, the country's main marketing and agricultural support body.

It has also become something of an open secret that Maître Wade, while savouring the prospect of the highest office in the land, sees the best path for his party through the formation of a government of national unity comprising representatives of both the legally recognised parties and those which have not been recognised. The latter remain bitterly divided by clashes of personality.

ZIMBABWEAN ECONOMIC TROUBLES, RELATIONS WITH SOUTH AFRICA DISCUSSED

Economic Troubles

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 9 Oct 80 p 10

[Editorial: "Cause and Effect"]

[Text] A vicious circle of cause and effect is being effectively illustrated in Zimbabwe, a country in economic distress. Without foreign money the country cannot develop properly; however, without clear signs of development it will not be getting any of this money.

In an effort to overcome this problem Zimbabwe is going to convene an extraordinary conference next year for the purpose of asking for still more financial help, especially from the Western world. The mere holding of such a conference is of course a clear indication of how critical things are in Zimbabwe.

In a certain sense there can be understanding for Mr Robert Mugabe, who is being portrayed sympathetically in some Western circles, and who now would like to see the West meet its promises of help to Zimbabwe.

The money, especially that of the United States, which in the days of Kissinger entailed plans for a fund of hundreds of millions of dollars, was intended for the resettlement of whites. The meager amount of $25 million, which the United States promised this year (and $30 million for next year) compares pitifully with the previous boastings.

Part of the explanation for this is that opinion polls show that more than four out of five Americans first of all want a further curtailment of foreign aid, which percentagewise is already small, when it comes to budget cuts. This stinginess on the part of the previous giveaway Uncle Sam is at the same time one of the reasons why American capability of influencing world affairs is steadily on the decline.

In addition to this kind of problem, which Zimbabwe is more or less experiencing with most Western governments, there are also obstructions which are interfering with private initiative in that country.

The Mugabe government, whose members in certain instances are leading an exorbitant life--which in other African countries has only caused disaster--is complaining bitterly about "foreign exploiters," but is apparently about to sell out its mineral wealth to the countries of the Soviet bloc for a pot of socialist lentil soup.

These are developments which private enterprises do not fail to see. If this sort of thing continues, economically speaking, things in Zimbabwe will get a lot worse before they get any better.

Relations With South Africa

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 7 Oct 80 p 10

[Editorial: "A Few Lessons for Mr Mugabe"]

[Text] In the course of the weekend the Zimbabwan prime minister again found it necessary to accuse South Africa of training a secret army of 5,000 exiled Zimbabwans to help overthrow the present government in this black country in favor of Bishop Abel Mozorewa. However, he failed to explain what sort of advantage South Africa would obtain from a chaotic situation in its northern neighboring country.

There could be several explanations for Mr Mugabe's nonsense. One of these is simply that he wants to remain in style with the African chorus of name-calling against South Africa. Another possible explanation is that he may be trying to divert attention from his own internal problems which are beginning to assume even more ominous proportions.

A third possibility, which Minister Pik Botha mentioned in the statement he made yesterday, is that Mr Mugabe is being pressured into admitting ANC terrorists into Zimbabwe's territory to enable them to undertake campaigns of subversion against South Africa. If there are serious reasons to suspect the latter it would pay the Zimbabwan leader to think it over as soon as possible. His government is much too dependent on the good will of his southern neighbor. A confrontation over subversive activities could be very costly to Zimbabwe. South Africa has continued to behave correctly with respect to Zimbabwe, as Minister Botha has asserted with good reason. It is high time that Mr Mugabe start to realize that it is his government which needs South Africa and not the other way around.

Another lesson which he could really take to heart when he looks at the internal problems of his black neighboring countries is that those problems will never come closer to a resolution by depicting South Africa as an ogre.

AGRICULTURAL AID FOR LESOTHO PLANNED

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 10 Oct 80 p 7

[Text] Four Free State agricultural cooperatives will be developing 20,000 hectares of land in Lesotho as a good-will gesture. This announcement was made by Mr Jan van Vuuren, the chairman of the Free State Agricultural Union.

The announcement follows a statement by Prime Minister P. W. Botha in Pretoria that South Africa and Lesotho will continue to collaborate "in the spirit of the recent Peka-Bridge deliberations." He was asked to comment on the relations between the two countries after the attack on South Africa at the United Nations on the part of Lesotho Foreign Affairs Minister C. D. Molapo.

It is a known fact that Eastern Free State farmers are being plagued by cattle thefts from areas in Lesotho where great poverty and hunger prevail.

"The Free State Agricultural Union is convinced that a great effort must be made to develop and maintain better relations at the border of Lesotho. I do not wish to enlarge on the existing border problems, but the drought and other production problems on both sides of the border have created unfavorable situations for good relations.

Summer Grains

The four agricultural cooperatives which are directly concerned with the project are those of Ficksburg, Clocolan, Drakensberg and Ladybrand. These will be working certain marked-off areas in Lesotho, in consultation with the Department of Foreign Affairs and Information and the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries, and they will be planting summer grains.

Altogether 20,000 hectares of land will be affected by the project which will be undertaken next week. The direct costs of the project will be borne by the farmers of Lesotho.

Mr Piet van Rooyen, the secretary of the Free State Agricultural Union, told DIE BURGER last night that he does not think that farmers in border districts will be able to provide much help because they themselves are being forced to cope with disaster situations. The work will be done by cooperatives which will be providing such things as tools, seed and artificial fertilizers.

At the moment tractors and tractor operators are being sought to carry out this task, and this is something which could create even more big problems, according to Van Rooyen.

TREURNICHT SPEAKS ON DIVISION OF CHURCH, STATE

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 10 Oct 80 p 7

[Text] Pretoria--The church must not yearn for participation in government. It is not its business to conceive and prescribe political formulas. If it wants to lend guidance to the government it must preach the scriptures' call for justice in public life.

This was the statement made to DIE BURGER in the course of an interview with Dr Treurnicht, the minister of state administration and statistics and the leader of the Nationalist Party of Transvaal.

DIE BURGER approached Minister Treurnicht in connection with the position taken by him recently in the course of a public meeting in Witbank which was addressed by Prime Minister P. W. Botha. Minister Treurnicht, who acted as the chairman of the meeting, stated that the government will not want to face the future or fulfill its calling without the church's sympathy and its message.

With respect to state-church relations he stated that it does not mean that the government appreciates the church only when the church pronounces blessings on the government's plans, decisions, or course of actions. Of course it means a lot for a government if the church does not raise objections, from an ethnic point of view, to its legislation or administration. But the church must also be appreciated on the basis of its message and moral guidelines contained therein to the government and to the public.

Scriptural Principles

The government may not therefore draft laws and enforce them irrespective of whether these run counter to the principles of scriptures. However, it also has the right to ask the church: "With what uncontestable authority or by what scriptural standards do you address me?"

Minister Treurnicht stated that if a certain church or its official representative addresses the government on a certain point, it often turns out that another church will differ with the exhortations of the former. This point calls for discretion on the part of the churches, but then again a government may not hide behind ecclesiastical differences and stay neutral in a matter of principle.

Sacraments

While the government recognizes the authority of the church to explain the scriptures and to outline scriptural principles for the general public, the church's officials must also take into account the fact that a faithful member, who is also a government official, has been guided to mature faith and therefore should be able to deduce from the scriptures those Christian principles for public life.

In light of this it is possible that someone in government may even tell a church official that he is not admonishing on the basis of uncontestable biblical principle, but at best, on the basis of controversial political points of departure.

The government must not try to regulate the private life and government of the church. That is not its duty, and it has no authorization to do so. It must respect the church as the body of Christ. The government is not the official administrator of the Word or of the sacraments, and does not enforce church discipline, stated Minister Treurnicht.

On the other hand the church does neither have the competence or the mandate to govern the country. Its duty is not directed or suited for this task. The church's authority is a ministering one, while the authority of the government is that of enforcement... the rule of the sword or the power to kill.

For this reason the church must not yearn for participation in the government. It is not its business to conceive and prescribe political formulas. If it wants to give guidance to the government it must preach the scriptures' call for justice in public life.

But if the government wants to help the church it must not take over its functions, but within limitations of its own kind of authority, make it possible for the church to preach the gospel and to exist and to work as a church in the domain of public life.

Admonishment

According to Dr Treurnicht, in cases of errors and sins on the part of the government and the nation, the church has the responsibility of admonishing them by means of normal preaching and/or official sinodal explanations.

However, the church official can and must also approach the government official as an interlocutor and in a two-way discussion serious consideration can be given to Christian requirements for public life and for the government's legislative, order keeping and coercive measures. Obviously, whenever the government official is also a believer such a discussion shall not be a one-way admonishment or order on the part of the church official.

Minister Treurnicht added that harmony between the government and the church will exist if both realize their responsibility as the servants of God, have mutual respect for each other and jointly search the scriptures for guidelines for the pure functions and fulfillment of callings of both church and state.

AFRIKANER EXCLUSIVENESS BLAMED FOR DECLINE OF AFRIKAANS

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 10 Oct 80 p 2

[Text] The Afrikaner is the greatest enemy of Afrikaans because of his excessive exclusiveness. If years ago all the universities had been open to all, Afrikaans would not be on the road to decline today. This was the statement made yesterday by Professor Combrinck, professor of Afrikaans philology at Stellenbosch University. Professor Combrinck was speaking for REPORT, a television program in which the present situation of Afrikaans in South Africa was examined in depth. Various experts in the Afrikaans language and members of cultural bodies took part in the program.

"Our exclusiveness made it difficult for us to sell our language to the coloreds," stated Professor Combrinck. The political picture of the Afrikaner will have to be changed and the coloreds must become more involved in Afrikaans. The proportion of Afrikaans speakers is becoming smaller compared to the proportion of English speakers in our country.

Prof Dries Oosthuizen of the Institute of Urban Studies at the Rand Afrikaans University said that Afrikaans has reached a watershed situation, and if it is not to be doomed there will have to be a more outward movement. The picture of Afrikaans can be improved a great deal.

Unitary State

Dr Jap Steyn, language professor at the Rand Afrikaans University and author of the book "Tuiste en Eie Taal" ("Homelands and Their Own Languages"), said that it is important for Afrikaans to preserve its utilitarian value as a language of economy and to be recognized culturally. The future of Afrikaans is now tied to the future political state of affairs. In a unitary state Afrikaans will have to struggle to maintain itself, while its speakers will find it easier to maintain their language in a confederation, according to Dr Steyn.

Mr Franklin Sonn of the Peninsular Technical College (Skiereilandse Technikon) stated that he is proud of having Afrikaans as his mother tongue. However, he is saddened to see his children humbled by people who speak the same language. Afrikaans must be allowed to run its own course and it must be freed from the negative political coloring attached to it.

Rev David Botha, moderator of the Dutch Reformed Missionary Church, stated in the course of the program that the coloreds regard Afrikaans as the language of the oppressor. It is important that the coloreds get their just share in South Africa; this will be the key to better relations.

The future of Afrikaans among the black people will depend a great deal on the attitude of the whites toward the black man. This was the statement made in the program by Mr Nathan Malope, a member of the BEELD editorial staff. Since 1976 children have not been inclined to talk Afrikaans. A greater involvement in the welfare and problems of the black man on the part of Afrikaans speakers is necessary.

In the course of the program Mr Dolf van der Berg, secretary of the Federation of Afrikaner Cultural Association, stated that he would not say that the Afrikaner is exclusive by nature, but that he is indeed inclusive. The coloreds can count on the collaboration and support of organizations such as those in which he is connected.

Dr Piet Muller, the assistant editor of BEELD, said that Afrikaans will achieve its rightful place if it is not regarded as an exclusive white language. The new census figures will probably show that there are just as many, if not more, colored Afrikaans-speaking Afrikaners as white Afrikaans speakers.

Prof Willie Esterhuysen of the philosophy department of Stellenbosch University said that he does not share the pessimism prevailing over the status of Afrikaans and he thinks that a rosy future is awaiting the language in the new order of things.

To be sure there are still signs of linguistic pride among the coloreds, and with the Afrikaner's talent for leadership, the language will hold its own.

WRITER CALLS 'UGANDA TIMES' EDITOR UNPROFESSIONAL

Kampala WEEKLY TOPIC in English 24 Oct 80 p 3

[Letter by Banya-Banda in the column "Your Platform": "Does Anti-UPC Mean Pro-Amin?"]

[Text]

SIR,

DOES ANTI-UPC MEAN PRO-AMIN?

In the article entitled "the Press is warned (Uganda Times, October 7, 1980) its editor, the self-styled "Ben Bella" made a number of accusations against Uganda Pressmen. From a professional view-point, Ben must be responsible for anything he writes. Professional as he claims, he is , he does not differentiate hard news from interpretive journalism. He opinionates all his reportage thus making it difficult to tell the author's ideas from the report's. It is on that basis that I am treating Ben's article.

Ben Illakut alleges that the press preaches hatred, violence and practices sensation and subjectivism. He further asserts that Uganda Times is not a semi-official but a commercial newspaper.

Let me start with the last point. From the information available Uganda Times (formerly Uganda Argus) belonged to the London based LONRHO. Like many other business concern in Uganda, this paper was affected by the nationalisation proclamations of 1972. Like LONRHO, a number of indigenous shareholders have never been compensated or told exactly the status of this company. I would therefore, need clarification from Ben as to whether this company still belongs to LONRHO, was sold to public shareholders or to UPC. Further I need to be told who recruited Ben to Uganda Times from his self-imposed exile in Nairobi. Was it the management of the company or the powers that were then?

Ben did not confine his out-burst to that but hurled it also at the sources of revenue of papers he calls anti-UPC. He alleged that their income was ill-gotten during the rule of Amin. Before I elaborate on this, I would like to make one point. It is fashionable in UPC circles to brand anything anti-UPC, pro-Amin. Anybody who is opposed to UPC flirted with Amin, was against liberation and is a mafuteningi (shark). It is Animal Farm again at play.

If the anti-UPC papers got their money illegally, where did UPC organs get theirs. How did they (UPC-bosses) manage within such a short time to raise funds to start Nationalist, re-establish 'People', buy Njuba and acquire all these assets in Uganda?

Now let us look at how ignorant the Uganda journalists are as far as objectivity and the law of sedition are concerned. How many times has this great "Editor-in-chief" betrayed his profession by being subjective, and partisan. Take his coverage on 'millions' attending UPC rallies, the confession of Karamojong cattle rustlers to their 'Papa' Obote and the hyponotic powers "Mzee" Obote has acquired from exile?.

It is also funny and amusing for Ben to accuse other journalists of being seditious in their reporting. How many times has the paper of this great journalist been sued. Again take the cases of Andrew Adimola, Mayanja Nkangi and Yoweri Museveni only to mention a few.

Ben apart from setting a dangerous precedent in journalism, has demonstrated political opportunism. As a journalist he has sold his profession for cheap gains and joerpadised the position of his colleagues vis-a-vas the role of journalists in any given society. By confining his coverage to Obote as a person he has demonstrated that he does not owe allegience to the party but to an individual. He is therefore in to perpetuate the personality cult that has hitherto bedevilled Uganda People's Congress.

My humblest request to Ben is that if he is all that politically minded as he claims, let him quit journalism and go in politics full-time instead of prostituting that great profession to which some of us subscribe.

MORE ON MOBUTU PLAN, ATTRACTING INVESTMENTS

London WEST AFRICA in English 3 Nov 80 p 2204

[Text] Mr Munga Wa Nyasa, administrative delegate of ANEZA — the National Association of Zairean Enterprises — spoke to Belgian industrialist in Brussels last month about implementation of the Mobutu Plan and attracting new investment to Zaire.

He explained Zaire's efforts to bring order to the Bank of Zaire, and other financial departments and the state enterprises. He said that the Bank of Zaire had accepted the appointments by the IMF of a principal director. To ensure full repatriation of foreign exchange and due allotment for essential operations, certain measures have been set up so that, thanks to a system of compulsory payments by irrevocable documentary credits, the non-repatriation of foreign exchange within the stipulated period by exporters is rendered almost impossible.

Arrangement have been made for essential imports under a system of export revenue pre-allocation quotas. That is why 30 per cent of export revenue should go to the Bank of Zaire, 15 percent is given to exporters and 55 per cent to accredited commercial banks which allocate it according to established regulations.

The post of a principal director, whose role is to see that the budget ceiling is respected, has been created in the Finance Department. Likewise, a pay directorate has been created and entrusted with the exclusive management of remuneration in the public sector, including that for the personnel of teaching departments and the department of national defence, as well as for the personnel of the OFIDA-customs and excise bureau.

In state enterprises, emphasis has been placed on the need to make a profit and to strengthen control by setting up various organisational bodies, including boards of governors, management committees and accounts controllers. Thus, the past habit of public enterprises of a commercial and industrial character to resort to taking advances from the public treasury is now abolished; they should henceforth be able to finance themselves.

Mr. Munga reviewed the methods of implementing the stabilisation plan which was drawn up by the Executive Council and the IMF and included in various letters of intent addressed to the IMF. These methods are related to public finances, the balance of payments, money supply and credit, and prices and salaries.

He said that the national authorities had not only honoured their commitments, but in certain cases have shown real prowess in applying extremely rigorous measures in the management of public finances. Among their commitments, the reduction of their budget deficit constituted the gauge for evaluating the effectiveness of the new management rules they have instituted. The maximum deficit permissible for the 1980 fiscal year was fixed at 380m. Zaires, with interim amounts of 180m. Zaires for March 31 and 310m. for September 30. The deficit at these various dates was in fact below the ceilings agreed upon Mr. Munga said.

Zaire's external debt had been reduced to acceptable proportions Mr. Munga said, and the outside world had regained confidence in the country because of the consolidation agreements signed between the national authorities and the London and Paris clubs. According to Mr. Munga, on the basis of these accords the debt for the 1980-1985 period will be as follows: $536m. in 1980, $558m. in 1981, $497m. in 1982, $439m. in 1983, $378m. in 1984, and $324m. in 1985 — that is a total of $2,732m.

Zaire has agreed to repay $536m. in 1980. Mr. Munga reassuringly said that great efforts had been made to refund $180m. For August and September an additional sum of $65m. will be released.

FIERCE ZIPRA-ZANLA BATTLE NEAR BULAWAYO REPORTED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 11 Nov 80 pp 1, 2, 10

[Text] The fierce gun-battle between ZIPRA and ZANLA former guerillas in Entumbane ended yesterday evening as the warring parties responded to threats and appeals from the authorities.

As Hawker Hunter jet fighters of the Air Force of Zimbabwe thundered over Bulawayo's western suburbs at 5 p.m. the mortar, machinegun, smallarms and rocket fire finally fell silent.

Police in Salisbury said 18 people had been killed and about 200 injured.

A police spokesman said in a statement at 9.30 last night:

"By 7.10 p.m. through negotiation of ZANLA and ZIPRA commanders a ceasefire was arrived at.

"Patrols in Bulawayo's western townships reported that large numbers of the township residents returned to their homes.

"A curfew from 7.30 p.m. to 5 a.m. was enforced in the area until further notice."

A Bulawayo police spokesman said police reservists have been mobilised to patrol the city centre and eastern suburbs.

Armed gangs and groups of hooligans armed with stones, sticks and iron bars roamed the west throughout the day, and 15 people were seriously hurt.

Following Sunday night's four-hour battle between the 3 000 ZANLA and ZIPRA men housed in Entumbane the firing broke out again at about 5.15 a.m. yesterday morning.

Police, including two companies of the police support unit, were deployed and units of the National Army also moved in, forming an armed cordon around the western suburbs.

The fighting spread from Entumbane, with a police spokesman warning yesterday afternoon that Mpopoma and Njube were particularly dangerous.

Roadblocks were set up by ZIPRA, and at one on the Khami road a Fawcetts Security Patrols employee, Mr Pat Lennon, was shot dead after being stopped in his vehicle.

He was shot in the head.

At another roadblock six men were wounded when they failed to stop, said sources.

The Western Commonage police station came under smallarms fire yesterday afternoon, police confirmed. Fire was returned by gate guards.

Military sources said the Mpopoma police post was overrun on Sunday night. Asked to comment, police said the post operated only during office hours. At night it was guarded by police reservists. An armed gang disarmed two of the men and drove them away, said the spokesman.

Two cars were overturned by mobs yesterday and other vehicles were stoned.

One policeman was slightly hurt when the vehicle in which he was travelling was ambushed. Fire was returned, said a police spokesman.

In other incidents, units from the National Army were also fired on.

One army detachment on a bridge on an access road leading to Entumbane retaliated with mortar fire when shot at by ZIPRA forces, witnesses said.

The fire-fight at the bridge, about 1 km from where opposing guerilla factions blasted each other with rockets, smallarms and mortars, was started when ZIPRA men fired on the army detachment.

Eye-witnesses said the guerillas were trying to break through an army cordon set around the area. The army beat off the attack.

As the battle of Entumbane continued throughout the day, many guerillas sought refuge at Brady Barracks.

the Hawker Hunter jets circled the suburbs for 45 minutes.

Among those who watched the aircraft from a police control room was the Minister of Home Affairs and head of the Patriotic Front, Dr Joshua Nkomo.

Meanwhile, staff at Mpilo central hospital were still working flat out.

The hospital's medical superintendent, Dr P. Mavros, said about 200 injured people had been treated.

Eighteen people were admitted.

INJURIES

Because of the large numbers dealt with, he could not say how many had gunshot wounds.

People with less serious injuries — such as those stoned or hit with iron bars — had had to wait for treatment, some for up to several hours.

Staff said both ZIPRA and ZANLA casualties, as well as many civilians, had been brought in.

One of the injured waiting for treatment, Mr Nehemiah Chizeya of Mpopoma, described how he was attacked with a knobkerrie when a gang asked which party he supported.

National Army units were hastily re-deployed to the vicinity of the Windermere Hotel on the Victoria Falls road when reports were received that a convoy of five trucks of "reinforcements" was heading towards Bulawayo from the ZIPRA camp at the Gwaai River mine near Wankie.

Police said the convoy was stopped near the hotel by army and police. No shots were exchanged and the ZIPRA men drove off to Brady Barracks.

The ceasefire was finally agreed to after unsuccessful attempts at mediation by senior ZIPRA and ZANLA men, including Mr Dumiso Dabengwa, head of the ZIPRA forces.

Throughout the afternoon a "Skyshout" Islander light aeroplane was used to urge guerillas to stop fighting and to tell those roaming the western suburbs to return to Entumbane.

As firing went on, the guerillas were warned that strong action would be taken.

The battle stopped when

PM Appeals--'Help Bring Down Political Malcontents'

The Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, last night appealed to the nation to co-operate with the forces of law and order in restoring peace in Bulawayo.

In a broadcast on radio and television, Mr Mugabe said he had information that there were disloyal, misguided and politically motivated armed hooligans and political malcontents whose objective was to create chaos and lawlessness to pave the way for the eventual fall of his Government.

This is the text of his address:

"I am sure all of you are aware of the grave situation now obtaining in several townships of Bulawayo. Since yesterday, incidents of murder, arson, robbery, assault, intimidation and general lawlessness have been perpetrated by misguided and politically motivated armed hooligans and political malcontents.

"This morning, I was briefed in detail by the several Ministers who attended and addressed rallies in Bulawayo over the weekend, to one of which organised unruly ZAPU mobs were transported by bus and other vehicles with a clear intention to unlawfully disrupt that meeting.

"The police, who must be complimented for their action, managed to control what could have been a bloodier situation that it finally was. Yesterday, later in the day, some undisciplined elements of ZIPRA in Entumbane started shelling and firing on a ZANLA cantonment.

"A clash between the two forces then ensued and from that moment on armed bands roamed the western townships committing murder, arson, assault, robbery and acts of intimidation. The detailed report before me from both the police and the army is to the effect that the situation has not yet improved.

"My Government has a clear and unshakable responsibility in these circumstances to act and act decisively in full protection of the people, in preservation of law and order and in defence of our hard-won peace and independence against disloyal, misguided and politically motivated armed hooligans and political malcontents whose final objective, according to the information before me, is to create chaos and lawlessness so as to pave the way for the eventual fall of my Government.

"I cannot allow hooliganism and lawlessness to establish a reign of terror in this country. The war is over and peace and not violence, friendship and not hostility, reconciliation and not irreconciliation between individuals, communities, ethnic groups and political parties should characterise our new relations.

"All of us as a nation or as communities, or as political parties or as tribes or as individuals should treasure our independence and peace. If some individuals or groups of individuals think that they have the monopoly to ruin that peace, then they are up for a rude shock.

"In accordance therefore with immediate need to restore law and order in Bulawayo, my Government has taken the following measures with immediate effect. One, I have ordered the strengthening and reinforcement of the National Army units and the police deployed in Bulawayo area including the use of the Air Force.

"Two, I have ordered that certain emergency measures be imposed in the area including a curfew. Three, I have instructed the commanders of ZIPRA and ZANLA to proceed to Bulawayo to work energetically to defuse the situation.

"I appeal to both ZIPRA and ZANLA to stop this disgraceful nonsense and join arms with us in consolidating our independence. I have also appealed to the leadership of ZAPU to act immediately in restraining their unruly supporters.

"Equally I appealed to the ZANU leadership not to aggravate the situation by taking retaliatory measures which will cause violence. Both parties have a duty to promote the difficult task of the police and the National Army in restoring peace and law and order in the area.

"Let us all give the forces of law and order our fullest support in the performance of their duty. Pambest nazvayarare."

Families Flee into Bush for Safety

RESIDENTIAL areas close to Entumbane were deserted yesterday as occupants were forced to flee their homes by youths believed to be former guerillas.

Many of the "refugees" spent the day in open spaces dotting Tshabalala, some distance to the south, without water, food and toilet facilities.

Others were thought to be camped out in the Hyde Park area and in the surrounding bush.

In Tshabalala, groups could be seen walking about. Most women had blankets, but some did not have enough nappies to change their babies.

A number of mothers were worried about their children, who had reported for school but been told by teachers it was unsafe. They would find no one there when they got home.

The evacuation exercise affected both Shona and Ndebele.

It appears families in the Pelandaba and Mpopoma areas were told to leave their homes on Saturday night and those in the Njube and Matshobana areas were told to leave early on Sunday.

CALLED

Mr Peter Ngwenya, who lives with his wife and five children at Pelandaba, opposite Western Commonage police station, said men he believed to be former ZIPRA guerillas had called at his house at about 8 p.m. on Saturday.

He said both ZIPRA and ZANLA were at large in the area.

"They just knocked on the door and said we must leave at once, as there might be trouble," said Mr Ngwenya, who was at work yesterday in Bulawayo.

"Every single family in Pelandaba was told to leave, but I did not see any civilian attacked.

"Everybody moved to the bush to sleep last night, close to Tshabalala. Most of them are still there and they have no food or water. I am hoping to take food to my family tonight."

Residents told how at least four Tshabalala houses belonging to ZANU (PF) officials went up in smoke.

Property in the houses was gutted.

Blankets left scattered about indicated they had tried to salvage them. But footprints which destroyed fences, flowers and vegetable gardens showed the fires had been caused by gangs running into hundreds.

Half - finished meals could be seen in some of the gutted houses.

Industry Is Forced to Standstill

Industrial activity in Bulawayo came to a complete standstill yesterday afternoon when thousands of workers were sent home to be with their families during the disturbances in the western areas of the city.

The commercial sector was not far behind and by 3 p.m. most shops and garages had closed.

All passengers and freight trains to and from Bulawayo were cancelled, as were bus services to and from the western suburbs.

At the start of the day about half of the industrial and commerical workforces reported for duty, many workers having slept in the bush during the night. By mid-morning, most of them had gone home to be with their families.

The Vice-president of the Bulawayo Chamber of Industries, Mr John Lancaster, said most factories closed at noon and when the remaining workers were sent home at 3 p.m., industrial activity ground to a halt.

"We are pursuing the matter at the highest level through our officials at the Confederation of Zimbabwe Industries in Salisbury."

The Private Sector Co-ordinating Committee, representing five business organisations in Zimbabwe, yesterday met the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, to seek assurances about the security situation and its effect on confidence in the national economy, writes a Herald reporter.

A spokesman for the commercial leaders said after the meeting in Salisbury yesterday that they were assured by Mr Mugabe that he was deeply concerned about the problems and that appropriate and firm measures are being taken.

The five committee leaders were representing the Association of Chambers of Commerce of Zimbabwe, the Chamber of Mines, the Commercial Farmers' Union, the Confederation of Zimbabwe Industries and the Zimbabwe Tobacco Association.

[Editorial: "Heed the Appeal"]

IT WAS a grim and angry Prime Minister who spoke to the nation last night.

There is a desperate need for everyone to heed the appeal by Mr Mugabe for reconciliation if Zimbabwe is to avoid the chaos he warned against.

The violence that broke out in Bulawayo between ZANLA and ZIPRA was on a scale that can be described only as frightening.

With so many armed men still in camps around the country the dangers of such a clash need no emphasising.

The imposition of a curfew and the deployment of the national army, the police and the air force are some of the steps the Government is taking to deal with the immediate situation.

But beyond that it is essential that the former guerilla armies be disarmed with all speed and their integration into the National Army must be treated as a matter of the almost urgency.

Furthermore the leading members of ZANU (PF) and ZAPU must observe the restraint which the Prime Minister called for. They must put the national interest first at this critical time.

The tension generated by the lengthy local government election campaign would only have been heightened by remarks in Bulawayo that were often provocative and at times downright inflammatory.

The Ministers in particular have certain responsibilities and obligations and even in the face of provocation they must resist the temptation to inflame already roused passions.

The damaging criticism of the police must stop if the whole fabric of law and order is not to be put at risk.

The Prime Minister has called for co-operation with the forces of law and order. Let everyone give it unstintingly and let us get back on the right road.

SUCCESS OF NEW PARLIAMENT EXAMINED

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 3 Nov 80 p 18

[Article by David Thomas: "Working Well First Time Around"]

[Text] The new Zimbabwe's first session of Parliament has ended and, despite fears to the contrary, this peculiar Westminster-style institution was, as it rose, still very much alive in this country, reports David Thomas of the THE STAR's Africa News Service from Salisbury. [as published]

Zimbabwe's first session of Parliament opened in May to a fanfare of good old colonial pomp and splendour, complete with Rolls-Royces, pith helmets and horse-guards.

It ended with the government's abortive attempt to push through a controversial Bill to change the constitution--parliamentary democracy was seen to be functioning well with all its built-in checks and balances.

The constitution and its entrenched Bill of Rights, agreed to by all parties at the historic Lancaster House talks, remains intact despite the ruling Zanu (PF)'s grave reservations about some of its provisions.

To be sure, there were plenty of venomous exchanges in the debating chambers of the House of Assembly and the Senate between Mr Robert Mugabe's supporters and Mr Ian Smith's all-white Rhodesian Front. But over the months a grudging mutual respect and sometimes even a certain amount of camaraderie seems to have developed.

Nowhere else have two such bitter enemies, separated by ideology, race and the memories of a long and violent war, come together to hammer out legislation for their country.

The only one who could not come to terms with the new situation was the former Prime Minister, Bishop Abel Muzorewa. Though he attended sessions regularly, he always sat defiantly upright on his green leather bench in stony silence.

It amazed experienced Parliamentary watchers to see the black members of Parliament, many of whom were roughing it in the bush with Kalashnikov rifles only nine months ago, adjusting easily to the formalities of the debating chambers.

To them, the dignity of the institution was all important and it was surprising how quickly they picked up the procedures and formalities of this seemingly alien form of bunga.

It is perhaps ironic that the speaker of the House, resplendent in a wig and a flowing gold-trimmed gown is addressed by most of the new members as "comrade speaker."

The frequent use of "comrade" by members is one of the few departures from the still traditional forms of address.

There was an outcry from the Government's benches when former RF cabinet minister Mr P K van der Byl reclined on his front bench with his feet up on the ornate parliamentary table.

But they were somewhat reassured when Mr van der Byl told the House with his customary arrogance that "putting one's feet on the table is a privilege of the front bench, honoured by precedent over several centuries."

On another occasion a stony silence greeted the controversial Cabinet Minister Mr Edgar Tekere, who is to be tried for murder, when he came into the House during his Ministry's vote dressed in battle fatigues.

Mr Tekere's vote speech, which concluded with a warning: "I am a rogue. The day of reckoning is coming. Thank you," was snubbed in silent protest. His vote went through without a word of debate.

The role of the Rhodesian Front, whose 20 seats in the House and 10 in the Senate are guaranteed in terms of the constitution, has been somewhat ambiguous.

The Government will not recognise the RF as the official Opposition because in the Prime Minister, Mr Robert Mugabe's view an Opposition must be a shadow Government and there is no way in the present situation where an all-white party will return to power.

Nevertheless, the RF's performance during the session was generally that of an Opposition.

A few of the RF MPs, like the former Cabinet Minister Mr Rowan Cronje, and Mr Andre Holland, went out of their way to develop a closer working relationship with the Government.

On the other hand, at least two right-wing RF MPs, Mr Donald Goddard and Wing Commander Rob Gaunt, often made blatantly racist taunts.

It was as if these two were deliberately playing the part of devil's advocate, some suggest with the approval of the RF, in order to appease the right wing of their rapidly shrinking electorate.

By far the most outspoken was Mr Goddard. One of his most notorious gibes came when he said many of the Cabinet Ministers were proud that they had just come from the bush, adding: "I respectfully suggest that is where they belong."

In a heated exchange with a Government MP which deteriorated into a shouting match of "Shut up"..."No, you shut up"...and so on, he accused backbenchers of having a peasant mentallity and "at least I don't smell like one." [as published]

But both MPs got back much of what they gave and were often shouted down as "racists, fascists, exploiters, murderers."

Sometimes these exchanges had their lighter side. When one backbencher shouted at Wing Commander Gaunt: "Sit down you monkey," and was asked to withdraw his remark, the quick-witted MP said he must have been misheard--he had actually said: "Sit down, you man from Wankie."

However, even Wing Commander Gaunt joined his party colleagues in praising Mr Mugabe when the Prime Minister's vote was debated.

"As one of the more outspoken critics of Zanu (PF) and the Government, I think it would be most churlish of me if I did not extend to the Prime Minister my thanks and congratulations on the manner in which he has come into office and conducted himself since becoming Prime Minister of Zimbabwe."

But he could not resist taking a swipe at other members of the Cabinet. Recalling the "My Fair Lady" song "Why can't a woman be more like a man?" he said: "Why can't the Prime Minister's Cabinet be more like him?"

The other main political party represented in Parliament, Mr Joshua Nkomo's Zapu found themselves in an even more awkward position than the RF.

The 20 Zapu Members of Parliament sometimes found their position as junior partners in the ruling coalition somewhat uncomfortable at times.

At one point Zapu even joined with the RF in openly criticising the Government about the Zimbabwe Broadcasting Corporation which, in the words of one of Mr Nkomo's supporters, had become a "Zanu (PF) platform."

Bishop Muzorewa's once ruling UANC, now left with three elected MPs in the house, is the most ostracised by the ruling party which has 57 members in the 100 seat assembly.

As one RF member put it: "The new lot can understand us--they see us as white nationalists fighting for our cause. They accept us in that way. But they cannot accept the Bishop--they see him as a traitor, a fellow black man who sides with the whites to kill their people."

But despite all these divisions, the Zimbabwe Parliament--"marxist" comrades, "fascist" whites, traitors and all--somehow managed to work rather well in its first time round.

Cronje...making efforts to work within the new system.

V D Byl...sat with his feet propped up on the front bench.

Gaunt..."Why can't the Prime Minister's Cabinet be more like him?"

Goddard...Cabinet Ministers should go back to the bush, backbenchers have a peasant mentality.

Tekere..."I am a rogue, the day of reckoning is coming."

Mugage...praised, even by the "racists" in the white opposition.

Muzorewa...seen as a "traitor" whose forces killed their own people.

Nkomo...sometimes even joined the whites in attacking the government.

REPORTAGE ON NOMINATIONS FOR LOCAL ELECTIONS

High Number of Candidates

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 8 Nov 80 pp 1, 2

[Article by Geoff Nyarota]

[Text] NOMINATION of candidates for election to Salisbury City Council to represent Wards 14 to 36 closed yesterday afternoon with more than 70 nominations submitted.

Only 45 of the nominations were announced, as the rest were received late in the afternoon and could not be processed in time to be released for publication. A Town House spokesman said these nominations, the bulk of which were ZANU (PF) - sponsored, would be available on Monday morning for publication.

A Patriotic Front spokesman said yesterday that although the party's candidates had submitted their nominations individually the party's list would be announced on Monday also.

When nominations for the 13 former white municipal wards closed on October 30 a total of 36 candidates had registered, four of them black and the rest white.

Elections in Wards 1 to 13 will be held on Saturday November 22. In Wards 14 to 36 they will be held on the same day and on Sunday November 23.

CONTESTING

Mrs Esther Rawson, who is contesting the Waterfalls ward, was a candidate in the parliamentary elections, not the municipal elections last year, as reported last week.

Mr Tony Gara, the only black man on the present council and widely tipped to be Salisbury's first black mayor, said yesterday he was going to be a candidate in a ward in the former local government areas. He felt this enhanced his chances of being returned to council.

He is a councillor for Greendale, where two white candidates are standing.

A total of 45 candidates will contest Wards 9 to 23 in the Bulawayo municipal elections, our correspondent reports.

SURPRISED

When nomination closed yesterday the Town Clerk, Mr Ian Edmeades, said he was surprised at the large number of candidates.

Salisbury Councillors, Chitungwiza Candidates

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 11 Nov 80 pp 1, 3

[Text] Two of Salisbury's new black city councillors were elected unopposed when nominations closed on Friday afternoon.

Mr James Muvuti, a mechanic, will represent Ward 15 (Gillingham) and Mr Denga Hunda Ward 33 (the hostels in Harare) in the new city council.

Elections for Wards 14 to 36 will be held on Saturday and Sunday November 22 and 23. For Wards 1 to 13, where five councillors have been returned unopposed, polling will be on the Saturday only.

A total of 73 candidates, including three women, have been nominated for the 23 wards representing the former local government areas and 36 candidates, including four blacks, for the former white wards.

The new Salisbury City Council could have a total of 25 black councillors and 11 whites if two blacks standing in the former white wards are elected. Three of them are standing in one ward, Waterfalls.

Salisbury's next mayor will most likely be black. However, the name of the man who had been widely tipped for Mayor, Mr Tony Gara did not appear on the final list of council nominations released last night.

Disqualified

A council spokesman said Mr Gara had been disqualified becuase there was something wrong with the list of people who nominated him. A candidate is disqualified if any of the people who nominate him are not on the voters' roll in his ward.

Mr Gara, whose nomination was sponsored by ZANU (PF), and who is councillor for Greendale, had decided to stand in Harare, where Mr Hunda was elected unopposed.

Fifty-eight Stand for Chitungwiza

A TOTAL of 58 candidates, an average of five candidates to a ward, has been nominated for the local government elections in Chitungwiza.

Elections in the area will be held on November 22 and 23. The Chitungwiza Urban Council, the first of its kind to be run by blacks in Zimbabwe, will consist of 24 councillors.

There are 12 wards in the council area, for each of which two councillors will be elected. The full list of candidates is:

Ward 1: Mrs Dorothy Marira, Mr Dominic Svondo and Mr Dickson Mustri.

OFFICIAL CALLS FOR GUN CONTROLS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 8 Nov 80 p 7

[Text]

THE Deputy Minister of Labour and Social Services, Mr Robson Manyika, has called on the Government to take firm measures against the large number of weapons in private hands.

"I think the responsible Ministry in the Government should take strong precautionary measures against this sort of thing so that law and order takes its course," he said.

Mr Manyika was speaking in an interview this week after a shooting incident on Sunday near a Salisbury hotel in which he was wounded in the forearm, and another man, Mr Suleman Abdul Mahomed, shot dead by the Minister's bodyguard.

The Minister, who had spent the day in Gatooma where he and other Ministers had addressed a ZANU (PF) rally, described the incident which took place at about 7.25 p.m. outside the Queens Hotel.

"I was about to buy some drinks for relatives at home when someone I didn't know came near me and started accusing me of being a UANC member and trying to provoke me. I thought he was just playing.

"But he kept on making some derogatory remarks about me. When I asked him who he was, he said: 'You think that I don't know you?' I became annoyed but I controlled myself.

"Later I told him that if he wanted to buy something, he should do so and get out. So he went out, but I did not know he was planning something."

Mr Manyika said that soon afterwards as he made his way to the door, he saw a man pointing a gun at him.

"I thought I should defend myself although I did not have a weapon. I jumped at him and tried to pull his gun away. As I did so, he shot me. That's when my bodyguard acted and shot the man.

"There was some confusion there. The man went down still holding his gun but I quickly disarmed him."

On moving outside, said Mr Manyika, he found that his car's two windows had been shot at. As he stood there, someone he did not know assaulted him and ran away.

At this point the Minister told his bodyguard to report the incident to the police.

RAN AWAY

"I remained there alone. Suddenly I saw a group of between six and seven men advancing towards me. I heard some shots being fired. I took my pistol in the car and warned the group not to come closer to me. They ran away.

"When the police arrived at the scene, someone again attempted to assault me but the police got hold of him."

The Minister, who was bleeding, was taken to the Andrew Fleming hospital. He was discharged on Monday.

During the interview at his Mount Pleasant home, Mr Manyika, his arm still bandaged, said he did not understand why the gunman had attacked him.

"We are now an independent nation and I have no enemies in the country. If this was thuggery or drunkenness, then I don't know," he added.

He said his arm was improving and thought he would soon return to work.

NKALA: GOVERNMENT TAKEOVER OF NEWSPAPERS PLANNED

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 9 Nov 80 p 1

[Text] Mail Correspondent: Bulawayo

The Government was to take measures to acquire a controlling interest in Zimbabwe Newspapers, the Minister of Finance, Senator Enos Nkala, said in Bulawayo yesterday.

Addressing a ZANU (PF) rally at the White City Stadium, he said THE HERALD, THE CHRONICLE, THE SUNDAY MAIL and THE SUNDAY NEWS had failed to be in step with the needs of the people.

He accused THE CHRONICLE in particular of promoting tribalism.

Senator Nkala said that, in line with Government policy of entering into joint ventures with vital industries, the company's newspapers would have to be jointly owned as they were regarded as "vital instruments".

He said: "When I leave this place I am going to work the mechanism of participation in THE CHRONICLE. If this newspaper exists in Zimbabwe it has to try to think again that it should not provoke the people of Zimbabwe.

"We will use black editors on these newspapers, we do not want them to be run by Europeans who are anti-Government.

"If these papers, THE HERALD and THE CHRONICLE, think they are above the wishes of the people of this country, do not forget they are owned by the South African Argus group.

"We will take these papers. By next year THE HERALD and THE CHRONICLE should go. If they refuse to sell, we are the Government.

"THE CHRONICLE has to go, come what may. It has to go.

"These newspapers must now come directly under the control of the Government. They are vital instruments.

"The Government has a policy of joint ownership in any vital industry. We consider them as vital instruments. I am going to sit down and see how these papers work. We are now taking them."

Senator Nkala said: "We will do the same thing" as had happened to newspapers in Zambia, Nigeria, Malawi and Mozambique.

"We have been provoked beyond endurance by these imperialist and racialist newspapers. They want to promote civil war. They should be taken.

"THE CHRONICLE has provoked us sufficiently to warrant action against it," said Senator Nkala.

Minister's One-Party State Hint

IN VIEW of the Patriotic Front's recent moves, the central committee of ZANU (PF) "has to decide whether there should be a one-party state or not", the Minister of Finance, Senator Enos Nkala, told yesterday's rally in Bulawayo.

The committee, he said, would meet soon to analyse the achievements of the Government since it came to power.

Senator Nkala charged that the PF appeared to be taking sides with the UANC and the Rev. Ndabaningi Sithole's ZANU, as evidenced by the demonstration at the ZBC premises in Bulawayo last weekend.

He said the PF's participation in the demonstration had caused concern as the party had collaborated with elements seeking to bring down the Government. The PF had indicated it had little stake in the Government of which it was part.

He said the Prime Minister, Mr Robert Mugabe, would be calling the central committee for an all-night session to examine every issue facing the Government.

The committee, he said, would also consider withdrawing payments to guerillas whose allegiance to the Government was questionable.

Moves were being taken to impose heavy taxation on landlords with several farms in a bid to discourage mass ownership of land.

Senator Nkala also announced that, with immediate effect, military-style exercises by "refugees and other people" in urban areas are banned.

He said anyone seen "running down the streets" would have to face the consequences of ignoring a Government order.

The ban, he said had been imposed as the exercises had been used to disturb peace by interfering with people's private lives.

Senator Nkala promised to say "bigger things" today, the final day of the rally.

ZANU-ZAPU VIOLENCE SEEN ALIENATING MINORITIES

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 9 Nov 80 p 14

[Article by Henry Maasdorp]

[Text]

SINCE the recent surge of violence there has been a wave of public appeals for peace and unity. This suggests that the same and forbearing among us are far from giving up hope.

But one fears that the weight of the albatross hanging round our necks, and the nature and extent of the change of heart needed to be rid of it, may be underestimated.

Before going further one should emphasise how far from simple the situation is. All the ingredients for good and evil in Zimbabwe are not even in the same mixing bowl.

There is much room for concern about law and order; however, there is simultaneously, for instance, much room for satisfaction about aspects of the economy.

The point was made, in fewer words, by a representative of Zimbabwe's intrepid businessmen, Mr Brian Grubb, when he told South Africans a fortnight ago that the irresponsible actions and violence of a minority should not be construed as reflecting an overall situation.

The Minister of Economic Planning and Development, Dr Bernard Chidzero, says that this year Zimbabwe will achieve a growth in the gross national product of 5 percent in real terms, and an 8 percent rise next year is looked for.

A spokesman of the tobacco farmers said last week that the security situation in some farming areas was worse than it had been in the years of armed conflict.

At this, it must be admitted, the fumes from the various bowls in which the ingredients of the situation repose tend to rise and mix in the head; for one recalls that an authority on commercial farming wrote in June last year that the price of failure to restore peace in the farming districts in the next 12 to 18 months might be widespread malnutrition and starvation.

Yet even if, as in this instance, the question seems to come back to law and order, reports of the growth and growing deployment of the national army, and of the steady and quietly successful work of the police in trouble spots such as Chitungwiza, take some of the edge off alarm and despondency.

Alienated

All this having been said, those who wish their country well can, nevertheless, hardly be at rest.

On the political front, including in this phrase the scenes of violence that can be traced back in some sense to "politics", reconciliation seems to have run out of steam, to have gone as far as its rather puny supporting body of ideas and feelings could take it; and we are left with a dominant party which to a sometimes alarming extent is alienated from many people among the minorities, large and small, who sit in the same boat with it on a turbulent sea.

Speaking from his own point of view, ZAPU's vice-president, Mr Josiah Chinamano, said last week that the essential values of peace and unity were nowhere near achievement, because ZANU (PF) Ministers were failing to measure up as leaders, not of ZANU (PF) but of the whole of Zimbabwe.

Whatever justice there may or may not be in my or Mr Chinamano's comments, I suggest we move on to look a little deeper.

"Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

The seed sown wittingly or unwittingly by British colonisers, and enthusiastically nursed and cultivated by Africans, who even water the exotic plant with their blood, is the idea of the militant political party as the institution by whose agency all the goals of life are to be achieved — an idea which in Africa meets its nemesis eventually in the coup against the one-party government which, in Africa, tends to be presented as its logical conclusion.

Along the way (as happened in Europe, whose master institution was once the Church and which should know better) the finest meaning to be attached to the word "freedom" has been disregarded and lost.

Precious

Freedom from an unwanted master is not half so precious as the freedom from the baser aspects of one's own self that is to be found in a relationship with God and a matching relationship with one's fellows.

"They have sown the wind, and they shall reap the whirlwind."

It is odd that nobody seems willing to call by the name of "terrorism" our sporadic and intermittent violence, and the worse violence in Mozambique. To do so would, perhaps, put in an unwelcome light the too similar activities that led to the triumph of militant nationalist political parties and which it is hoped will lead to a corresponding victory in South Africa.

Militancy breeds militancy. On the other hand the fruits of the spirit, such as mutual helpfulness, forbearance and regard, are won only by the exercise of the spirit.

I am far from knowing or even guessing how the necessary spiritual renewal might be brought about in modern Africa or any part of it. But I think I see the wrong track we are on, and that of itself it leads to a desert place.

FIRED UNION BOSS DENIES 'HIJACK' BID

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 9 Nov 80 p 2

[Text] ZIMBABWE'S trouble-torn labour movement was rocked again last week when bus driver Mr Matthews Mandava was sacked as general secretary of the Transport and General Workers' Union.

He was also expelled from the union —believed to be one of the biggest in the country—and kicked off the workers' committee at Salisbury United Omnibus Company.

The sacking follows allegations that he was trying to set up a splinter union to represent just SUOC workers.

But Mr Mandava, who has led the union since its formation in May, denied he was launching a new workers' group.

He claimed he was ousted because he tried to democratise the TGWU, and that many of the leaders were frightened of being outvoted in a free poll.

The decision to sack Mr Mandava as general secretary and vice-chairman of the Salisbury TGWU branch was taken at a national executive meeting.

Members of the SUOC workers' committee dismissed him as their vice-chairman at a later meeting.

Union president Mr Albert Mugabe said Mr Mandava had been sacked because he was "conniving" with SUOC general manager Mr Peter Hornblow to set up a "breakaway craft union" for company workers.

In the dismissal letter, Mr Mugabe said the 23-year-old bus driver had performed badly as union boss and had tried to "hijack" the union to the SUOC.

"His actions have been divisive," said Mr Mugabe. "The last thing we want at this difficult time is for the workers to be divided.

"We could tolerate this no longer."

He added that the national executive had appointed Mr Roderick Gonzo of Bulawayo as acting general secretary.

A vote for union leader will be held in January.

Mr Mugabe also called for the firing of Mr Hornblow as general manager of SUOC.

"He has interfered in trade union affairs," said Mr Mugabe. "We warn him now to keep his nose out of the labour movement — or else."

SUOC workers' committee chairman Mr Pilot Mhundura confirmed that Mr Mandava had been kicked off the committee.

"The decision was taken after a democratic vote because we heard that he was trying to form another union," said Mr Mhundura.

Mr Mandava, who has been a bus driver for four years, said: "That was just a rumour. There was never any truth in it."

He said the real reason for his fall from grace was his persistent call for democracy within the union. He wanted a congress to be held so that national executive members could face a vote by workers' delegates.

"Many people were scared of losing their positions of power by this," said Mr Mandava.

"They then ganged up on me."

He said the sacking was unjustified and unconstitutional — but he does not plan to appeal.

"I don't want to cause any trouble," said Mr Mandava from his Glen View home. "I'm not worried about positions of power — I just want the best for the workers."

SUOC general manager Mr Hornblow was not available for comment yesterday.

RESERVE BANK REPORT ON WAR ECONOMY PUBLISHED

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 9 Nov 80 p 2

[Text] The Reserve Bank has uncovered more details of Zimbabwe's economic performance during the years of sanctions and the war, illustrating the enormous costs involved and the heavy dependence on outside assistance.

In its first Quarterly Economic and Statistical Review, released on Friday and to be published every three months in future, the bank publishes foreign debt figures for the first time since UDI.

The total foreign debt jumped from $88,5 million in 1977 to $223,8 million in 1978.

By the end of 1979 the figure had risen to $353,3 million and peaked at $387.7 million in February this year. The total stood at $364,6 million at the end of June.

The total Government debt rose on parallel lines, and at the end of June stood at $1 667,3 million. The foreign debt then stood at 22 percent to total Government borrowings.

No details are given by the bank, but the jump in foreign borrowings would appear to involve increasing loans from Pretoria to help pay for the war.

The review expects Zimbabwe's real gross domestic product to reach about 5 percent in 1980 with positive growth in all the key sectors except agriculture, which was expected to make a neutral contribution.

Manufacturing output had been up 14 percent in the first six months of the year, the value of mining output 62 percent higher, and the real value of retail turnover up 12 percent.

The main thrust was coming from the manufacturing sector, but mining was also making a significant contribution, with earnings from gold production more than doubling and substantial increases in copper and nickel earnings.

It warned, however, that due to weaker metal prices in world markets, the present rate of growth in mining industry earnings was unlikely to be maintained.

The decline in overall building output at the start of the year was unlikely to continue as the value of building plans passed in the first six months of the year was 180 percent higher, in real terms, than the comparable 1979 period. Limited productive capacity, rather than demand, was likely to be the major constraint on the future growth of this sector.

Higher exports and improved terms of trade saw foreign exchange reserves rise $30 million in the first seven months of the year, though some decline in reserves is anticipated over the full year due to rapid import expansion.

The review notes the rapid increase in the money supply--up 33 percent in the past year--which it attributes to net Government borrowing from the banks in excess of $100 million.

It points out that the velocity of circulation has also risen in the past few months, making the rapid growth in the money supply "even more significant" and underlining the need for a reduction in the current growth rate of the monetary aggregates.

Although there had been some decline in bank liquidity in the second quarter of the year, the banking system remained very liquid and would be able to meet any increased demand for credit.

Between March and August the Zimbabwe dollar appreciated 3,5 percent against the U.S. dollar but weakened 3 percent against the South African rand.

The dollar also weakened by 3 percent against sterling, but strengthened in terms of the French franc and the Deutschmark.

The continued recovery of the economy during the first two months of 1980 was due to a considerable extent to increased consumer demand. Sales in the clothing, footwear and drapery sector, for instance, shot up by 41 percent in the first four months of the year.

The rate of inflation, measured in terms of the Consumer Price Index for higher income urban families, accelerated sharply during 1979, with December price levels 13,1 percent higher than a year before.

During the first few months of 1980, however, a substantial decline had occurred in the prevailing rate of price inflation, and by July overall consumer prices were less than 7 percent up on a year before.

The main reasons had been steadier oil prices, sales tax reductions and a recovery in labour productivity, associated with the ending of the war and increased production levels.

BUMPER YEAR FOR MINING REPORTED

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 9 Nov 80 p 4

[Text] With the value of Zimbabwe's mineral production continuing to increase, the mining industry seemed set for another record-breaking year, the Deputy Minister of Mines and Energy Resources, Mr Jini Ntuta, said in Gatooma yesterday.

Opening the Mines Officials and Salaried Staff Association Congress he said mineral production for the first eight months of the year was worth $274 million as compared with $315 million for the whole of last year.

In addition, the 2 applications for Exclusive Prospecting Orders filed in the last half of 1979 were a favourable indication of an increased interest in mineral resource development. Only one EPO had been filed in the 18 months before that, he said.

"My Government is conscious of the need to foster continued growth which, of course, is dependent on foreign investment and technical expertise. It would be detrimental to the national interest to interfere with such a successful industry as that which presently operates in Zimbabwe," he said.

The Government welcomed the participation of private enterprise in exploiting and developing the nation's mineral resources. Investment in the less developed areas of the country, however, was a priority of the Government's economic policy.

"In line with the policy, it is pleasing to note that a mining group operating in Zimbabwe has recently embarked on a major expansion programme at one of its gold mines situated in an underdeveloped area in the south-eastern part of the country."

Other interesting developments were the investigations into the production of methanol and ammonia from coal, the likely establishment of another coal mine at Lusulu, the expansion of Wankie Colliery and the establishment of a pilot plant at the Zinca Platinum mine.

There was also renewed interest in the nickel mine at Hunter's Road and an airborne radiometric search for uranium was in progress, Mr Ntuta said.

CHANGE OUR HISTORY BOOKS, EDUCATION EXPERT URGES

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 9 Nov 80 p 5

[Text] A RESEARCH fellow in the Faculty of Education at the University of Zimbabwe is compiling a report to be presented to the Ministry of Education for changes in the history curriculum in primary schools.

Dr N. A. Maraire, who has a PhD and an M.A. in curriculum development and educational planning, said he was compiling the report after extensive research in group A and B schools.

The research, started last year, included canvassing 235 headmasters and education officials on the relevance and usefulness of the present history and geography curricula.

"The intention was to find out whether the present curricula promoted our national identity," he said.

Dr Marairo said his research established that the history curriculum in Zimbabwean primary schools was irrelevant.

It discussed foreign concepts that had nothing to do with the people of Zimbabwe, and which did nothing to give an objective view of the contribution of the African people in the development of Zimbabwe, he said.

The Grade 5 history book for Group B schools described voyages of discovery, explorers and missionaries to pupils at ages when they should be learning the background of their own people.

"When reference is made to an African, it is always in the sense of whether he was amenable to white influence, Christianity or colonialism.

"If the African resisted, he was portrayed as a barbarian, a savage and a pagan. This colonial character of the history books needs to be changed."

Another lecturer, Mr A. C. Hodza, of the Department of African languages and culture, said he was writing a book on the history of Zimbabwe's people which he hoped would make a valuable contribution in Zimbabwean schools.

In his opinion a lot of things were omitted in the country's history books.

Questions about this country in the pre-colonial era — who its people and chiefs were, where they were situated, how they were ruled, went unanswered.

Only now were pupils learning about one or two names from the past — names that puzzled them.

"Zimbabwe has much greater history than just the names Nehanda, Kaguvi or Chaminuka. There are about 500 great names associated with Zimbabwe.

PROVINCES

"A lot can be unearthed to enrich Zimbabwe's history. I have established in my researches that what is now known as Zimbabwe was once divided into five provinces.

"They were Matanda, Mazwala, Tsunga, Hambiro and Ndowe and all had paramount chiefs and military supremes, one of whom was Dewere Gedzenga at Rukuti, the present site of Mabvuku Township.

"This is just to show what little we know of our past and how much must now be done to bring everything to light," Mr Hodza said.

Dr Marairo said the textbook ruled supreme in African primary schools, and the teacher was required to follow it slavishly.

In African schools teachers used only two history textbooks, one from each of the two main educational publishing houses, while in white schools they were free to use a series of textbooks, none prescribed.

The practice in African schools did not widen the education horizon of the child, teaching resources were extremely meagre.

Dr Marairo, who in the course of his studies did an analysis of curriculum policy making in post-colonial Jamaica, and another of ethnic history and its contribution to positive self respect, said a new social studies programme was being developed by the educational development unit of the Ministry of Education.

He would examine whether the new programme would redress the existing ills.

He said his researches in Canada, the United States and Jamaica brought out that although there was need to improve educational systems quantitively, they should also be improved qualitatively, especially in a post-colonial situation like Zimbabwe's.

BULAWAYO MAYOR CONDEMNS TRIBALISM

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 8 Nov 80 p 3

[Text]

THE split between major tribal groups in Zimbabwe should be healed to avoid chaos, the Mayor of Bulawayo, Councillor Mike Constandinos, said yesterday.

Addressing parents at Sobukazi secondary school prizegiving ceremony, Mr Constandinos said the tribal issue could unleash a "reign of terror".

"Although there is a degree of ethnic differences among the whites, tribalism affects the African more when it comes to the country as a whole.

"There appears to be a split between major tribal bodies. I have no hesitation in saying the future of us all will be in jeopardy if this split remains."

He called on Zimbabweans to help the country grew from strength to strength by sinking their ethnic differences.

"I am conscious of one fact: you cannot have a dissected country," he said.

In an apparent reference to strikes, Mr Constandinos said some workers were inclined to think of their work in terms of mouetary value rather than loyalty to their employers.

Loyalty, he said, was the key to improving the individual's character and quality of life, in the end benefiting his colleagues and the community.

While economic and political changes had opened up opportunities for all races, success could only be had through hard work.

He urged students to take up technical courses to offset the manpower shortage in the commercial, industrial and civil service sectors.

"What the country needs more than ever are people with the ability to use their hands and learn technical skills," Mr Constandinos said.

LAST REMEMBRANCE DAY CEREMONIES SCHEDULED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 8 Nov 80 p 1

[Article by Gilbert Mawarire]

[Text]

THIS year's Remembrance Day to honour those who died in the two World Wars will be the last to be held in Zimbabwe.

From next year, all remembrance celebrations will be incorporated into the national Heroes' Days on July 11 and 12.

This was disclosed last night by the Chief of Protocol, Mr Peter Chanetsa, who said all the fallen heroes of Zimbabwe would be honoured on the prescribed days.

Mr Chanetsa also said all diplomats and representatives of international organisations accredited to Zimbabwe had been advised not to attend the Remembrance Day celebrations tomorrow.

The celebrations would, however, not be cancelled as it was too late to do so since arrangements had been made some time ago.

"But this will be the last such Remembrance Day to be observed in Zimbabwe," he said.

"In fact, we plan to make the Heroes' Acre in Warren Hills the centre of all the celebrations to mark our fallen heroes and these will include all those who died for the good of our country during the 90 years o' colonialism," he added.

"We are not going to honour people who fought other people's wars."

Mr Chanetsa also noted that the Remembrance Day falls only two days before the 15th anniversary of UDI.

He warned that anybody found celebrating UDI would be dealt with.

"We are aware that some people might take some advantage of the Remembrance Day to celebrate UDI, but we would like to advise anybody with such intentions not to do so because we will not tolerate it," he said.

Mr Chanetsa is also the Assistant Secretary for Foreign Affairs in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

MOVE TO INCREASE BEEF OUTPUT REPORTED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 8 Nov 80 p 7

[Text] SLAUGHTER facilities have been extended for the first time to Salisbury butchers at the Cold Storage Commission abattoir. This will boost beef supplies in the city and alleviate the present restriction.

A request for local butchers to have access to service slaughter facilities at the abattoir was approved by Senator Denis Norman, Minister of Agriculture.

Approval was given after a meeting between the Minister, members of the Meat Traders' Association and the Matabeleland Master Butchers' Association, in Salisbury recently.

Senator Norman told the two associations that use of the abattoir facilities was subject to certain conditions.

Among these were that the level of slaughterings by individual butchers must be confined to a weight of beef equivalent to the reduction to their basic quota from the CSC for that week.

Butchers requesting the slaughter facilities must arrange this with the CSC on a weekly booking basis.

"Slaughter bookings will be accepted only up to the surplus slaughter capacity as determined by the commission," Senator Norman said.

This means that butchers in Salisbury will be allowed to buy cattle on an open market and slaughter at the CSC Salisbury abattoir, instead of sending their cattle to Gatooma or Que Que.

Mr W. H. Lashbrook, chairman of the Meat Traders' Association, said: "We are going to accept the offer subject to coming to an agreement about the cost of slaughtering."

He said that opening the Salisbury abattoir to local butchers was a step in the right direction because they could buy enough beef to satisfy their customers.

Mr Lashbrook said slaughtering would start as soon as it could be arranged.

Both associations had asked the Minister to control the point of slaughter because Matabeleland had private and municipal abattoirs while there were none in Mashonaland.

Mr Lashbrook said the situation had been unfair to local butchers, who were restricted in supplying beef from the open market, while their counterparts in Matabeleland had the use of adequate abattoir facilities.

Senator Norman declined to impose any control on the slaughter of cattle at municipal and private abattoirs after giving the issue careful consideration.

He made it clear that the service slaughterings would be undertaken only until the CSC lifted the current reduction in its basic quota allocation of beef.

It is believed that while some butchers will be eager to use the CSC facility others may not.

Mr Mitch Stamboli, a Salisbury butcher, said his use of the abattoir would depend on the "availability of CSC beef in relation to his business requirements and the price."

He said that there were a number of butchers in Salisbury who were closing their businesses at 1 p.m. and would therefore be keen to buy beef on the open market and use the abattoir.

Previously, the only independent slaughter facility that was available to Salisbury butchers was the independent Freecor-owned abattoir in Marandellas, but this was bought by the CSC for $330 000 in 1974.

The abattoir, operated by the Freecor subsidiary, Rhodesian Meat Suppliers, was opened in 1970 and within six months was showing a turnover of more than $100 000.

Some butchers have been using the facilities at the independent abattoir in Gatooma, but their number has been restricted by the costs of transport.

Local auctioneers have also said that transport costs have kept Matabeleland butchers from buying slaughter cattle in Mashonaland, as they did previously.

Mr Lashbrook welcomed the opportunity of using the Salisbury CSC abattoir because, he said, it would go a long way in reducing the amount of illegal slaughtering taking place in the bush.

AMBITIOUS PLANS TO DEVELOP SALISBURY ANNOUNCED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 8 Nov 80 p 1

[Text] A second university and polytechnic, a third airport and a new railway station were all included in the City of Salisbury's blueprint for the future, the Mayor, Councillor Jack Whiting, said yesterday.

Addressing members of the National Affairs Association in Salisbury, Mr Whiting said the new airport and second university should be built between 1984 and 1986.

Outlining the projected growth and development of the city over the next 20 years, he said maximum use would be made of available land by the erection of the largest possible properties.

Further limitations on vehicle movement were envisaged in central area streets and increased segregation between vehicles and pedestrians.

The city would also be looking for a site to stage both the Olympic and Commonwealth Games.

Construction

Anticipating vigorous redevelopment in the central commercial zones--with "the smell of wet concrete everywhere"--Mr Whiting said major industrial centres would be under construction in the western sector with light rail traffic serving Seke.

Other areas which would require the attention of the new council included:

Upgrading existing sub-standard housing, particularly where families had to live in a single room.

Improvement of market and small service facilities.

Provision of more trading sites for development by private enterprise, particularly in areas such as Glen View and Warren Park.

A need for more social and recreational facilities and upgrading existing ones.

Provision of credit facilities and an adequate extension service to help home-owners complete their houses.

Linking Queensway with the Enterprise Road.

An independent system of cycle tracks to feed the central business district from the suburbs.

Consideration of a site for a third airport and a second university and polytechnic.

A modern railway station containing shops, offices, etc.

Moving the showground complex to the Tynwald area to make way for a major transport terminus which would include the projected tram service and a heliport shuttle to the two major airports.

Farming strategy would be implemented intensively, with organised food production based on waste material from the city in green-belt areas. Peripheral industries, particularly those relative to food processing, would be established.

"In this way a man-made ecological system will have been created," Mr Whiting said.

BRIEFS

HOUSING SCHEME HIT--Bulawayo: The Government's decision to house ZIPRA and ZANLA forces in civilian areas was criticised yesterday at a Patriotic Front rally at Gokwe. Mr Sidney Malunga, PF whip and MP for Matabeleland North, said he and others questioned the wisdom of placing these men in the suburbs of Salisbury and Bulawayo. "Now there is talk of disarming them. But won't this precipitate a crisis which will bring misery to the people? There has always been a tendency to pick on ZIPRA as the culprits in incidents. We of the PF deplore this attitude because our forces are highly responsible but lethal when provoked." Accusing ZANU (PF) of "inciting its supporters to resort to confrontation", he said the country expected responsible, progressive statements from the Government. WHEAT RESERVE DOWN--Rapidly growing consumption of bread combined with declining wheat production could lead to wheat shortages late next year if at least one of the trends was not reversed, the deputy general manager of the Grain Marketing Board, Mr A. B. Long, said last week. "The board has been carrying surplus stocks of wheat for some years but the situation has suddenly turned rather critical in that production has been falling and consumption has been rising," Mr Long said. Production countrywide dropped from 208 000 tonnes in 1978-79 to 160 000 tonnes last year, mainly due to the influence of the war and the drought. Initial estimates for this year were 145 000 tonnes, since revised to 160 000, he said. "The wheat sold to millers and sold by them to bakers is being milled at maximum capacity, 24 hours a day, seven days a week. Bread, because of its relative cheapness, is now being consumed as never before. Such a situation is fine while stocks of wheat are available, but in the event of the barrel being scraped dry the board, providing funds were made available to it, would have to import," Mr Long said. [Text] [Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 9 Nov 80 p 8]

INTERPOL MEMBERSHIP APPLICATION--The Deputy Minister of Home Affairs, Mr Tarisai Ziyambi, Zimbabwe's Commissioner of Police, Mr Peter Allum, and two other police officers, leave tomorrow for Manila, in the Philippines, where they will attend the 49th general assembly of Interpol--the international criminal police organisation. The general assembly of Interpol, which begins on November 13, will consider Zimbabwe's application for membership of the organisation. Senator Ziyambi will go on from Manila to the United States, Britain and several African countries, where he will study the organisation and training of police officers, said a Ministry of Home Affairs statement.--Iana. SOUTHERN AFRICA TRANSPORTATION DEVELOPMENTS DISCUSSED

Dependence on South Africa

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 27 Oct 80 p 31

[Text]

Transport sources in South Africa believe that the spate of conferences and resolutions aimed at lessening southern African nations' dependence on South Africa's transport network are more than mere hot air and empty rhetoric.

They say that the recently constituted Transport Commission of the Nine, with headquarters in Maputo is serious in tackling the subcontinent's infrastructural problems and that headway has already been made.

They point to the recently re-opened Chicualacuala/Maputo line which connects Mozambique's southern part with Salisbury. In addition, the commission has organised an International Conference of Doners in November from which funds are expected to be forthcoming for some of the projects mooted.

MISNOMER

Mozambique's Deputy-Director of Ports and Railways, Mr Zacarias Palla de Lima, noted that the title of the conference was something of a misnomer. "What we are looking for is not primarily aid, but commercial investment as these projects will be profitable for investors."

He hoped however that a good part of the finance needed for transport and communication projects would flow from the conference.

The November conference will mark the third meeting of the commission since its inception. All have been held in Mozambique.

While there is no accurate figure on the monetary needs of intended improvements, delegates at a meeting in Arusha, Tanzania, said that R1 200m will be needed in the next decade.

SMALL

This figure seems disproportionately small considering the scope of planned improvements. Major projects and developments mentioned include the electrification of the line between Maputo and Gwelo, the rehabilitation of the Beira/Salisbury and Ncala/Malawi lines, and the addition of a section of the line in Malawi to link it with Zambia.

In addition to these rail projects various road improvements in Botswana and the rebuilding of the Salisbury / Mozambique roads will be put forward. A further plan to improve shipping on Lake Malawi has also been suggested.

Other items are said to include refurbishing and purchasing of materials handling equipment, dredging of the Mozambique ports, conversion of certain light guage rail lines, alleviation of the shortage of rolling stock and traction units (although individual nations have taken steps on their own accounts to alleviate the latter shortage) and ballasting of existing rail lines.

A master plan for Maputo, drawn up by a New York company, has recommended that the channel be deepened and widened to accommodate giant bulk ore carriers and the building of a new coal terminal.

Tenders have already been received for the expansion of the Matola coal terminal. "Maputo port director, Mr Jorge de Sousa Coelho, said the port was operating at 60 percent of its capacity of 6m tons of cargo a year and he hoped with the addition of new handling equipment, that this would reach 90 percent within a year.

South African Railways has been instrumental in alleviating the shortage of all types of equipment, alleviating the shortage of derailments on the Maputo/Komatipoort line, placed an embargo on Maputo bound traffic after the 1 800 truck limit was reached.

On the other hand it lent Beira port 7 Garrett steam locomotives for shunting and private companies have also assisted with much needed material handling equipment. An order of about 200 forklift trucks is expected for Beira at the end of the year.

At Ncala, which handles most of Malawi's trade, a container handling crane, the first of its kind, is only expected to be commissioned by February/March next year because of structural siting problems.

RE-OPENED

Mozambique's rail links to Zimbabwe are officially open. The Chicualacuala/Maputo line was reopened on October 3 but the temporary repairs on bridges bombed during the war in Zimbabwe are only sufficient to carry half axle loads. Trains now running are only carrying 2 200 tons. Steel and sugar comprise cargo on the Maputo run and the return run is devoted to petrol and diesel although there is a chronic shortage of tankers.

The line is, however, in urgent need of ballasting as well as bridge repairs and while Zimbabwe is reputedly building rolling stock for Mozambique, those confiscated by Mozambique in 1975 after the border closure are fast becoming unserviceable.

BLOWN

The anti Frelimo resistance movement (MNR) has blown up sections of the Beira/Umtali line at least three times recently and local sources are fearful of a Unita/Angola situation developing.

The most recent attack took place on October 20 when a train was blown up. Mozambique railway authorities are believed to have cleared the line which was only able to carry small cargo trains once a day in each direction as the line is urgently in need of ballasting.

Outside of Mozambique the Benguela line is still inoperable because of Unita activity in south Angola, while embargoes and bottlenecks have brough about a greater amount of transshipment by road of goods bound for Zambia and Zaire.

Increase in Road Haulage

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 27 Oct 80 p 23

[Article by Geoff Schuttleworth]

[Text]

Over the past three months, and especially since the ending of hostilities in Zimbabwe, there has been a sharp decline in cargo airfreighted to Malawi, Zambia and Zaire and an equally sharp rise in road haulage.

While the flow of goods to South Africa's northern neighbours has increased dramatically since the beginning of the year, rail routes are becoming less clogged as the bulk maize cargoes have largely been delivered.

Nevertheless, the South African Railways continues to place restrictions or embargoes on goods travelling north, particularly to Zaire and Zambia but also Zimbabwe and now for the first time Mozambique. Zimbabwe is now handling 97 000 tons a month from South Africa — double the amount a few months back.

REPAIRS

Rail efficiency is not only hampered by the slow turnaround times at destinations because of a shortage both of staff and traction units, but repairs afforded to some of the routes are in cases only of a temporary nature and loads are sometimes reduced by half to cater for a lack of ballasting.

The use of road transport has also become more popular as a means of speeding up deliveries which have been placed under embargo. This is particularly so in Zimbabwe. On other routes forwarders have grown wise and are now sending freight to the north only by road.

TARRED ROAD

Over 75 trucks a week are now using the Kazangula ferry in Botswana, — 10 a day destined for Zambia and about five a week to Zaire. Goods destined for Malawi are more frequently being provided by Zimbabwe and hauled there by road transport. In the height of the Zimbabwe war, 10 flights a week landed at Blantyre but this has been reduced to about two a week.

Another route being used more extensively than before is through Mocambique, to Salisbury via Beira. The route offers the nearest to a fully tarred road, a not inconsiderable point, bearing in mind that the rainy season in Botswana makes travel impossible for weeks on end.

But the route has its disadvantages — the Mo-Zambican National Resistance Movement (MNR) has not only blown rail links, but has attacked convoys under Frelimo protection travelling north between Maputo and Beira. One South African truck was destroyed recently in peculiar circumstances, while others have been reported hit by the guerillas, although these remain unconfirmed.

Those who use the route move fully loaded to Maputo, and then travel to Beira where most goods are discharged. Further goods are taken to Salisbury, especially since the recently opened Beira/Salisbury line not only suffered from ballasting problems, but has also been blown up to at least three times in the last three months. Once in Salisbury, the South African trucks are able to take cargoes back to the Reef, mostly with bricks.

South African road operators are however concerned by the apparent favouring of Zimbabwe hauliers outside of South Africa as far as the granting of permits is concerned.

PERMITS

In many instances, cargoes which are trucked to the border either at Kazangula or Beit Bridge frequently have to be transhipped because of a failure to get permits granted.

Local operators are nevertheless confident that current buoyant conditions will continue and they are expecting a boom towards the end of next year when equipment destined for the extensions to the Wankie power station is expected to flow in at South African rather than Mozambican ports.

At present conditions are buoyant enough for rates to have dropped by around 15 percent. Returns, despite the risks particularly in Mocambique, are around two or three times those earned in South Africa.

ZAMBIA, ZIMBABWE TO RESOLVE RAIL ASSETS QUESTION

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 9 Nov 80 p 7

[Text] Sunday Times Reporter ZAMBIA and Zimbabwe are still to resolve the sharing of assets of the defunct Rhodesia Railways unitary system which was disbanded in 1967.

The system was dissolved after Zambia became independent in 1964 and established her own railway network.

The dissolution was influenced by the Unilateral Declaration of Independence by a white minority clique led by Ian Smith in 1965.

This made it impossible for the two sides to meet and discuss the sharing of assets amicably because Zambia did not recognise the rebel regime in the then Rhodesia.

According to a Zambia Railways spokesman, when the system broke up, it had a total of 13,000 wagons out of which Zambia got only 3,000.

Other assets included 403 steam locomotives with Zambia getting only 87 of these and 72 passenger coaches.

The assets included buildings and repair workshops, some farms and land.

Asked if there were any plans to share the assets, the spokesman said the problem would have to be settled by authorities from the two governments after they had met to discuss the matter.

Ministry of Power and Transport and Communications officials, who are responsible for negotiations with their Zimbabwean counterparts were not available for comment.

In 1974, the dissolution committee encountered several problems with the rebel regime when they held talks aimed at settling the issue.

This resulted in Zambia having to import rolling stock to replace those stranded in Rhodesia. Very little of the equipment was recovered by Zambia because of the politically hostile situation between the two countries.

The then permanent secretary for planning and finance Mr Luke Mwamanshika, said Zambia would make every effort to ensure that all her assets were returned to her as a matter of necessity.

He described as "wishful thinking" reports from Rhodesia that Zambia would not get its share of the assets because of the financial problems facing the system.

Meanwhile, a Zambia Railways spokesman has announced that the electrification programme of the system may be introduced next year.

The spokesman said once feasibility studies going on were completed and accepted, a decision would be made on when the programme would be implemented.

The studies being undertaken would among other things, determine the viability on the system, see if the programme would facilitate the movement of trains, and whether it would be economically beneficial.

PRESIDENT GIVES VIEWS ON INTERNATIONAL, DOMESTIC ISSUES

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 4 Oct 80 pp 1, 9

/Article by Ibrahim al-Wayshi: "Hassan Gouled, President of Arab Djibouti, Talks to AL-QABAS: No Facilities for America--Our Land Is Not for Rent"/

/Text/ The day after tomorrow, Monday, Mr Barakat Gourad Hamadou, the prime minister of Djibouti, will arrive in Kuwait on an official 3-day visit during which talks will take place with officials on a number of issues of concern to the two countries.

AL-QABAS sent our colleague Ibrahim al-Wayshi to the Republic of Djibouti to hold a series of meetings with the forgotten Arab country which lies at the Bab el-Mandeb on the east coast of Africa, on the shores of the Red Sea and the Gulf of Aden.

The President of Djibouti, Mr Hassan Gouled, talked to AL-QABAS and asserted that his country would never grant any military facilities to the United States of America, saying "The news being bruited about on this subject has no basis in truth. Our land is not for rent."

President Gouled took up the subject of the struggle over the Red Sea area and Bab el-Mandeb, stating that this struggle threatens the area with danger. He called on foreign countries to leave the people of Africa to solve their problems by themselves, without interference.

President Gouled also dealt with the dangers threatening Djibouti from its two neighbors, Somalia and Ethiopia, saying "Danger does not come to us from these two neighbors alone, but from other parties as well."

Concerning the concentrated French presence on Djibouti territory, he stressed that this presence is continuing in accordance with his personal request and that these forces are protecting his country from all foreign dangers and preserving its independence.

The president of Djibouti talked about the economics of his country, saying that "It is zero" and that Arab brothers must support his country and offer it aid so that it will be able to preserve its independence.

"We are people of the desert, in broad day light. When midday comes and the sun spreads its light with utmost justice, we know full well, under the thorns, that equality is not a mirage. As far as we go, we know that man, whatever his color or wealth may be, is man, born of woman, and that in 9 months he starts to count the days which will be available to him until death. We are the descendents of poverty and economic oppression."

These are words from the speech by President Hassan Gouled Aptidon, president of the Republic of Djibouti, before the United Nations General Assembly on 21 September 1977, after the former's admission to membership in the international organization, when it became its 148th member.

President Gouled, who led the movement of the people of Djibouti's struggle against the French colonization of his country, which lasted 115 years and united this people which lives on the western shore of Bab el-Mandeb, the gateway to the Red Sea, feels the sufferings of his poor people and lives with their hunger and thirst.

When we met the president in his extremely modest office in the presidential palace in Djibouti, he began by stating, with a paternal smile on his lips, "You are welcome to independent Arab Islamic Djibouti." The president's description of his country as "independent" was one of the main focal points of our conversation, which lasted 2 hours, in view of the sensitivity which the intense French military presence on Djibouti territory reflects although more than 3 years have elapsed since the country's independence in every Arab who visits Djibouti, on grounds that the "anthem" of independence has not been completed.

Through his responses, President Gouled forcefully asserted the fact of his country's independence and full sovereignty. He talked about the foreign designs which his country is exposed to and decisively denied any intention to give America military facilities on Djibouti territory. The president also explained his concept of national unity.

However, the deteriorating economic circumstances which the people of the Republic of Djibouti are experiencing were the prominent feature of President Hassan Gouled's answers to most of our questions.

A List of Accounts

/Question/ Honorable president, your visit to Kuwait in March 1978 was an important step along the road to consolidating relations between the two fraternal countries. Would you be so kind as to mention what achievements have been made in the context of the development and consolidation of these relations?

/Answer/ My official visit to Kuwait to which you referred was an effective contribution to implanting the bonds of fraternity and friendship which exist between the two countries, and it opened broad scope for fruitful cooperation between us. We hope that cooperation will increase on behalf of the interests of the two fraternal peoples.

Djibouti's relations with Arab brethren in general are based on the principle of Arab solidarity, mutual respect and nonintervention in domestic affairs.

/Question/ How that three years have elapsed since Djibouti joined the League of Arab States, what are the most prominent items in your list of accounts with it? That is, what has the Republic of Djibouti offered in the league context and what benefit has your membership brought you?

/Answer/ Directly after independence, the Repbulic of Djibouti joined the Arab League and by joining regained its Arab personality and stressed its affiliation with the Arab family. The aid the Arab League states offered Djibouti after independence were a strong and effective push in support of this fledgling state.

Young Djibouti, in spite of its scarce resources, is sparing no effort to support the principles of Arab unity, work to achieve it, and defend legitimate Arab rights.

/Question/ Alongside the party you head, is there any intention to permit the establishment of other parties, in the context of national unity?

/Answer/ There actually is another party besides the Popular Independence Grouping and that is the National Independence Party.

/Question/ Is it represented in the government and parliament?

/Answer/ Yes, there are ministers and members of parliament who were members of this party before independence. In general, the Popular Independence Grouping includes all the other parties, on grounds that it contains members who belonged to various parties.

We are not opposed to the principle of establishing other parties besides the Popular Independence Grouping, as long as these parties do not engage in activities which will have the effect of infringing on the stability and independence of Djibouti--I mean, will not engage in acts of sabotage and destruction which will disturb the country's security and peace.

/Question/ Is there a sort of opposition in the party or parliamentary structure? Would you permit the presence of such opposition to continue?

/Answer/ Since the start of independence we have chosen the system of democratic instructions, and in the context of these institutions the people can exercise the freedom to express opinions through the General Assembly (parliament) or in the framework of the party through their representatives.

French Is Dominant

/Question/ A visitor to Djibouti observes that the French language, not Arabic, is dominant both on the official level and in public life. Is there any Arabization plan for the future?

/Answer/ As you know, Djibouti attained its independence in 1977. When we attained national sovereignty over our country, we adopted measures which would bring us back to the great Arab nation. Djibouti joined the League of Arab States, which has helped us greatly to sow the seeds of the Arabic language by sending teachers to teach in the Djibouti schools.

After independence, we introduced the Arabic language into all schools and stages of education so that our country could assume its natural place among the countries of the Arab nation and so that the Arabic language in the near future could be the official language of the Republic of Djibouti.

/Question/ Isn't it the official language of the country now?

/Answer/ We are still exerting efforts to make it an official language in the near future. In the context of the development of relations between Djibouti and its brethren, there a number of schools which have arisen, paid for by the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. Fraternal Iraq has also contributed to establishing Arabic primary schools and has sent the teachers needed for this school; they are working at the expense of the Iraqi government.

Let me emphasize an important fact which does not require debate, namely that any visitor to Djibouti can also observe the Djibouti people's adherence to the Islamic values which arise from our pure religion, in spite of the colonialism which lasted 115 years.

An Arab Minority

/Question/ Honorable president, yours is the only Arab country which has allotted some parliamentary seats to an Arab minority. Isn't that strange for an Arab country.

/Answer/ There is no Arab minority in parliament; all members are Arabs. However, there are Somali members or Ethiopian members. All members are Djiboutis and they represent the Djibouti Arab people.

/Question/ Honorable president, would you be so kind as to describe your position on national unity?

/Answer/ We understand national unity to mean equality of rights and obligations among all the members of this nation. We are making the necessary efforts to establish a society which will be dominated by stability, loyalty, love and brotherhood.

The strategy of developing our society in Djibouti is aimed at improving the citizens' living conditions by providing their basic needs through development achievements, in accordance with the country's scant resources.

Foreign Designs

/Question/ By virtue of its important geographic situation and political strategy, your country is exposed to the danger of foreign designs, honorable president. Where does this danger come from, in your opinion? From Somalia, or more from Ethiopia?

/Answer/ Directly after the Republic of Djibouti acquired independence we appealed for the codification of a sort of cooperation among the countries of the region, and our country drew up a clear policy founded on good neighborliness. Young Djibouti wants this region to be land of concurrence and interchange for the sake of preserving peace and stability.

As regards foreign designs on Djibouti, they do not just come from Ethiopia or Somalia; there are designs from other countries. This lies within the context of strategy and the international conflict.

While it is said that competition and conflict exist among the countries of the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean, the fact is that the real competition is over the waterway, the Bab el-Mandeb, which links the Indian Ocean to the Red Sea. It is no secret to anyone that when ships pass from the Suez Canal toward the Indian Ocean, they must go through the Bab el-Mandeb.

/Question/ What preparations have you made to avoid these dangers and to resist designs on the Bab al-Mandeb?

/Answer/ There is no way to preserve security and stability in the region except through full cooperation among the countries lying along the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean. We have emphasized this on many occasions and have demanded that a kind of dialogue be established among these countries in order to repel dangers and preserve peace and security.

The foreign policy of the Republic of Djibouti in this region is clear but there is obvious ambivalence in the policy of some countries of the region.

/Question/ What do you mean by ambivalence?

/Answer/ We do not like to hear criticisms of Djibouti's foreign policy from certain countries in the region, but we always prefer not to answer but to adhere to silence, in order not to enter into bickering which is of no benefit.

The French Presence

/Question/ Although three years have elapsed since Djibouti's independence, French military forces estimated at about 4,500 troops still are present. What is the reason for the presence of these forces?

/Answer/ This French military presence lies within the context of the defense agreement between France and Djibouti. These Forces take part in preparing and training domestic military personnel and staffs and their presence is also considered support for the economic life of the country.

I would like to emphasize that the presence of French forces in Djibouti and their retention after independence occurred in accordance with my request and that they are performing a specific mission, which is to defend the security and stability of Djibouti against all foreign aggression, in addition to training the domestic army. As for security and stability within the country, the domestic forces are responsible for that. It has been necessary for us to retain this French military presence in the absence of other effective solutions.

/Question/ What do you mean by other solutions, Mr President?

/Answer/ The other solution I mean are possibilities of supporting and strengthening the economic situation in Djibouti. Our economy is suffering from a severe state of weakness. The French presence in our country helps it avoid the deterioration and aggravation of the economic situation; it is the lack of economic buttresses for our country which caused us to allow the continued French presence after independence.

We are going through a transitional state, and the day we are able to perform our obligations, defend our nation and protect its security and stability in the region we will be able to dispense with the services of France. In any event the agreement stipulates that we have the right to request the evacuation of these forces at any time.

/Question/ What do you mean, Mr President, by saying that the presence of the French forces supports the economic condition of your country?

/Answer/ The French military personnel totals 4,500 troops, and a number of them are living here with their families and relatives, in addition to a large number of French civilians. They effectively help support our economy since as long as the Djibouti economy remains dependent on services they will be considered a buttress of this economy. We have no other sources of income such as heavy industry, light industry or even agriculture.

By virtue of the friendship and cooperation agreement signed by Djibouti and France after independence, France is committed to defending Djibouti against all foreign attack. There are also other agreements in the context of economic and technical cooperation which bind the French government to offer the necessary aid to the Republic of Djibouti by sending experts, technicians, teachers and doctors. This French aid to the Republic of Djibouti costs France US $45 million a year; France takes charge of paying the salaries of its personnel, the costs of training and arming them and training its staffs, and of paying another sum to pay the salaries of experts' technicians and all French aides, since the state budget is unable to meet these requirements.

The Independence Anthem

/Question/ But don't you consider, honorable president, that this great French presence infringes on the independence of Djibouti?

/Answer/ Not at all. The French presence absolutely does not obstruct our exercise of national sovereignty on our territory. This presence results from agreements which we ourselves approved in complete freedom. In fact, it is primarily this French presence in Djibouti that enables us to exercise our complete absolute national sovereignty.

No Facilities for America

/Question/ Some news has appeared concerning negotiations between you and America to give America naval and air military facilities. What is the extent of truth in that?

/Answer/ There is no basis of truth to such gossip. It is not true at all.

/Question/ If America, let's assume, requested such facilities, would you agree?

/Answer/ We cannot accept that. That is in conflict with our principles. We are a country which is committed to neutrality and nonalignment. In addition to that, we would be renting our territory.

/Question/ Excuse me, Mr President, I myself have observed some American military vessels in Djibouti harbor.

/Answer/ Djibouti's economy depends on services. These are ships in transit which are supplied with fuel and water only. They ask for permits in advance to anchor their ships or supply them with fuel before these ships arrive.

/Question/ Considering that Djibouti lies on the African shore of Bal el-Mandeb, how do you view the issues of the eastern African continent--Somalia and Ethiopia and the issue of foreign intervention in Africa in general?

/Answer/ About a month ago I sent an appeal to belligerent countries in the east African area to remedy the problems existing among them by peaceful means, through dialogue, negotiation and cooperation, so that there could be a guarantee of peace and stability and a future for the people of this region and so that the countries of the region could also be able to carry out development plans in it.

As regards foreign intervention in Africa, we condemn all foreign intervention on this continent. We believe that the Africans' problems must be solved in an African context alone and not by the intervention of foreign countries or parties.

Two hours had passed, and President Hassan Gouled was still expressing his readiness to answer further questions.

Before he bade us goodbye his excellency spoke again about the economic conditions of Djibouti, and was very agitated when he said:

"Before independence, it was the French government which was in charge of covering the fiscal deficit of the state. Now, however, the situation is completely different. The Djibouti economy is in a state of zero. Therefore we are asking our Arab brothers to aid us in order to preserve our independence. We are requesting this aid only in order to achieve development projects through agreement with the country which gives us this aid or the fund which provides it. They will have full power to follow up on these projects until they are completed."

Then President Gouled said, at the end,

"We in Djibouti are faced with exorbitant expenses both in operating government departments and in subsidizing the necessary consumer goods for citizens. All that requires the support we are aspiring to from our fraternal brothers so we may be able to establish development plans which will help us fulfil the citizen's rights and maintain the independence of our country."

PREMIER STRESSES NONALIGNMENT, ASKS FOR MONEY

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 5 Oct 80 p 9

/Article by Ibrahim al-Wayshi: "Barakat Hamadou, Prime Minister of Djibouti, to AL-QABAS: We will Never Allow the Port of Djibouti To Be Used for Military Purposes"/

/Text/ Tomorrow, Monday, Mr Barakat Gourad Hamadou, the prime minister of the Republic of Djibouti, will reach Kuwait on an official visit to the country which will take 3 days, during which discussions will be held with officials on a number of points included in the agenda.

Mr Hamadou's visit to Kuwait lies in the context of an "intermittent" tour in which he will visit a number of Arab Gulf states. He began with a visit to the state of the United Arab Emirates the last week of September and is to visit the fraternal states of Qatar and Bahrain in the near future.

During his conversation with AL-QABAS, the premier of Djibouti described the goals and conclusions of his visit to the state of the Arab emirates and dealt with Kuwaiti-Djibouti relations, describing them as "special relations" and saying "Kuwait has offered and is offering much assistance to Djibouti and other fraternal and friendly countries."

During the conversation, which lasted an hour and a half in his office in the ministerial complex in the capital, Djibouti, Mr Hamadou said that the state budget comes to US $70 million and that it all comes from taxes and port services.

The prime minister stressed that without Arab aid to his country, Djibouti would be exposed to foreign designs. He also mentioned that his country imports everything and produces absolutely nothing except salt. He said that even salt production is not commercially exploited, because of an absence of technical and technological resources.

Mr Hamadou called on Arab investors to invest their money in Djibouti, stressing that the investment law there guarantees many benefits and facilities.

In his capacity as a port minister as well, the prime minister of Djibouti said that his country was prepared to grant adequate guarantees to countries of the African Horn to use the port of Djibouti, but on condition that this use be only for commercial purposes, not military ones.

He talked about the problem of the refugees whom the war between Somalia and Ethiopia had cast out onto Djibouti's borders, stating that they were numerous, representing 12 percent of the population of Djibouti, and were to be considered a burden on his country's economy.

He denied the rumors being circulated to the effect that there was discrimination between the people of the Afar and Issa tribes, the giggest tribes in Djiboukti. He said, "It is not true that the Afars have been excluded from power. I am one of them."

Special Relations

/Question/ What are the goals of your latest visit to the state of the United Arab Emirates? Did it achieve its desired objectives?

/Answer/ My visit to the fraternal state of the emirates lay within the context of brotherly relations and relations of friendship between the two countries. We are always anxious that there be continuous meetings between officials of the two countries, with the objective of exchanging views on the current conditions in the Arab nation.

During the visit we, with our brothers in the state of the emirates, addressed ourselves to relations of cooperation between the two countries and the possibility of offering aid to Djibouti so that it would be able to carry out its development projects.

The results were fruitful and positive. There was a warm, brotherly reception by our brothers in the state of the emirates and an understanding of Djibouti's point of view. Officials in the fraternal Arab emirates stressed to me that the projects the Republic of Djibouti presented received their attention and that the emirates would help carry them out. There is a promise to provide a financial grant to complete the projects we are intending to carry out.

/Question/ What are the objectives of your current visit to Kuwait? Will it be followed by visits to other Gulf states?

/Answer/ My visit to the fraternal state of Kuwait also lies within the context of consolidating the bonds of brotherly relations which exist between the two countries. Kuwait has provided us with aid which has helped eliminate the difficulties we are suffering from. About a year ago we presented Kuwait with a number of development projects with the objective of getting aid for carrying them out. During my current visit I will discuss the issue of this aid which we have requested with our Kuwaiti brothers, and we will also discuss the possibility of obtaining a loan from the Kuwait Development Fund to finance projects in the port of Djibouti. We are sure that the fraternal state of Kuwait will spare no effort to support the economy of Djibouti, within the limits of its capabilities.

During this visit we will also address ourselves to a discussion of the current situation in the Arab nation and in the Horn of Africa in particular.

This visit will be followed by others to the fraternal states of Qatar and Bahrain.

/Question/ How would you describe Kuwaiti-Djibouti relations at the present time?

/Answer/ Our relations with the state of Kuwait are excellent. They are based on the principles of Arab solidarity, fraternity and mutual respect. We extol these fraternal relations and are sure that they will gain in strength in the future for the sake of the common interests of the two fraternal peoples.

Djibouti's relations with Kuwait are special ones. The state of Kuwait has offered much aid to Djibouti and other Arab and Islamic countries which are in need of Arab support. For this reason we are certain that Kuwait will spare no effort to aid Djibouti and support its economy so that it may be able to preserve its independence.

A Deficit Budget

/Question/ What are Djibouti's sources of national income? Are there development plans, and what are the aspirations of these plans?

/Answer/ The general budget of the state is estimated at about 12.5 billion Djibouti francs or approximately US $70 million. The revenues for this budget come from the services provided by the major facilities in Djibouti, among the most important of which is the port of Djibouti.

As we have said, Djibouti's economy is concentrated on services. The revenues of the state come from taxes imposed on commercial and real estate revenues and from taxes imposed on commercial profits inside the country. These are the sources of state budget income. There are no other sources in the form of organizations or productive projects, such as large or small industries. The fact is that the state budget goes entirely to operate government offices through expenditures, salaries and equipment. There is no money available to use in establishing development projects.

Without Arab aid, we would be exposed to the designs and dangers of foreign powers. We hope that the fraternal states will understand the situation which we in Djibouti are now suffering from.

We are intending to prepare the development plan, which could be ready in a few months. Then we will be able to ask for aid from some Arab development funds to help us carry out the projects which this plan will contain.

France--the Greatest Aid

/Question/ What are the sources of the assistance Djibouti is receiving at the present time?

/Answer/ The French government is the principal one aiding us. It is providing us with great annual support totalling US $45 million or about 8,008,000,000 Djibouti francs. This aid is used for the expenses of training and arming the national army. The government of France also defrays the salaries of French aides in the form of technicians and advisors. This French aid is considered important as far as we are concerned, since it is to be considered great economic support for Djibouti.

Fraternal Arab countries offer us various amounts of aid. The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia has given us a big financial grant which, according to the agreement concluded between us, was spent on carrying out big development projects which had the most expansive effect on the spirits of the Djibouti people, such as the telecommunications ground station, in addition to other health, education and housing projects.

Iraq also presented us with a financial grnat directly after independence to cover the financial deficit in the state budget. This aid will also be spent on a project to construct common housing and a cement plan project. It is offering aid for about 30 percent of the costs of this plant, which come to $70 million. Iraq has also offered us aid in the area of drilling wells and combating drought, is helping us build schools and is also giving aid in the field of agriculture.

The Libyan Jamahiriyah has also contributed to some development projects, buying the necessary drilling rigs to drill for potable water, and it will help us establish a maternity hospital.

Kuwait has given us a financial grant to cover the deficit in the state budget and the Kuwaiti Fund for Development has offered us aid to establish a dairy plant in Djibouti. In addition, the state of the Arab emirates has also offered a financial grant to cover the fiscal deficit in the state budget and establish a clinic.

/Question/ How do you view Djibouti's economic future?

/Answer/ We are optimistic about the future and are sure that Arab brethren will enable us to pave the way toward economic and social development.

We Produce Only Salt!

/Question/ Does the Republic of Djibouti really import everything and produce absolutely nothing? Is it true that most of your imports come from France?

/Answer/ We actually produce absolutely nothing. We import all our food and equipment needs from abroad, and we import most of our food requirements from France.

/Question/ But Djibouti is a salt-producing country and there is also fish in large quantities along your coasts.

/Answer/ Yes, there are large amounts of salt, but they are not used industrially and there are no resources for making industrial use of the quantities of fish which can be produced from the waters of Djibouti. We have no money to exploit these natural resources.

/Question/ In the context of your development efforts, are there plans to attract Arab capital to invest in Djibouti?

/Answer/ By the nature of the case, the development plan will give consideration to encouraging Arab investments. We welcome our Arab brothers as investors to construct productive projects in Djibouti.

Great resources are available to Arab investors under the Investment Law. It is possible for investors to participate in all development projects. The Djibouti economy concentrates on free exchange, which helps attract Arab capital in particular.

Guarantees of the Use of the Port

/Question/ The port of Djibouti is considered the internal lung of Africa, Somalia and Ethiopia. What services can this port offer the countries of the African Horn? Are there guarantees regarding the use of this port?

/Answer/ The strategic geographic situation of the port of Djibouti, and its distinctive situation from the standpoint of the area's sea communications, give this port an important role in the sphere of regional trade. Djibouti wants to benefit from its unique situation in order to develop its economy. The transport and communications system also constitute the pulsating heart of the countries of the region.

The Republic of Djibouti is prepared to give guarantees concerning the use of the port to all countries of the African Horn provided that use be made of the port for commercial purposes only. We will never allow the port to be used for any other purposes, such as military purposes, for example.

/Question/ What is the number of refugees from Ethiopia and Somalia in your country? What relevant solutions are there for resolving the problem of the refugees? What are your programs for giving them sustenance and shelter?

/Answer/ The refugees poured into Djibouti in the beginning of the Somali-Ethiopian war. Tens of thousands of refugees sought shelter at our borders, to the point where the proportion of refugees now comes to about 12 percent of the population of the republic. Their influx has helped weaken steps toward development, constituting a heavy burden on the economic situation in Djibouti and on its economic and social institutions, which with their intrinsic resources cannot meet the needs of the citizens of Djibouti themselves. It is not in out country's power to absorb these massive amounts of refugees.

No Factional Disputes

/Question/ Some former senior officials in the government of Djibouti accuse the current government of keeping members of the Afar tribe out of power, which citizens belonging to the Issa tribe monopolize. What is your answer to that?

/Answer/ That gossip is absolutely untrue. I for example am of Afar stock. How can the Afars be kept out of power when the prime minister is one of them? The fact is that there is a large number of ministers and senior government officials who belong to the Afar bribe. There are sic ministers in the cabinet. In fact, it may be observed that the Afar ministers hold down important ministries, such as defense, finance and national economy, industry, justice and health. I for example am in charge of the Ministry of Port Affairs as well as being the prime minister. So where is the oppression?

Those who are making criticism at the present time are themselves ones who backed the wise policy of the president and praised it. Now, however, now that they have been banished from power, they are trafficking in some contradictions and are deluding the outer world into believing that there are tribal disputes between the Afars and Issas. The tribal problem has ended and gone with colonialism.

BRIEFS

WATER SHORTAGE--The drought in Lesotho has reached alarming proportions, and the water in the Sebaboleng Dam, supplying Maseru, will last for only about 40 days, officials of the Ministry of Water Affairs estimate. Restrictions on the use of water have been introduced. It is no longer permitted to wash cars or use hosepipes. Households are requested to use water as sparingly as possible and even construction works must limit their water consumption. Lesotho's national university has had to close down temporarily because of the water shortage and other institutions are also affected. Cattle are dying from lack of water and shortage of grazing. Long-term plans to improve Lesotho's water supply are in the pipeline. Among them is the removal of the Mohakare hard clay industry in Maseru to make room for a second dam--the Moqalike--to supplement the water supply from Sebaboleng. The hard clay industry will be moved to Khutetsoana, on the road to Leribe, where a new deposit of 126 760 tons has been marked out. [Text] [Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 5 Nov 80 p 6]

HOPES FOR TOURIST INDUSTRY TAKEOFF

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 7 Nov 80 p 8

[Article by Iain Christie]

[Excerpts] When Mozambique became independent in 1975 its tourist industry, based on Portugal's good relations with neighbouring South Africa and Rhodesia, ceased to exist. Now, as a result of the independence of Zimbabwe, the tourists are returning to the country's unspoilt beaches. Iain Christie reports from Maputo.

Months after the swearing-in of Robert Mugabe as Prime Minister of Zimbabwe the whites of that country are in fact relaxing on the beach in Mozambique, eating prawns and drinking Laurentina beer.

And they are there not as a conquering army but as valued tourists in what could become a holiday mecca for the citizens of landlocked countries in southern and central Africa.

The people who used to be called Rhodesians when they visited what was known as Portuguese East Africa are welcome as white Zimbabweans in independent Mozambique.

The first tourists from Zimbabwe arrived in Mozambique for a one-week packaged deal holiday in August. On the beach at Ponta Malongane, south of the Mozambican capital Maputo, they relived old pleasures. For most, it came as a surprise that they could still relive old pleasures in Mozambique, since wartime propaganda in Rhodesia had consistently painted a horrific picture of the results of majority rule in the former Portuguese colony.

The Mozambican authorities have done everything possible to ensure high-quality holidays for the tourists from Zimbabwe, since the objective is to encourage more to come. First impressions were very favourable among tourists at Ponta Malongane.

The unanimously positive reaction of the first visitors augurs well for the future of Ponta Malongane and its sister resort of Ponta de Ouro. The Mozambique Tourist Board is clearly pleased at its success. But this was very much a pilot project and the real work of planning and building a tourist industry is only just beginning.

Demand for holidays will almost certainly build up next year as the word gets round in Zambabwe. People stuck all the year round in a land-locked country constitute an excellent market for a tourist industry with nearly 3,000 km of coast at its disposal, and the Zimbabwean's beach holiday alternative, South Africa, is beginning to look less and less attractive.

In the short-term, Mozambique has three important factors in its favour as far as the white Zimbabwean who may not be overtly worried about ideological differences is concerned.

1. A beach holiday in Mozambique today costs about 30 per cent less than its equivalent on the Natal coast of South Africa;

2. The beaches in Mozambique are unspoilt, quiet and relaxing, compared with the commercialised hurly-burly of South Africa; and

3. The Zimbabwean government announced recently that the foreign currency allowance for residents visiting South Africa would remain the same, while there would be an increase for those visiting other countries in Africa, such as Mozambique.

But Mozambique has its work cut out for the likely growth in tourists. Several tourist hotels on the coast have become run down over the last five years with lack of use, and will require significant investment if they are to join Malongane and Ponta de Ouro on the tourist circuit.

Management and staff training is urgent. And a proper cost-benefit analysis must be carried out quickly to ensure that tourism does not become a financial liability.

Promotional advertising in the Zimbabwean press bills holidaying in Mozambique as "stepping into a world without worries". That may be true for the tourists, but the holiday organisers in Mozambique are stepping into a world with a great many worries indeed.

NIGERIAN AID URGED IN RIDDING CHAD OF HABRE

Enugu DAILY STAR in English 29 Oct 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Nigeria and Chad"]

[Text]

AT the time it happened, our soldier-regime held a dim view of the way the Tanzanians helped to end Idi Amin's reign of terror in Uganda. But many have now come to agree that the eclipse of Amin was the best thing to have happened to Ugandans.

IT is a joy and a relief to Africans that Amin had to be edged out. However, we must not forget so soon that Tanzania now being cheered for an unprecedented act of courage and vision, was roundly condemned and derided for what was, variously, euphemistically termed invasion, or intervention or interference in another's internal affairs by the few who were big of heart.

CHAD today provides all the settings that demand some kind of bold and untoward action which must be a departure from normal practice. A new Tanzania has to be created and Nigeria, Chad's next door neighbour, fits the Bill, rather well.

CONSIDER the chilling factsIl Chad has been bled by fourteen years of war and continues so. In the past two years the crisis and war in Chad has centred largely on one man — Hissen Habre.

IT could be said that Nigeria's deep involvement in the affairs of Chad began with the elimination of president Ngarta Tombalbaye.

FELIX Malloum succeeded him and in his quest for peace, introduced Habre into Government as his Prime Minister.

HABRE it was who began the current phase of war and crisis in Chad by seeking to oust Malloum who, to give peace a chance, exiled himself to Nigeria. He now lives in Benin City.

THE Lagos accords on Chad, OAU meetings, individual state mediation all have proved abortive because of Hissen Habre's insatiable lust for power. He has to go for the peace and stability of the country. There are eleven parties or factions to the Lagos accord on Chad. Habre and His Armed Forces of the North, is the only faction ranged against the rest in the current civil war in Chad.

ONLY one cog in the wheel should be dispensable. Hissen Habre has been dismissed from his post of Defence Minister for wanting to take over the Government. It is ten against one. The OAU and Nigeria must back the majority.

FURTHER peace meetings will be fruitless; nobody expects Habre to change. So why the pretence, why go through endless notions of making peace when it is clear that we are chasing shadows?

THE neighbours of Chad should act in concert to defend or rescue the country from Habre. And this has to be with or without the mandate of the OAU.

TANZANIA did not get any mandate to save Uganda; nobody knows the OAU Charter better. What is right has to be done. We say that Hissen Habre has to fade out.

INTERFERENCE in the affairs of another country can take many forms. When we have to carry the burden of Chadian refugees in Nigeria, and the murder and pillage of our people and farms, there need not be further evidence of interference in our internal affairs.

IT is not our external affair to bear these burdens of Chad. Thus, they have interfered with us and it becomes a special duty to end the source of this nuisance. We should mind how their business affects ours.

HISSEN Habre it was, who, as Defence Minister, sacked Nigerian peace keeping forces from Chad. As he saw it, they were the barrier between him and power. It was he who broke faith with the Lagos accord by refusing to send his personal army out of Njamena and defying all attempts to create a national army.

HE has worked and collaborated at one time or the other with all the factions of Frolinat to which he belonged, and broke faith with them. He is unable to fit into the Provisional National Government of Re-conciliation. That we have seen.

WHAT remains is to move in, in force, and cage him. Nigeria should not balk at the role. It can go it alone or secure the tacit co-operation of Cameroun — the other country that is afflicted as we are, with the Chadian refugee and pillage problem.

THERE can be no end to Chad's civil war so long as Habre's well armed group persist in their pursuit of power, through the gun. President Goukouni Weddeye needs help, not round table talks. We should act now. To talk of an OAU peace force is some fiction. That we have seen.

MERGER OF NPN, NPP ADVOCATED

Lagos SUNDAY TIMES in English 2 Nov 80 pp 9, 23

[Article by Chief Dennis Osadebay]

[Text]

ONE of the finest things that has happened in Nigerian politics is the accord between the National Party of Nigeria (NPN) and the Nigerian People's Party (NPP).

It is not a bolt from the blue or a chance occurrence. It followed logically from a series of events dating back some three years. The accord has guaranteed peace and stability in Nigerian politics and it should be protected and made to work.

In 1978, when the hand-over of power by the military authorities in Nigeria to civilians became topical, politicians and leaders of thought began to move around and to discuss the political future of Nigeria.

Dr. K. O. Mbadiwe contacted a number of old colleagues who had been members of the banned political parties of Nigeria namely: The National Convention of Nigerian Citizens (NCNC), The Action Group (AG), The Northern Peoples Congress (NPC) and The Nigerian National Democratic Party (NNDP). I received a letter from Dr Mbadiwe informing me that old political colleagues in the interest of Nigeria were arranging to meet in Lagos to discuss the political future, of Nigeria and to explore the possibility of forming a big and nationwide political party which should transcend regional, religious and ethnic grouping. The letter invited me to a meeting in Dr. Mbadiwe's house.

Before the Mbadiwe invitation, Chief R. B. K. Okafor, Mr. C. C. Onoh and Mr. Mbazuluike Amaechi had invited me to meetings in Lagos, Ukpor and Enugu in Anambra State and Owerri in Imo State, to discuss the political future of Nigeria.

Various groups in the north east and west were meeting and holding similar discussions. Alhaji Aminu Kano came to Asaba with some of his supporters and discussed with me the formation of a future political party. Alhaji Waziri Ibrahim also visited me at Asaba for similar discussions. I attended a meeting at Dr. Mbadiwe's residence in Lagos and among those present were Dr. K. O. Mbadiwe, Chief T. O. S. Benson, Chief Olu Akinfosile, Chief M. T. Mbu, Chief Akin Olugbade, Chief Adeniran Ogunsanya and Chief R. B. K. Okafor.

At that meeting, we decided to form a body called the Committee of National Unity. Many more meetings of this body were held and others who attended included Chief A. M. A. Akinloye and Chief Kola Balogun

The Committee of National Unity decided to contact the various groups which we knew were meeting and holding similar discussions. For this purpose, a sub-committee was set up consisting of Chief T. O. S. Benson, Chief Adeniran Ogunsanya, Chief Akin Olugbade, Chief M. T. Mbu, Chief Olu Akinfosile. I was made Chairman of this subcommittee and named co-ordinator. The sub-committee became popularly known and referred to as the Osadebay Committee.

We are charged with the responsibility of contacting various groups for the purpose of forming a political party. It was during the sitting of the Constituent Assembly (CA) which made the 1979 Nigerian Constitution and the Osadebay Committee met members of Club 19 at the Satellite Town near Lagos where the Constituent Assembly members were housed.

Club 19 was formerly known as Club 14. This grew from a voting group formed within the Constituent Assembly during the sitting of the Assembly. At a meeting of Club 14 at the Excelsior Hotel, Apapa, which I had attended as an observer on invitation. I asked why the name should be Club 14 and not Club 19 since the number of states in Nigeria was 19 I was informed that during the Constituent Assembly, 14 states of the Nigerian Federation had formed themselves follow. I thanked them but declined the offer. They then suggested that I should consider contesting election for the Vice- Presidency Again I thanked them and informed them that I did not want to be President, Vice-President, Minister, State Governor Deputy Governor or Commissioner. My reason was that I had served Nigeria as Acting Governor General, President of the Senate, Administrator Midwest Premier Midwest into a voting group against the remaining 6 States of the north. I then suggested to a few members that they ought to find members and supporters from the 5 remaining states so that the name of their Club could agree with the number of states in the Federation. I thought it was bad and indefensible to exclude any state from their club.

During this period, some young men came to me in Asaba and suggested that when political parties were formed, I should be a presidential candidate during the general elections that would. Leader of the Opposition Western Region, Deputy Speaker Western House of Assembly and Chairman, Aba Urban District Council and I did not want to hold any more Government Office. I would rather prefer to have rest and peace of mind and enjoy from my armchair how others run the Government of Nigeria.

I, Chief R.B.K. Okafor and Mr Mbazuluike Amochi met a few leaders from the Northern part of the country, including Alhaji Shehu Shagari who is now President of the Federal Republic of Nigeria and discussed with them the formation of an all-embracing national political party. During various consultations it was agreed that Leaders from the Northern part of the Country should agree among themselves and leaders from the Norsouthern part of the country should also agree among themselves. The two groups should then come together and form a national political party.

Dr K. O. Mbadiwe wrote to Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe, the Owelle of Onitsha, informing him of what we were doing. He also wrote Alhaji Aminu Kano inviting him to the meetings of the Committee of National Unity in Lagos. A group called the Logs Progrssives, including Alhaji Femi Okunnu and another group of Progressives, from the eastern part of the country, including Dr Uzoukwu Nzeribe and Dr Nnana Ukaegbu also contacted us and we members of the Committee of National Unity met with them.

As a result of the discussions the Progressives merged with us and we then formed a new body called Committee of National Unity and Progress. I was elected chairman of this body and we were charged to continue the contacts already begun by the Committee of National Unity. My committee was able to achieve a merger of the Committee of National Unity and Progress and Club 19.

My committee was also in contact with Alhaji Waziri Ibrahim's group. During a meeting of the committee of National Unity and Progress in a house at Victoria Island, Lagos. a member who was a university professor asked whether we were contacting Chief Obafemi Awolowo's group. Another member replied that we should not do this because Chief Obafemi Awolowo had already made up his mind to form a political party under his leadership and that he had already declared that he would be the presidential candidate for the party. And that since our group was a democratic one, it would be for its members to choose its leader and its Presidential Candidate.

Then the professor countered that if this was so we should not contact Alhaji Waziri Ibrahim's group since Alhaji Waziri Ibrahim had also already declared that he would be the Chairman of whatever political group he join and also be the Presidential candidate of the political party formed from the group.

My committee was however instructed to continue our discussions with Alhaji Waziri Ibrahim's group. This we did and ultimately the committee of National Unity and Progress, Club 19 and Alhaji Waziri Ibrahim's group merged into one. A merger committee of the Tripartite Group was set up under the Chairmanship of Chief Adeniran Ogunsanya.

The committee of National Unity and Progress had set up a Committee under my Chairmanship comprising Dr K. O. Mbadiwe, Chief T.O.S. Benson, Dr Ogbonnah of Umuahia, Alhaji Femi Okunnu of Lagos and Dr Nwigwe of Aba and mandated us to meet the National Movement of Nigeria which consisted mostly of members from the Northern part of the country and discuss the formation of a National Political Party.

In September 1978, I led this committee to a house in Victoria Island, Lagos where we met with representatives of the National Movement of Nigeria, including Alhaji Shehu Shagari, Alhaji Kam Salem, Major General Adebayo, Mr Fani Kayode and others.

It was decided at the meeting that I should chairman the discussion. I introduced the topic of a merger between the Tripartite Group and the National Movement of Nigeria. We had full discussion during which a delegate of the National Movement of Nigeria asked what the Tripartite Group would do about Alhaji Waziri Ibrahim since Alhaji Waziri Ibrahim had declared that he would be chairman of any political party formed and its presidential candidate.

I replied that Alhaji Waziri Ibrahim was only an individual and the decision of the group to which he belonged would bind him. It was then agreed that each delegation should report back to its group and we should meet again at a subsequent date to take final decision on the merger of the two groups and formation of a nation-wide political party.

At 7 o'clock in the evening of that faithful day, General Olusegun Obasanjo announced on the radio and television that the ban on politics had been lifted. The next day Chief Adeniran Ogunsanya led the Tripartite Group to announce the formation of the Nigerian Peoples Party (NPP).

Some of us original members of the Committee of National Unity, including Dr K. O. Mbadiwe felt that the launching of the Nigerian Peoples Party (NPP) was without full consultation especially since conversation was going on for the merger of the Tripartite Group and the National Movement of Nigeria.

We therefore took the Committee of National Unity to the National Movement of Nigeria at a meeting in Satellite Town, Lagos and joined in the formation of the National Party of Nigeria (NPN).

Thus two parties emerged — The National Party of Nigeria (NPN) and Nigerian Peoples Party (NPP) — which but for the accident of history of General Olusegun Obasanjo lifting the ban on politics on the day he did would have become one all-embracing national political party.

It would therefore be seen as stated at the beginning of this article that the accord between the NPN and NPP is not an accident.

KWARA GOVERNOR PRAISED FOR HANDLING RELIGIOUS CLASH

London WEST AFRICA in English 17 Nov 80 pp 2301-2302

[Text]

WHAT would have been interpreted as a religious conflict in the secular state of Nigeria had just been averted by the diplomatic approach of a Governor in Nigeria.

The Governor, Alhaji Adamu Attah, of Kwara State, recently received in audience at the Government House, Ilorin, representatives of the Christian Association of Nigeria (CAN) Kwara State branch, under the leadership of the Rt. Rev. Herbert Haruna, of the Anglican Communion. Also in the delegation were the Rt. Rev. Alex Makozi, Catholic Bishop of Lokoja Diocese and His Grace, S. O. Kalejaiye, Spiritual Father of the Cherubim and Seraphim Movements of Nigeria and Overseas, who travelled from Kaduna to Ilorin for the meeting.

The delegation met Alhaji Attah on October 16 and handed over a protest letter addressed to the State Commissioner for Education whom they accused of shutting the door of his ministry against them and a breaking-off of a dialogue with the Christian school proprietors.

Confrontation encouraged

The Commissioner for Education, a Moslem, was away on Hajj to Mecca and Medina at the time of the Christians' protest. The leader of the delegation, Bishop Haruna, expressed the determination of the Christian proprietors of schools to give maximum co-operation to the government of the day and ensure the success of the presidential system of the government now in practice. However, the Bishop noted with regret the provocative policies of the State Ministry of Education and its agencies directed against Christians "even in institutions founded by them with their sweat, for which we hold you responsible as the Chief Executive of your Ministry".

The protest letter went on, "As far as we know, the Christian proprietors and communities that founded the schools are still legal owners of their institutions while the government pays grants to aid them. This policy worked well and ensured healthy partnership between the government and the voluntary agencies under the military administration, but the attitude of your Ministry since the inception of the present administration is not only destroying the very basis for co-operation but it also encourages confrontation.

"To our disappointment, letters sent to you for audience to discuss matters affecting our institutions were disregarded. Our complaints in the letter included the transfer of principals without the usual consultation with the regards for the proprietors, contrary to education law".

The Christians then complained bitterly against the latest admission policy of the State Ministry of Education which makes it impossible for most Christians whose parents are resident in Ilorin to gain admission into institutions founded by their churches.

The protest letter described as discriminatory and provocative the granting of 50 per cent admission to the indigenes of Ilorin local government areas of Christian institution like Cherubim and Seraphim College, Ilorin, Mount Carmel College, Ilorin, established by the Catholic Bishop Smith Memorial College, Ilorin, and Anglican Communion and St. Anthony College, Ilorin, established by the Catholic Communion.

In the list of 33 education secondary institutions established and owned by the various Christian denominations in the state, and the Christian Proprietors listed some of their schools whose admission to form one for 1980/81 showed more Moslem pupils being admitted to their colleges than their Christian counterparts. For example, St. Clare's Girls Grammar School, Offa, owned by the Anglican Diocese of Kwara, had 160 pupils admitted with 40 Christians and 120 Moslems, the Anglican College of Commerce, Offa, had 134 pupils admission, 49 Christians and 85 Moslems, Crowther Memorial College, Lokoja, established by the Anglican Communion in memory of the first African Bishop, had an admission of 280, 58 Christians and 222 Moslems, St. Anthony School, Ilorin, a Catholic Institution, had 85 admissions, 10 Christians and 75 Moslems, Ihima Secondary School had 235 admissions, 90 Christians and 145 Moslems, Baptist College, Igbaja, had 81 admissions, 28 Christians and 53 Moslems, Cherubim and Seraphim College, Ilorin, had an admission of 123, 30 Christians and 93 Moslems.

Bishop Haruna told Governor Attah that until the crisis is resolved the Christian proprietors have instructed all principals of their institutions to suspend action on the lists of admission handed over to them by the State Ministry of Education. At a former meeting of the standing committee of the Christian Association, it reconsidered its decision not to open colleges belonging to the Christian proprietors following a plea by Governor Attah.

At a subsequent meeting between a committee of the Christian Association and officials of the Kwara State Ministry of Education, which was initially attended by Governor Attah, the interpretation of "catchment" was debated as a means of solving the vexed issue. The Ministry officials interpreted rules to mean that all indigenes of a local government area must be admitted whereas the Christian Association representatives claimed the proprietors should have the right to select their candidates to reflect their religious interests.

Attempts to bridge disparity

It was resolved as an interim measure to admit five more Christian pupils into every form in the Christian-owned colleges while in addition Governor Attah pledged to provide emergency additional classrooms for the admission of Christians only in order to bridge the disparity between the heavily one-sided preference for Moslem candidates.

The Christian Association, in its submission, alleged that some officials of the Ministry of Education with Moslem faith deliberately promoted a vexious admission policy against the Christians. However, because of Governor Attah's expressed concern for the Christians, the standing committee of the Christian Association at another meeting to hear a report on the latter between, the government and officials of the Association, decided to review its earlier directive not to open their schools for admission until the crisis is over.

A Press statement issued later, and signed by the Rt. Rev. Herbert Haruna, as President, read as follows: "Following the timely intervention of the Governor of Kwara State, Alhaji Adamu Attah, on the crisis generated by the policy adopted by the Ministry of Education in admitting pupils into post-primary institutions for the 1980/81 session, the Christian Association of Nigeria, Kwara State branch, has reviewed the instructions earlier given to Principals of Christian Institutions and has accordingly ordered them to enrol the students reached with the government."

Despite the decision some principals have refused to admit any pupils to their schools until the disparity in the admission as it affects Christian children are effectively resolved. In one of the schools, the community, who are predominantly Christian, supported the stand of both the principal and the proprietors to shut the doors of their school to non-Christian pupils, who were to form the majority of the new intake admission.

In various churches in Kwara State, congregations expressed disappointment over the sad situation and expressed the view that if Moslem children were to enjoy abundant post-primary education, the Moslem leaders and their Islamic organisations should minimise their efforts towards mosque construction and divert their programmes to building of secondary schools, as had their Christian counterparts.

The Christian proprietors raised other issues with Governor Attah, among which were non-inclusion of Christians in the composition of some local school boards, the forcing of Christian students to take part in Koranic studies, and the construction of mosques in Christian owned institutions with the express approval of the Christian proprietors.

The Governor, according to sources, expressed support for virtually all issues raised by the Christians. On the admission policy, Governor Attah re-emphasised his determination not to take over voluntary agencies' educational institutions. He told the delegation that his government admission policy was not aimed nor designed to discriminate against any religious sect but rather to ensure that qualified pupils in any local government areas of the State are allocated 50 per cent of intakes in all institutions of learning within local government areas. The Christian delegation requested Governor Attah to modify the admission policy by granting proprietorship of education institutions 50 per cent of intakes to their colleges rather than allocating such quota to local government authorities.

'Promote religious tolerance . . .'

Governor Attah promised to examine the proposal. In addition Governor Attah promised to look into the composition of the various local schools boards with a view to including Christian nominees and to ensure that no pupil or student is forced to learn any religious subject not relevant to his or her parent religion, in accordance with the Nigeria Constitution on freedom of religion. Also, the Governor promised to ensure that only Christian principals are posted to Christian education institutions but pleaded to the delegation to permit vice principals to be of mixed religious faiths. This, he said, would promote religious tolerance.

On a proposal from the delegation, the Governor promised to look into the setting up of a State Education Board, whose edict had been promulgated since 1974. This board would include representatives of both Christians and Moslems. The board would deal with all cases of education disparity.

The delegation expressed satisfaction to Governor Attah and promised to convey their various agreements to their followers but pleaded with Governor Attah to ensure that nothing is done by any overzealous officials to plunge the state into chaos through religious fanaticism.

ARO-IKWERRES SAID VIRTUALLY EXPELLED FROM HOMES

Enugu DAILY STAR in English 27 Oct 80 p 2

[Editorial]

[Text]

THE plight of those described as Aro-Ikwerre is such as will give the federal government no alternative than to intervene. Whether these Igbos number thirty, one hundred or two hundred thousand is immaterial. They are Nigerians who are virtually being expelled from the state their forefathers before them, had known.

THESE Igbos who inhabit the Igbo-speaking district of Etche-Ikwerre were up-rooted from their homes during the civil war. Since the end of the conflict ten years ago, they have been prevented from returning to their homes and farm-lands.

THE truth and the simple logic is that their kith of yester-years having grabbed their homes and farm-lands, do not want them to return home. They now discover that they are stranger elements, merely because they may threaten the economic prosperity of those who dispossessed them.

DR Frank Eke, the deputy governor, who has become a prince since the end of the war, is himself from Ikwerre. He knows how his people feel about this much politicised problem. So, now, Dr Eke claims that he does not know, nor, has he ever heard of any refugee problem concerning the Ikwerre-Aros.

THE Rivers State Government agrees. It does not accept the Aro-Ikwerres as belonging to the state. They are squatting in refugee camps but, must now "leave for their homes". Where then is home? The constitution does not allow any state to turn Nigerian citizens into refugees in their own country. We are guaranteed free movement and the right to live where we want. We are guaranteed the right to own property anywhere in Nigeria.

THE Rivers State cannot set up its own peculiar ethics or laws where this implies deprivation and the trampling of guaranteed rights. The facts are clear. Igbo Aros are a people of dispersion; there is not one Igbo-speaking area in the East where there is not an Aro settlement.

THE Spiff regime in the prevailing climate of the times, made them refugees in their own country; successive regimes have not been able to lift the lid of this injustice and denial because of the politics and economics of the issue.

YET, it is on record that a Judicial Inquiry was set up to look into the matter. The Commission was headed by Mr Justice Inko-Tariah, an Ijaw blue blood. And it is on record also, that the Commission recommended that the Aro-Ikwerres be re-integrated with their kith and kin in Ikwerre.

YEARS after, the new government is still hell bent on sending them back to imaginary homes in Imo State which neither their forefathers nor they knew. This is a most cruel assault on rights guaranteed by the constitution.

THE federal government in the circumstance, cannot sit on the fence and pretend, at this stage, that the problem of the Aro-Ikwerre is wholly within the competence of the state government. They have to be returned to their homes in Ikwerre.

UNION CALLS FOR REVIEW OF 1975 CIVIL SERVANT 'PURGE'

Enugu DAILY STAR in English 4 Nov 80 p 16

[Text]

THE National Executive Council of the Nigerian Civil Service Union has called on the Federal Government to review the military administration's purge of civil servants in 1975.

The council also requests the government to ensure that civil servants who were dismissed without justifiable reasons are called back or paid their full benefits.

In an eight point communique issued at the end of its meeting in Makurdi, Benue State capital, the council described the purge as monstrous and one of the greatest shocks to the civil servants in recent times.

The issue of scheme of service and carrier prospects for junior and intermediate staff in the civil service came up and the council drew attention of the federal government to the urgent need to improve the carrier prospects and review the grading of the junior and intermediate cadres.

It stated that most of the released schemes of service were carbon copy of the old schemes which it alleged contained some of the old objectionable features detrimental to good carrier prospects and advancement in the service.

The council also called on the federal government to review the fringe benefits for civil servants because the existing one fell far short of expectation.

On the unification of civil service rules in the country, the council deplored the on-going tendency among states to envolve their own civil service rules and called for their unification to avoid disparities.

It re-affirmed its stand on the restoration of vehicle advance and basic allowance and called on the government not to be impervious to reasonable aspirations of the union.

Meanwhile the union has appealed to its members to remain calm and await the decision of the industrial arbitration panel on the matter.

DELAYS AT AJAOKUTA 'WILL NOT BE TOLERATED'

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 3 Nov 80 p 13

[Article by Nkem Agetua]

[Text]

ANY attempt to sabotage the effort of the Federal Government to develop the steel complex at Ajaokuta would be severely dealt with, Malam Ali Makele, acting Minister of Steel Development warned on Friday in Lagos.

Addressing the directors of the three companies that won the contracts for the execution of the civil works at Ajaokuta, the minister said that the president did not even want industrial strikes and unrest to delay the job.

Malam Makele told them that "President Shagari has specifically directed that non-performance or delays of any kind on the part of any contractor engaged in the project will not be tolerated".

On the part of government, a project management group whose duty would be to assist the contractors in co-ordinating their activities on the site would be appointed, the minister said.

The 800 million Naira civil works was awarded to the companies—Fougerolle, Julius Berger and Dumez.

The contract would be externally financed and therefore the minister urged the companies to ensure that nominated bankers entered into immediate dialogue with the Federal Ministry of Finance to whom full powers for the conclusion of loan agreement had already been given by the president.

The final contract documents would be signed in two weeks time so that the Ministry of Finance would have a legal document which would form the basis for negotiating the loan agreement, Malam Makele disclosed.

He then urged the contractors to make sure that they utilized local labour and materials as much as practicable in the execution of the contract.

RIOTS REPORTED HAMPERING WORK ON BAKOLORI DAM

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 4 Nov 80 p 16

[Article by Gboyega Amobonye]

[Text]

RECENT riots at the Bakolori Dam site in Sokoto State have set back work on the dam project by at least 12 months.

The Minister of Water Resources, Alhaji Ndagi Mamudu, disclosed this at an interview with the New Nigerian in Lagos.

He said the setback was due partially to the total stoppage of work on the project during the crisis.

Farmers who were displaced by the project and whose farmlands were taken over rioted recently because they did not receive the compensation promised them.

The farmers drove out workers at the dam site and sealed up its entrance.

About 15 lives and property worth 40 million Naira were said to have been lost in the riots.

The minister said, however, that work on the dam had resumed in full swing.

He said the situation at Bakolori was now calm and the payment of compensation to farmers was progressing.

Alhaji Ndagi felt that the rioting farmers were misguided since the irrigation project was meant for their goods.

He said the dam and its irrigation project would enable farmers to grow crops during the rainy and dry seasons.

He further explained that such a project, anywhere, was also meant to enhance standard of living of the people, because it facilitated rural development and stopped the drift to urban areas.

He also stressed that the project would provide job opportunities for many people in agro-allied industries that it would attract.

For instance, the minister said a tomato puree industry was to be established in Kano to make use of the products from Kano irrigation project area.

He also said flour mills were to be established in Borno State to make use of what to be produced from the Lake Chad Basin Irrigation Scheme.

Consequently, he said irrigation projects would boost food production in the country. Alhaji Ndagi said that irrigation projects were long-term projects.

He explained that although the projects were expensive, they would go a long way in making the country self-sufficient in food production.

FARMERS THREATEN TO DISRUPT WORK AT JOS STEEL MILL

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 4 Nov 80 p 1

[Article by Mike Reis]

[Text]

FARMERS are now threatening to disrupt the 80 million, Naira Jos Steel Rolling Mill Project.

They are demanding about 800,000 Naira compensation for the economic trees and other cash crops on their acquired land.

The Construction Plant Manager, Mr. Heiz Malet, yesterday told the acting Minister of Steel Development, Malam Mamman Ali Makele, during a tour of the project area that farmers had often threatened to stop them from working if compensation was not paid for their acquired land.

This action, Mr. Malet said, had, to some extent, slowed down work on the site of the project.

Malam Mamman Makele told the delegation of the farmers who were also on the project site, during the visit that compensation would be paid to them in the next few weeks.

He said that proper study of money due to the farmers was presently being undertaken by his ministry.

He told the farmers not to take the law into their hands but to realise the tremendous benefit the industry would serve their immediate community.

The minister assured them that apart from paying them compensation, employment would be given to any of them and their children who are qualified for jobs in the mill.

The minister told the German construction company handling the project to endeavour to include in their work the training of Nigerian engineers who would be able to take over the running of steel mill when commissioned.

He reitcrated that the Federal Government laid great emphasis on manpower training without which there would be no meaningful transfer of technology.

When commissioned in 1982, the minister said, the rolling mill would produce 220,000 tonnes of steel annually. This, he said, would gradually increase to a maximum of 740,000 tonnes of steel annually.

During a courtesy call on Governor Solomon D. Lar of Plateau State, the minister enumerated the progress made so far on the mill.

OGUN STATE POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTION CLOSED

Lagos DAILY TIMES in English 3 Nov 80 p 23

[Text]

THE Ogun State Polytechnic has been closed down indefinitely.

Announcing this was the rector of the College, Mr. Tunji Sonola.

Conditions for the reopening of the college, he added, would be announced later.

Mr. Sonola explained that the institution was closed down in view of the continued boycott of classes by the entire students. Another reason, he stressed, was the refusal of the students executive to attend a round-table conference to resolve the issue which led to the boycott of classes and damage to the properties of the college.

The students had on Monday last week embarked on a boycott of lectures. They also marched to the State House of Assembly to lodge serious allegation against the authorities of the institution.

Some of the allegations include non-provision of classrooms and hostel for new students, no lecturers, non-payment of bursary to the old students and academic mismanagement.

The House Committee on Education was said to have immediately waded into the issue and invited the school authorities to appear before it within 18 hours.

It was also gathered that the school authorities explained to the committee that all efforts were being taken to meet all the students' demands.

However, in a release issued late on Thursday night, the authorities explained that all the students refused to listen to the address of the rector on efforts being made to resolve all the allegations which were duly made known to the House Committee on Education.

The release said further that all the blackboards in some classrooms were damaged and the Cafetaria forcibly locked.

Meanwhile, armed policemen are now keeping watch over the institution.

OIL PROSPECTING DESCRIBED IN CHAD, ANAMBRA BASINS

Lagos BUSINESS TIMES in English 4 Nov 80 p 1

[Article by Henry Atenaga]

[Text] The Nigerian National Petroleum Corporation is yet to drill for oil in the Chad and Anambra basins. According to an official source last week, the present stage last week corporation's direct involvement in these areas is that at which efforts are made to determine the characteristics of rock formation through study of underground pictures.

Technically called seismic operation, this preliminary function is at the moment being carried out by a French company, GUOISIS on behalf of the Corporation.

Seismic operation is also on other direct NNPC involvements in Abudu in Bendel State, parts of Benue and Ondo, and off the shores of Rivers and Bendel States.

At Ologbo however, the corporation last July stuck oil at the depth of 3,637.5 metres bringing the total of drilled wells with oil to 10 out of 19 wells drilled onshore and off-shore. But as at last week there was yet no clear indication of the extent of the Ologbo find, according to some sources.

Asked to comment on the chances in the Chad and Anambra basins the official declared: "That can easily become a political issue. One can say today the chances are good in a place and before you know it, the state government concerned comes with request for its oil revenue share as a producing area."

Besides, Seismic finding are generally just indications and it does not happen at times that areas with the right rock formations end up upon drilling without oil or with quantities that can not be developed for commercial purposes.

Meanwhile, according to another NNPC source the three companies that won concessions a year ago to explore in the Niger Delta and Anambra basins have since started operations. The companies are Nigus (an American-Nigerian joint venture) Elf Nigeria Limited and Agip Energy and Natural Resources.

My source further informed that from their one involvement the first well has been drilled although it is a gas find.

Preliminary investigations are also on at the Sokoto area.

PROTEIN LACK NOTED DESPITE LIVESTOCK EFFORTS

Livestock Imports

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 30 Oct 80 p 9

[Article by Owen Anikwue]

[Text]

THE Federal Government imports livestock products worth more than 100 million Naira annually.

This astronomical import is to enhance the animal protein requirements of the average Nigerian.

In spite of such huge expenditure, the per capita consumption of animal protein in the country was still far below dietary requirements.

The Minister of State in the Federal Ministry of Agriculture, Mr. Emmanuel Aguma, made these disclosures yesterday in a speech he delivered at the opening of the 17th annual conference of the Nigerian Veterinary Medical Association taking place at the Ahmadu Bello University, Zaria.

Mr. Emmanuel Aguma however assured the nation that the inherent problems in achieving national self-sufficiency in livestock production were surmountable "if appropriate measures are taken by both government, private entrepreneurs and small-scale farmers."

The poultry sector during the current plan period had recorded an increase of about 25 per cent between 1975 and 1978, the minister said, adding that his ministry had already signed a contract agreement with a reputable poultry breeding firm to commence the production of "grand-parent poultry" in the country, in partnership with the Nigerian Poultry Company.

When the programme becomes fully operational, he said "we shall have sufficient day-old chicks to sustain the rapidly growing poultry industry without relying on importation."

On the problems of pest-control, feed scarcity and quality control, Mr. Emmanuel Aguma called on the Nigerian Veterinary Medical Association (NVMA) to direct its efforts in two directions. Firstly, it must make close contact with agriculture and become a partner in production of food animals and secondly it must keep in contact with the medical sciences by assisting in research and regulatory functions aimed at wiping out diseases of animals and man.

In his address to the conference, the Emir of Zaria, Alhaji Shehu Idris, called on the NVMA to find ways and means of solving the problems of normadic Fulani cattle rearers which, he said, included supply of adequate water, grazing fields and supplementary forage. The address was read on his behalf.

Livestock Industry

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 30 Oct 80 p 16

[Article by Leke Salau]

[Text] TWENTY years after the introduction of modern livestock industry, it has made very little impact on production of animal protein, the Chairman of the National Committee on Green Revolution, Dr. Bukar Shuaib, has said.

Speaking at the opening session of the 17th annual conference of Nigerian Veterinary Medical Association (NVMA) currently holding at Ahmadu Bello University, Zaria, Dr. Shuaib noted that since independence, there were few modern cattle ranches and abbattoirs mostly owned by governments and companies or parastatals.

The major problem facing the modern livestock industry, according to Dr. Shuaib, were lack of good management and acute shortage of animal feeds.

Dr. Shuaib said the veterinary profession could make tremendous contribution to animal protein production in the green revolution by improving the nomadic system of husbandry.

The nomadic system, he explained, was evolved through centuries of trial and error which, according to him, had worked out well, adding "we have to develop something better before we ask the nomads to give up their system."

According to the chairman, NVMA could contribute to the solution of the managerial problem both for the ranches and the abattoirs.

Government policies and programmes, he said, were favourable to the profession because they were drawn up largely by veterinarians.

The only problem, he pointed out, was that of the level of revenue allocation which, according to him, was not peculiar in the livestock sector alone.

On the numerical strength of the veterinary surgeons, Dr. Shuaib said there were 665 of which 599 were Nigerians while 66 were expatriates as at December last year.

In addition, there were 102 final year students for the 1979/80 session in the three universities offering courses in veterinary medicine, he said.

Dr. Shuaib said this number was significant enough for the veterinary profession to make a real impact on the green revolution programme in line with the objectives of the NVMA.

According to Dr. Shuaib, there were only four Nigerian veterinarians and two dozen British veterinarians 25 years ago.

ROLE OF WESTERN, TRADITIONAL MEDICINE EXAMINED

London WEST AFRICA in English 3 Nov 80 pp 2166-68

[Text] SHOULD traditional medicine be recognised and practised officially in Nigeria to complement the shortage of medical personnel? This is the debate now going on in certain quarters in Nigeria, particularly between officials of the Nigerian Medical Council and the Traditional Medicine Board.

Following the persistent demands among herbalists in Nigeria, with moral support from some parliamentarians as well as some eminent university dons, several state administrations and the Federal Government are now mapping out a programme of recognition for traditional medicine. For an example, boards for effective supervision of the practice of traditional medicine and the best way to unify, modify, and update it are believed to be in the making.

Among the discussions there have been two outstandinging contributions, one by Dr. F. A. Ofodile of the College of Medicine, University of Ibadan, who wrote in the Daily Times that in view of the rancour that has flowed from supporters and opponents of traditional medicine it was important to look at the pros and cons of the issue.

He then argued that both politicians and medical personnel will ultimately bear responsibility for any deaths and injuries caused by ill-conceived blanket installation of traditional medicine in its present form. He also added, "So also shall we be answerable to posterity if we summarily kill traditional medicine with all that it has to offer." He pointed out, "I do not share the view that traditional medicine had nothing to offer; neither do I subscribe to the sentiments of some politicians that criticism of traditional medicine is tantamount to subverting the country."

In the further view of Dr. Ofodile, traditional medicine has in its favour the fact that it had kept a large segment of the population alive prior to the advent of Western medicine; it had been shown that some of the therapeutic regimen employed by some traditional medicinemen in various parts of the country do indeed contain ingredients that have scientifically proven effective against the diseases for which they have been used.

The writer then examined the other side of traditional medicine and submitted that the first obvious limitations to the usefulness of traditional medicine was the fact that it was not one science. Rather, he said, it was essentially a collection of individually evolved practices developed in different families over generations and transferred to a limited number of people by apprenticeship.

The practices are as varied and divergent as there are practitioners, and also as different in form and substance as there are ethnic groups in the country. "It is difficult in such circumstances to talk of traditional medicine as if it was one entity."

Dr. Ofodile went on that the only common factors essentially, were that the practices originated from the Nigerian people and the practitioners used locally available herbs. In some cases, no herbs were used at all. The healers depended on "spirit" and incantations to do the job.

The writer also spoke of the lack of scientific grounding of the practices. There is no systematic practice based on thorough knowledge of anatomy or the symptoms produced by organs as their physiology is disturbed by a particular disease.

Another limitation, according to Dr. Ofodile, is in the nature of the herbs administered by the traditional healers. He pointed out that "while it is true that active ingredients have been extracted from some herbs used by traditional healers, it is also true that co-existing with these active substances are dozens of other substances that have no relevance to the disease being treated and in some cases may be injurious to the patients themselves". Another limitation is the failure of traditional doctors to appreciate that certain external signs may always represent the same disease.

Dr. Ofodile argued that "While it is true that native doctors were keeping people alive before the Western doctors appeared on the scene and are still active in the rural areas, it is also true that the mortality rate before the widespread availability of Western medicine in this country was greater than 20 per 1,000 people. Infant mortality was greater than 100 per 1,000 and maternal mortality was about six to seven per 1,000 and these statistics remain true wherever modern medicine has not become freely available today." Statistics since the introduction of Western medicine in Nigeria put the mortality rate at nine per 1,000, infant mortality is about 17.7 per 1,000 and maternal mortality is 0.1-0.2 per 1,000.

He then went on to say that with such statistics it was difficult to argue for perpetuation or institutionalisation of traditional medicine in its present form. It must be modified, regulated, and updated to keep up with 20th century standards if it is to play a significant role in improving the health of the people. He then called for proper supervision and regulation of traditional medicine so as to minimise the harm done and enhance the good.

He made the following suggestions:

(a) The setting up of State Boards to control traditional medicine. The composition of such boards, he said, should include reputable native doctors, medical doctors, pharmacologists, and pharmacists who will oversee the improvement of the practice and its absorption into the health care system.

(b) Various governments to look at traditional medicine from the proper perspective, devoid of all unnecessary emotionalism and patriotic zeal.

(c) The setting up of a high level commission including representatives of the Nigerian Medical Council, the Nigerian Medical Association, the Association of Traditional Healers, Pharmacologists and legal practitioners to study exhaustively the whole issue of traditional medicine and make necessary recommendations on the best way to unify, modify and update if and eventually integrate it into the health care system in the country.

(d) The creation in the states, within the Ministry of Health, of a traditional medicine inspectorate division headed by a medical doctor whose function would be to get into the fields and monitor the activities of the native doctors to make sure that only registered practitioners actually practice, that the practice was done under hygienic conditions and that no harm was being done to the public. The division, he said, would also evaluate therapeutic claims and recommend proven ones for wide usage.

In rounding off his arguments, Dr. Ofodile, urged the state and federal governments to make funds available for active research into the herbs, pointing out that the herbs should be tested for beneficial effects.

In a reaction to Dr. Ofodile's article, Chief J. O. Lambo, Chairman of the Traditional Medicine Board, accused Dr. Ofodile of being a person with a Westernised colonial mentality. He further described Dr. Ofodile's arguments as based on false scientific theory and analysis.

Chief Lambo was bitter over the assertion of Dr. Ofodile's about who should bear the responsibility for any death and injury caused by ill-conceived blanket installation of traditional medicine in its present form, which seemed to imply that deaths do not occur in the modern hospitals.

He submitted that death is the inevitable destiny of man. "Death will come when it will. It is sheer hypocrisy to assign the cause of death to any particular art," Chief Lambo said. He argued that before the advent of modern medicine in Nigeria the average life span was longer than at present, when people die between the ages of 30 and 40.

The traditional doctors have a sure way of preserving the life of a patient in order to give room for treatment, he said. This was done in the form of a ring or belt. When all hope of survival was gone, this material would be removed and the soul would escape through the head.

The Chief said Dr. Ofodile must have been nursed by traditional medicine while he was young, because all African mothers are used to it. But in commenting on the limitations of traditional medicine Dr. Ofodile had erred and got himself lost in the wilderness of emotion and sentiment. "For anybody to criticise a science or profession he has not studied, amounts to criticism borne out of malice and is a reflection of ignorance and arrogance".

Chief Lambo then went on to submit that spiritual atonement and incantations were part of traditional therapy and were effective. Chief Lambo quoted a Professor in Ghana who confessed that it was a sheer waste of time to be analysing the active substance of herbs because sometimes the ingredients have no relevance to the disease it cured. The Ghanaian professor, he said, suggested that herbal drugs should be used as prepared by the traditional doctors with a little modification involving preservation and sanitation.

On the suggestion that only the registered traditional doctors should be allowed to practise, Chief Lambo welcomed the idea but asserted that this could not be done as a matter of urgency, pointing out that facilities like institutions of training, financial assistance, exchange of ideas in form of dialogues, deminars, workshops etc, are prerequisites. Without these, any law to keep people out of the profession will amount to tyranny, and would not be for the benefit of the people, Chief Lambo argued.

Chief Lambo concluded, "I think a conscientious and serious educational programme should be mounted to enlighten such people that medicinal propeties of herbs are used to an advantage by the traditional doctors and thus making a significant contribution to health care of the inhabitants.

STEEL IMPORT CONTROLS URGED--The new Chairman of Dorman Long and Amalgamated Engineering Limited, Mallam Turi Muhammadu has called for government control on fabricated steel works into the Country. Speaking last week on the occasion of the visit of Acting Steel Minister Mallam Ali Makele to his company, the Chairman reasoned that 30 percent import duty presently charged on steel imports "gives inadequate protection to Nigeria's steel fabricators". To him, "greater control over importation is an essential first step to ensure that existing facilities in Nigeria are fully utilised and expanded." Given the depressed state of the world steel market in the wake of construction depression, Mallam Muhammadu advised that Fabricated steel should only be imported when Nigerian fabricators have indicated their inability to perform". [as published] He is not alone. Two weeks ago, the General Manager of Nigersteel Company Limited Mr N. N. Arya surveyed his company's stock pile of steel rods and called on the government to increase duty on imported steel rods "...so that wholly indigenous products can compete favourably with imported ones". RIVERS TECHNOLOGY UNIVERSITY--The Rivers State University of Science and Technology (UNITEC), has been formally opened in Port Harcourt. It has taken off with a student population of 2,974, out of which 1,500 are new intake to study various programmes leading to diploma and degrees. Speaking on the occasion which also marked the matriculation of the students, the Vice-Chancellor, Professor T. T. Isoun, noted that the UNITEC was a university with a commitment and mission. He announced that the university has a centre for special projects which, he said, was specifically provided with sufficient power and authority. When fully established, Professor Isoun said, the centre would serve as a final finishing in the training of engineers. The centres, he further said, would assist in the quick transformation of basic scientific or engineering data into products and services. [Text] [Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 3 Nov 80 p 24]

BAKERS END STRIKE--Bread is now available in Enugu and other parts of Anambra State at the end of the two-week industrial action by the Anambra/Imo Master Bakers Association in protest against high cost of baking ingredients. The secretary of the Enugu zonal branch of the association, Mr. Abel Ndukwu, told the News Agency of Nigeria (NAN), in Enugu that the commodity might be off the stands in a week's time unless urgent action was taken to bring down the prices. The secretary suggested that the flour mills should devise a means whereby individual bakers should get supplies either from the co-operative consumer shops or the Nigerian National Supply Company (NNSC). Mr. Ndukwu accused senior officials of the mills of collaborating with flour distributors to cause artificial scarcity. When contacted, one of the distributors who chose to remain anonymous denied the allegation, adding that quantity of flour supplied to them had been drastically reduced. A loaf previously sold at 10 kobo now costs 15 kobo. The 20 kobo loaf costs 30 kobo while that of 50 kobo now costs 60 kobo. [Excerpts] [Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 4 Nov 80 p 3]

IMO AIRPORT CONSTRUCTION COSTS--Construction of airport in Owerri, Imo State capital will cost the Federal Goverment 52 million Naira, the State Governor, Mr. Sam Mbakwe disclosed at the weekend. The site for the project, he said, was already being cleared at a cost of 1.07 million Naira, while its design was being prepared at a cost of 488,067 Naira. Mr. Mbakwe was speaking in Owerri at the weekend during the foundation laying ceremony of the project. [Loveday Iheanacho] [Excerpt] [Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 4 Nov 80 p 9]

BALLOTS FROM 1979 FOUND--A returning officer in the last year's general elections was the tenant of the house where about ten boxes of ballot papers believed to be property of the Federal Electoral Commission (FEDECO) were discovered last week in Sokoto. The hint was given by the state Police Commissioner, Alhaji Aminu Malumfashi, while briefing newsmen in his office on the discovery of the items in a prominent politician's house in Gwadabawa town. He said although it was premature to comment on the issue as police investigations were in progress, it was understood that the returning officer used the house, a 4-bedroom, throughout the election period and that it was, therefore, not impossible that the returning officer might have left them behind after completing his assignment. This, he said, did not mean that the police were of the opinion that the returning officer was responsible for the items but explained that an act of negligence could not be overruled. He said the case could be determined when the police were able to get the returning officer for questioning. When suggested to him that it could not have been possible for anyone to lose sight of such important documents when vacating a place he was assigned for a specific job related to the documents, the police commissioner retorted that "that was an opinion." Alhaji Aminu Malumfashi confirmed that no arrest has been made in connection with the incident. [Text] [Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 4 Nov 80 p 16]

This is one of the agreements reached in Lagos on Monday between the Ministry of Employment, Labour and Productivity, the National Universities Commission (NUC) and the Academic Staff Union of Universities. A communique issued at the end of the meeting said that the Federal Government had agreed that the various university councils concerned should review the cases of those staff with a view to their being reinstated. The meeting was chaired by the Minister of Employment, Labour and Productivity, Mr. Adebisi Ogedengbe, and attended by the Minister of Education, Dr. I. C. Madubuike. The affected staff include the former Vice-Chancellor of Ahmadu Bello University, Professor Iya Abubakar who is now Minister of Defence, the former Vice-Chancellor of Lagos University, Professor Ade Ajayi, the former Director of the University's Health Services, Dr. Ladipo Sogbetun as well as the university's former Students Welfare Officer, Mr. Ebenezer Babatope, now Director of Organization, Unity Part of Nigeria (UPN). Others are Mr. Bade Onimode, Dr. Wale Adeniran, Dr. Akin Ojo and Comrade Ola Oni, all formerly of the University of Ibadan as well as Dr. Edwin Madunagu and his wife both formerly of University of Calabar. The university staff were removed from office following the Justice

Joined in the suits are Mr. Tai Solarin, Mr. Layi Ogunsola and Mr. Tola Adeniyi, who is a regular columnist of the paper. In one of the suits, which were filed by Mr. Olayemi Abogun, a counsel in Chief Gani Fawehinmi's chambers, Mr. Unongo said he was claiming N40 million damages from the African newspapers and Mr. Solarin jointly and severally from libel contained on page four of the Nigerian TRIBUNE issue of October 7, 1980. In the second suit, in which Mr. Adeniyi is joined, Mr. Unongo is asking for N10 million damages in respect of TRIBUNE's publications of September 3, and August 17, this year. In the third one, Mr. Unongo is also asking for another N10 million from the African newspapers and Mr. Layi Ogunsola for an alleged libel published on page four of SUNDAY TRIBUNE issue of July 27, 1980. Mr. Unongo is claiming N5 million in the fourth suit for an alleged libel published by the same paper on its issue of Friday August 29, 1980. On the four suits which were filed at the same time, Mr. Unongo is asking the court for an injunction restraining the paper from further printing and publishing or, circulating any similar matter concerning him. No date has been fixed for the mention. [Mike Nwanjo] [Text] [Lagos DAILY TIMES in English 5 Nov 80 p 32]

OIL REFINERY RAIL LINK--A N24 million railway construction project, due for final completion next year, is to link Nigeria's third oil refinery at Kaduna to the country's main railway network. The project, commissioned by the Nigerian Railway Corporation (NRC) when completed, will consist of 23 kilometres of track, a marshalling yard, sick sidings for wagon repairs, a new station building and 70 staff houses. According to the contractors, Henry Boot Construction (Nigeria) Ltd., which is entirely Nigerian-owned, the project "will contribute substantially to the efficient transportation of Nigeria's energy resources throughout the Northern areas of the country". INDUSTRIAL CENTERS--The Federal Government will establish five new industrial development centres (IDCS) before the end of 1981. These centres would be cited at various suitable places in some parts of the country. The sites have not yet been announced. This disclosure was made by the assistant director in the small scale industry division of the Federal Ministry of Industries, Mr. E. A. Taiwo while making a keynote address at the opening session of the two-day meeting of the national advisory committee in Kano. Earlier, the Kano State Commissioner for Rural and Community Development, Alhaji Mahmed Othman called for a planned development of the country. The commissioner also announced that the State Government in its bid to industrialise the rural areas have decided to establish "at least two small scale industries in each of the local government areas of the state." He further announced plans to modernise existing local crafts technology in the state, but pointed out that sophisticated technology at the present stage of our economic development was quite appropriate to artisan-oriented industries. EDITOR ARRESTED--The Udi chief magistrate, Mr A. B. N. Obayi, has ordered the arrest of the Editor of the "Lagos WEEK-END' newspaper, Mr Supo Ibikunle, for contempt of court. The alleged contempt was said to contain an article in the paper's publication of October 19, this year, titled "Love Boy Father Floored" and published in the paper's regular column "Do Not Say I Told You". The chief magistrate stressed that for the "Lagos WEEK-END" to make such publication of a criminal matter still pending in the court was not only a novelty but also an action fraught with prejudice and contempt of the court. OBSOLETE MILITARY EQUIPMENT--The Defence Industries Corporation based in Kaduna has not been able to produce any military hardware, because most of the factory's equipment and machinery are obsolete. This was contained in a paper on "The Administration of the Military--from 1966 to 1979," delivered by Major-General David Jemibewon, General Officer Commanding the First Division of the Nigerian Army, and a former director of the corporation. General Jemibewon said the corporation was set up in 1964 at the cost of N2m. A similar corporation in Brazil, established the same year, was already exporting military hardware to Third World and other countries, while the Nigerian one, has not made any impact, he said. The General said that the foreign contractors who installed the machines and equipment when the corporation was established were asking for N11m, for servicing and replacing the parts of the machines. He called on the federal government to commission factories to manufacture ordinance equipment to back up or replace the existing, but obsolete and unproductive one. The General said that the experience of the civil war during which war efforts were hampered by the lack of local manufacture should serve as a warning to the government. While not anticipating any of such emergency, he said it was time Nigeria manufactured some of her military needs. [Text] [London WEST AFRICA in English 3 Nov 80 p 2199]

NAMIBIA CONFERENCE PROPOSAL, REAGAN POLICY DISCUSSED

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 11 Nov 80 p 6

[Editorial: "SWA Talks"]

[Excerpts]

THE IDEA now seems to be to hold Lancaster House-style independence talks on South West Africa.

It is something that appeals to the Frontline States, and Swapo's leader, Mr Sam Nujoma, announced at the weekend that he was prepared to participate.

Meanwhile, there is much speculation about the attitude a Reagan administration might take up on the South West African issue.

A fallacy is that Mr Reagan will protect South Africa against sanctions, and that our problems over the territory are consequently over.

True enough, Mr Reagan is not going to be as keen as President Carter was to force South Africa, under threat of sanctions, to agree to a UN-run election in circumstances which will inevitably bring Swapo to power.

Mr Reagan will want to see what alternatives there are for an internationally recognised settlement before he will agree to punitive measures.

But the US is not able to act in isolation.

It cannot agree to a solution that other members of the Western Five contact group reject.

More importantly, it cannot agree to a solution that the United Nations rejects.

The pressure in the United Nations is to force South Africa to implement the UN plan.

And if it does not?

Well, we only need to look at a resolution passed by a UN committee last week, calling for a total boycott of South Africa, diplomatically, politically, economically and militarily. Specifically mentioned are bans on investment and oil.

The world body is expected to endorse the resolution.

Then it will be over to the Security Council, where only a veto can save us from sanctions.

We still believe that the Western Five will be opposed to sanctions while there is a chance of obtaining a settlement by negotiation with South Africa.

But their task will be made far more difficult if it appears that South Africa is intransigent.

In these circumstances, South Africa's participation in a conference of interested parties would be an important indication of our willingness to explore all avenues that might bring about a settlement.

It would also give us a breathing space while the Reagan administration settles in and decides how best to handle the South West African issue.

BOTHA OPPOSES DISCRIMINATION AGAINST CHINESE

Address to OFS Rally

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 24 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] Vrede--The Prime Minister, Mr P. W. Botha, last night let it be known in no uncertain terms that he was against discrimination against Chinese people in South Africa.

Addressing a National Party rally in this Free State town, Mr Botha said he saw no reason to discriminate against people who came from a "decent" country such as Taiwan while trade links with this country were maintained.

The Prime Minister was replying to a questioner who had ironically expressed reservations about the way people of colour were increasingly using facilities erected specifically for whites.

Saying he hoped the Press would not blow the matter out of proportion, Mr Botha said facilities which could not be duplicated should be shared.

There should be no discrimination on the grounds of skin colour, he said.

As an example, he said he had met a highly civilised nation during his visit to Taiwan last week.

[Editorial: "What a Diplomatic Boob!"]

[Text]

THE complexity of our racial situation which is deliberately compounded by opportunism sometimes lands people in an tragedy mess.

What happened to the white Mayfair swimming pool attendant who chased two Chinese kids from a pool is so typical of South Africa, that it should be screamingly funny if the whole business was not so tragic.

The Prime Minister's triumphant saga in Taiwan, so admirably documented by SABC-TV had hardly faded, when the poor white man who most certainly did not know nor care two hoots about the niceties of political dynamics, put his foot smartly into it.

How on earth was the man to guess that Chinese had almost magically made an overnight metamorphosis to white, or honorary white, or whatever. One can almost hear his amazement after the telephone did not stop ringing in his pool office about his major diplomatic boob.

It smacks of such hypocrisy that one shudders with embarrassment for the Government.

Their fault at that, for the manner in which they will lay on the propaganda bit is almost farcical.

As you are forced to play the game according to the rules, you cannot actually be faulted for striving at an amalgamation of the pariahs of the world.

But one just gets a little sick by the sanctomonious gush from some quarters when in almost hushed description the ancient and respected Chinese culture suddenly blossoms into prominence.

The day will eventually dawn when we blacks take the whip, and we may as well savour in anticipation the description of the ancient black culture and past glory of Azania.

RESIGNING NP MPC ATTACKS CRITICS OF BOTHA

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 8 Nov 80 p 2

[Article by Jaap Theron]

[Text]

"VERLIGTE" Waterkloof National Party MPC, Dr Piet Goosens' statement yesterday that Pretoria MPs and MPCs who did not unconditionally support the Prime Minister must go, was almost immediately repudiated by the Transvaal NP leader, Dr Andries Treurnicht, who challenged Dr Goosens "to motivate his point."

Dr Goosens' attack on his NP colleagues was embodied in his letter of resignation as MPC for Waterkloof.

Dr Goosens told The Citizen he had bought a farm near Petrusburg in the Free State and would move to Bloemfontein on December 5.

Dr Treurnicht said in a statement that he was not aware of a single MP, MPC or Senator in the Transvaal who did not support the Prime Minister's 12-point plan.

"But I am well aware of the Prime Minister's repeated confirmation of the policy of separate development and even of necessary discrimination to protect the rights of communities."

Dr Treurnicht said: "Dr Goosens owes it to the executive of the Transvaal NP to motivate his accusations that MPs and MPCs are plotting and are being disloyal to the party."

"I find it reprehensible that such accusations, if they were reported correctly, were published in the Press. Dr Goosens never expressed his reservations towards me or towards the Transvaal NP executive."

Dr Treurnicht said the Prime Minister had expressed himself strongly regarding the rights of the White nation and his preparedness to fight for it.

Dr Goosens was correct in his statement that the Government's policy was aimed at the uplifting of all the country's peoples and to give them the opportunities to safeguard their own heritage and to come to their rights in every aspect.

"But of course this also applies to Whites," Dr Treurnicht said, adding: "And for that reason we maintain to have rights to have exclusively to ourselves our own living areas, schools, voters' lists, sport organisations and meetings, which rights no one must try to deprive us of."

Dr Goosens told The Citizen his resignation would become effective on January 1.

His attack, which had formed part of his farewell speech to his own divisional council, had not been aimed at individual MPs or MPCs or, especially at his own MP, Mr Tom Langley, but had been on a broad spectrum of MPs and MPCs, who, he said, had always been too afraid to lose their popularity as public figures.

It was time they told their voters in public where they stood with regard to matters such as open parks, open restaurants and other public amenities.

"But instead, they play the role of 'Ja-broers' with a 'yes-but' attitude to every single controversial issue that is raised and which relates to better relations between races.

"As long as they go along with 'verkrampte' views in their divisional councils, they are in fact bedeveling the progress of their own Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha."

Dr Goosens said he had told his divisional council it was time that every MP and MPC in the National Party should state that he supported the Prime Minister unconditionally, "or else they must go".

"With a view to strengthening the hand of our leader, every NP public representative must in fact state that he is walking exactly the PW road, otherwise there is no longer a place for them within the party," he added.

"Stop forfeiting Mr Botha's principles when you address your galleries behind closed doors. Forget about being popular amongst your own people. Stop singing together with the 'verkrampte' anti-P W Botha choruses and rather talk to your people and tell them straight out what the position or the problems are," Dr Goosen said.

PAPER PREDICTS CONTINUING NP RESISTANCE TO BOTHA

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 21 Oct 80 p 10

[Editorial: "The Party Fights Back"]

[Text]

IT is, of course, encouraging to discover that democracy is still alive, even if it is confined to the inner ranks of the National Party. In elections to choose Nationalist candidates for parliamentary by-elections, first Dr Dawie de Villiers withdrew from Mooreesburg because NP supporters preferred their MPC, then General Magnus Malan retreated from Nelspruit apparently because local candidates were not prepared to stand back.

But there is obviously more to this than democracy. The difficulties these two new stars of the Botha Cabinet are experiencing in gaining acceptance at the constituency level of the party are indicative of the difficulty the Botha strategy as a whole is likely to encounter. For what Mr Botha is trying to do is to finesse his own party; he is seeking to smuggle reforms past his highly conservative caucus. That is what the President's Council, the new power to nominate MPs and the bringing of personally selected people from outside Parliament into the Cabinet is all about.

Our guess, however, is that the caucus and the ordinary party members at constituency level are not simply going to lie back and allow themselves to be degutted without a fight. They are going to move to protect their grassroots power in the party, and they are going to use that power to resist policy changes they don't like. The days of meekly accepting what the party leadership wanted are over.

That is why we predict trouble for Mr Botha's strategy. His own party is going to fight back. And if the ordinary party members of Mooreesburg and Nelspruit can force two of Mr Botha's star Cabinet choices to back off, what chance is there of the caucus accepting any fundamental reforms that he — or his President's Council — may propose?

COMMENT ON PRESIDENT'S COUNCIL MEMBERSHIP

Hendrickse Comment

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 3 Nov 80 p 6

[Article by Peter Sullivan]

[Text]

Political Correspondent

Even if coloured people were put back into Parliament this would not be a meaningful development in real political terms, the Reverend Allan Hendrickse, leader of the Labour Party, said today.

"Within National Party concepts this looks like movement, but to me it looks like ganging up against blacks," Mr Hendrickse said.

He was reacting to a weekend newspaper report that former Transport Minister Mr Ben Schoeman had come out strongly in favour of returning coloured people to the voters roll.

Mr Schoeman said the coloured people should be given full political rights and returned to Parliament in a confederal system in which everybody — including urban blacks — had representation.

In an interview with Rapport Mr Schoeman said coloured people should be made the allies of the white man and not their enemies.

He said if coloured people were returned to the general voters roll and given political rights the same would have to happen to the Chinese and Indians.

Mr Hendrikse, who was leader of the majority party in the Coloured Representative Council until it was scrapped, said today he did not think the idea represented anything new.

It had been put forward in an Afrikaans newspaper report about a month ago which purported to unveil the Prime Minister's grand plan for the future.

"In terms of Government thinking it's obvious they're thinking about this. But I think Mr P W Botha was thinking of separate voters' rolls.

"But if you want a confederation we would prefer a geographic and not an ethnic confederacy," Mr Hendrickse said.

Asked if he thought the Labour Party would boycott an election in which coloured people could go to Parliament, Mr Hendrickse said he could not commit his party to any standpoint as the party had not yet discussed this specific issue.

The future constitutional position of coloured people and growing pressure to include blacks on the President's Council have become the main issues threatening the future unity of the National Party.

This became clear today from the reaction to Mr Schoeman's call.

Conservative Nationalist spokesmen said it was clear that the lines were being drawn for a showdown on these issues and that it might well decide the future unity of the party.

Rapport has also published an opinion poll which found that almost half of the number of whites questioned wanted blacks to be represented on the President's Council.

Poll of White Opinion

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 3 Nov 80 p 6

[Text]

CAPE TOWN — Nearly half South Africa's whites would prefer to see blacks included in the President's Council, according to an opinion survey conducted for Rapport.

The Sunday newspaper's survey indicated that only about a quarter of the whites were satisfied with the present composition of the Council comprising only whites, coloured members, Indians and Chinese.

This finding was part of a regular survey conducted for the newspaper by Mark- en Meningsopnames (Edms) Beperk.

Questionnaires were sent to about 2 500 whites reported to comprise a representative sample of the adult white population.

About nine percent of people questioned said they did not agree with the idea of a President's Council.

Of the English-speaking whites who were questioned, 7,4 percent supported the Government's decision on the Council's present composition while 69 percent were in favour of black representation.

Of the Afrikaans-speaking whites, 39,6 percent agreed with the Government's decision while 29,3 percent were in favour of blacks serving in the Council.

Nationalists were reported to be sharply divided on the whole issue.

About 4,2 percent of the National Party supporters did not agree at all with the idea of a President's Council.

Mr Ben Schoeman, the former Minister of Transport and former Transvaal leader of the National Party, told Rapport he was in favour of direct coloured and Indian representation in Parliament.

He said a parliament consisting of whites, coloured people and Indians should form a confederation with the homelands and urban blacks who could be represented through "city states."

Muslim Organizations' Reaction

Capetown MUSLIM NEWS in English 17 Oct 80 pp 1, 4

[Text]

There has ben an outright rejection of the President's Council, and the 'Muslims' nominated to serve on it, by various Muslim scholars and organisations. In exclusive statements to Muslim News this latest government-created institution was described as a body which goes against the very teachings of Islam.

'It is clear from the Qur'an and numerous ahadith (teachings) of the Holy Prophet (pbuh) that no form of co-operation or collaboration with any of the forces of oppression is permitted under any circumstances in Islam,' stated Moulana Farid Esack emphatically.

'A very important thing to bear in mind is that for a Muslim, the means ie. the methodology in the struggle, cannot be seperated from the ends. Islam has got its peculiar way of waging the struggle against oppression and injustice as well as its own vision for the kind of society lying at the end of this struggle. We therefore cannot speak of working within the system to beat it. The norms of the powers that be are based on greed, selfishness and exploitation and there is no way that one can sit with these people and hope to be a participant in this struggle for social justice.'

According to Moulana Esack, 'Islam is 'a total way of life and demands total allegience in all spheres of our activity. We cannot therefore say that our professions and our Islam cannot be mixed and still remain Muslims'.

The Muslim Judicial Council

The Muslim Judicial Council said that they are 'opposed to pseudo-government bodies designed to perpetuate apartheid and as Muslims we should have nothing to do with it'.

The Muslim Assembly's point of view is that 'there can be no meaningful change to the situation in this country till a new constitution is negotiated for by all the people of this country and until the leadership of all the people concerned is recognised.'

Sheikh Toffar

A statement issued by Sheikh A K Toffar on behalf of the Institute of Islamic Shari'ah Studies rejected the President's Council as 'Islam prescribes consultation and negotiation amongst people as a principle of law. It prescribes honesty, fairness and true moral intention in the matter and the setting right of irregularities justly and amicably for the benefit of all'

'The President's Council in its present constituted form cannot carry out this task as it is loaded with NP-thinking people whose principles of government are already well-known.'

'The constitutional exercise will thus be futile as the so-called 'non-white participants will see in due course. It is presently incredible nor possible for us to believe that the President's Council can smuggle constitutional reform past the NP caucus where 'the principles and policies of the NP are given full executive authority in real terms.'

'Senior NP office-bearers have continuously sung the refrain of "no shared government" and "no Blacks in the President's Council", thus making constructive constitutional dialogue impossible.'

MSA

In a strongly worded statement the Transvaal Regional Representative of the Muslim Student Association says 'We firmly uphold the Islamic principles of human rights, justice, equality and reject all forms of oppression and injustices. Islam cannot condone any form of apartheid, be it economic, political or social. Thus we cannot see the proper functioning of a President's Council in the present socio-political system of South Africa. We therefore reject the President's Council and all other forms of government-created political institutions in South Africa and as such cannot condone Muslims standing on such institutions. We firmly believe in the saying of the Holy Prophet (pbuh): "Whosoever walks with an oppressor to strengthen him, has gone forth from the fold of Islam".'

MYM

The Muslim Youth Movement are also opposed to the creation of the President's Council.

'The Muslim nominees who have accepted the Prime Minister's nomination to serve on the President's Council are neither helping the governer nor the governed.

'Accepting to serve on the President's Council amounts to isolating the so-called blacks from the political mainstream. This will also lend belief to the political policy of the South African government that the so-called blacks exercise their political rights in the homelands. Thus the nominees of the President's Council and all those that believe it should be given a chance are doing South Africa a great disservice!

'It is difficult to fathom the concepts of dialogue in the South African political realm without sitting at a conference table with the most important political grouping which matters most when planning the future of this country.'

'It is our belief that negotiation is the best option to explore, to find a solution for an amicable political settlement. This option can only be viable if the government changes its political approach towards the so-called blacks!

'If Muslim nominees examine their conscience in the light of the Islamic ideology they will find that the best decision would be to withdraw with dignity while they still can.'

SASA

Sasa has also issued a statement condemning the Muslims serving on the council as well as the council itself. 'The nominees are serving their own selfish interests. The "Muslims" serving on the President's Council should be ostracised by the community and the community should unite to oppose those "Muslims" on the council. These reactionaries are an unwanted hinderance in the progress of the Islamic liberation struggle that is igniting throughout the world. The President's Council took place within the womb of apartheid therefore this growth within the womb itself is abnormal and the birth will finally be the evolvement of a dangerous and destructive obstacle to the masses.'

COMMENT ON KOORNHOF'S PROPOSED LEGISLATION ON BLACKS

'OOSTERLIG Comment

Pretoria SOUTH AFRICAN DIGEST in English 24 Oct 80 p 26

[Translation from Afrikans of OOSTERLIG editorial 16 October titled: "Promising Announcements"]

[Text]

It's ironic, but not accidental, that violence erupted in Soweto yesterday, precisely on the day Minister Piet Koornhof made promising announcements regarding Blacks in urban areas which could contribute towards a general improvement in their lot and the removal of unnecessary and hurtful discrimination.

But every right-thinking person knows that powers are at work in South Africa that aim at bedevelling, as much as possible, reconciliation politics between Black and White. For this very reason it must have looked as if Dr Koornhof wasn't welcome in Soweto yesterday.

But the fact is that Blacks, in the Minister's words, are on the threshold of interesting and challenging developments at constitutional and local authority levels. Draft legislation to be tabled in Parliament next year, and on which the public will have the opportunity of commenting, attests to this.

For the first time in the country's history, provision will be made for local councils in Black urban areas so that Blacks can manage their own affairs at local level. It's a whole step further than the existing community councils, as these bodies with the status of city councils will have all the powers of a conventional local authority, with the further possibility of additional powers that may be ascribed to them.

This will naturally mean that the role of administration boards will have to be reviewed. They will be changed into development boards with a smaller compilation and bigger involvement in the private sector. This makes it clear that in future the accent will fall more heavily on the development of the Black communities' immediate environment. Important amendments are furthermore on the cards in residence and labour regulations which could give Blacks greater freedom of movement.

All these measures, and others pending, are a confirmation of the Government's earnest desire to carry out orderly reform — also in respect of the lives of Blacks — and can make an important contribution towards more relaxed race relations.

DR PIET Koornhof said yesterday that the three draft Bills to be gazetted today were "the right idea at the right time".

He was referring to draft Bills relating to local government for blacks, the laws on co-operation and development and the Black Community Development Bill.

Dr Koornhof said that this was "a genuine attempt at reform", and said it was an attempt to "remove hurtful discrimination as far as possible in present times".

We would like to believe that this was, indeed, so. However, looking through the draft Bills, there still seems to be a lot more outstanding.

Certain aspects of the draft legislation will certainly be welcome, but once more, Dr Koornhof has failed to grasp this opportunity.

There is still mention of "disqualified" people — which is defined as any black person outside a black township; there is still talk of retaining legislation regarding "idle blacks", and, as yet, there is no movement on the question of freehold title for blacks. Also, there seems very little significant change in the pass laws, and Dr Koornhof says that influx control is still necessary to avoid slum conditions.

So, while Dr Koornhof is all "optimistic", we believe that most blacks will not view the draft Bills as particularly exciting. Dr Koornhof believes "we will succeed", and adds, "and let me tell the sceptics, history has proved that sceptics are always wrong".

Maybe. But we will prefer to wait for history to judge us all the same.

'THE STAR' Editorial

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 31 Oct 80 p 20

[Editorial: "Time To Debate the Pass Laws"]

[Text]

THERE is plenty to criticise in the three draft Bills which formalise the P W Botha administration's new approach to urban blacks. There is quite a lot that is commendable too. What certainly must be applauded is the fact that the Bills have been presented not as a fait accompli but as proposals for public discussion, well in advance of their passage through Parliament. On this basis they can be studied carefully — as indeed they need to be, since they are highly complex — and specific suggestions can be made for improving the package. There is scope for reasoned debate rather than stock responses and a shouting match.

This in itself represents a degree of progress. There is further advance in the overall approach to urban black communities. The thinking represents a huge advance on that of the Verwoerdian era, which saw the townships as transit camps which were deliberately to be kept uncomfortable and unattractive. Now they are accepted as a fact of life. Their quality of life and the security of their people are to be improved — for those who qualify under the influx laws as urban dwellers. And therein lies the major rub.

The Koornhof proposals, while greatly easing restrictions on the mobility of qualified urban residents and their families, contain tough new sanctions on the disqualified. For instance, some quite horrifying penalties are suggested for those who employ, transport or house illegal migrants; not to mention stiff fines for the migrants themselves. As Dr Koornhof said yesterday, the principle is to make influx control "more effective." The reforms are all within the basic framework and machinery of apartheid. The ethics of that system remain as questionable as ever, even though their emphasis is now switched somewhat from ideology to economics.

Further questions can be asked about plans to remove "hurtful" discrimination (isn't all discrimination hurtful?) and the viability of the proposed new system of local government for urban blacks. For instance, can their basic shortage of revenue ever be overcome without radical restructuring of the whole "township" system? And will their councils ever gain credibility?

All these questions must be asked, but voices should be kept lowered as the debate proceeds. Something of a radical social experiment is heralded by the Koornhof proposals. It is up to all interested parties to try to make it a better and more humane experiment.

KOORNHOF ANSWERS QUESTIONS ON INFLUX CONTROL

Johannesburg SUNDAY TIMES in English 2 Nov 80 p 4

[Text]

WILL the hated "dompas" — or something like it — ever be finally eliminated from life of black South Africans?

Dr Piet Koornhof says yes.

But the verbatim record of this week's Press conference leaves the matter more open.

Dr Koornhof: Under the new system as envisaged in this Bill, black people will not be required to show a reference book and in the new system the black people who qualify — and by far the majority will qualify — will not be subjected to harrassment. They will be on a par with white people. That is why I said I declare war on the dompass. These things are now eliminated.

Questioner: And if he is approached by a policeman in a white area and he has no proof on him that he is qualified?

Official: Then he runs the risk of being arrested. The onus of proof is on him to prove that he is qualified. If he has some sort of certificate, it will be much easier for him. That is why we are considering a voluntary system, whereby we will issue certificates to those who ask for them.

Questioner: Then he still has to carry some form of proof on him?

Official: I would, if I were him.

Dr Koornhof: The same applies to the white man in the new system. That is the point. In the new system the same will apply to the black man as to the white man.

Questioner: Under the new system a black man can still be asked by a policeman to produce his documents and if he can't, he can still be loaded into the police van, exactly the same as it is now.

Dr Koornhof: No, the idea behind this new dispensation is to put a stop to that sort of thing. You must await further announcements which I cannot make today.

Questioner: That aside, the onus still remains on him to have a certificate and to prove his qualifications to be wherever he is found to be. His problem today is that he is apprehended on the street by a policeman, and that problem is going to remain.

Dr Koornhof (emphatically): The new dispensation will remove it.

Official: A white man in a black area runs exactly the same risk as a black man in a white area if he is not a qualified person. In your own group area there is no need to check on you.

Questioner: But most blacks work in white areas!

Dr Koornhof: In the new dispensation, as we have explained, this will obviate that sort of thing.

Professor Piet van der Merwe, leading member of the Riekert Commission: In the Riekert report we were very, very acutely aware of the irritations and frustrations caused by the influx control exercise on street level. We recommended only two points of control insofar as influx control is concerned — at the work place and at the place of residence — and not on the street.

Questioner: Does that mean no arbitrary arrests unless there is a real reason for suspicion?

Dr Koornhof: Yes, that is the point. The police have been in on all these exercises. And that is why we are publishing these things for general public knowledge and for comment. It is clear that if we don't succeed in doing that, then we don't succeed in our exercise.

Mr Mills, Director-General of Co-operation and Development: Mr Minister, there is one point here, the gentleman has a point: you have got to have proof, you have got to have a document, and if you haven't got it, you run the risk.

That is why we believe there should be exemptions on a broad scale, so that the man has a disc or a document, call it what you will, if any policeman stops him, that he has this thing on him, whether it be a different colour in his book or whatever, so that the policeman should know that this man is legal, he is not subject to any sort of influx control. I think that will relieve a lot of the problem.

Questioner: Then you have not solved the problem that the black man will have to carry his document on him all day long and if he forgets it at home he can be arrested.

Official: Let me assure you, the carrying of a document to identify yourself will be compulsory for all people.

Second official: We must also make it very plain. We are not doing away with influx control, and so long as you have influx control, there must be a system to enforce it. On just what this must be, we are open to advice.

Dr Koornhof: The intention is to improve relations with other population groups and to remove this harassment of people who are legally here being called upon to produce documents and if they have not got them on them, then they are in difficulties. That is the exercise involved in this new dispensation.

I have no doubt that when it is implemented in time we will achieve this aim.

Dr Van der Merwe: I just want to make it very clear that from the point of view of the Riekert Commission, we saw that we have to be practical: We have thousands and thousands of visitors from neighbouring states, like BophuthaTswana, in the case of Pretoria and KwaZulu, in the case of Durban, a mass confrontation of people on the streets.

To ask them for identity documents would be physically impossible to do. Where a man will be required to identify himself for various reasons will be in the work place and at the place where he resides, where he sleeps. Those two places. But the mass, on street level, it will be unnecessary to ask for documents.

I think it will be phased out.

Dr Koornhof: It will disappear.

Mr Mills: I just want to reply to that. Already in the present circumstances there is a provision that if a man is arrested without a pass — call it a pass — and he says he has the document within 3km there is a provision that he must be given an opportunity to get the document. Following recent newspaper reports (in the Sunday Times) of cases, there are plans to make these provisions even stricter.

RIVE DISCUSSES SOWETO'S PROBLEMS, NEEDS

Details of London Speech

Johannesburg POST in English 28 Oct 80 p 2

[Text]

THE CHAIRMAN of the Soweto Planning Council, Mr Louis Rive, said last night black South Africans did not want spoon-feeding or handouts — they needed instead, help to develop their own abilities, culture and character.

Mr Rive, in an address to the South Africa Club in London, said he had made contact across a broad spectrum with blacks living in Soweto.

"My basic belief is that only a people itself can truly and permanently uplift itself," he said. "I do not believe that the black people in South Africa want to be spoon-fed.

"They are too proud and inherently too strong for that.

"It would be sheer folly to underestimate the potential, the strength of character and culture of the present generation of South African blacks, who do not want, nor need, handouts."

Mr Rive, who is a former Postmaster-General of South Africa, said the Government planned to spend tens-of-millions of rands on additional primary and secondary education, and it was essential that the private sector make "a more meaningful contribution in respect of commercial, managerial, artisan and technical training."

He said that in line with the policy to transfer greater power to blacks, training in local government and public administration was extremely important and was receiving active attention.

"To me, this is one of the shady areas," he said. "It was wrong of the white man not to acknowledge the need to assist, guide and train blacks to enter the areas of greater specialisation and sophistication long ago, realising, apart from any other consideration, that the source of white supply was totally inadequate.

It would be disastrous for the black man not to realise that he must equip himself before he can effectively perform at the different levels of government."

Mr Rive said blacks must have a greater share in the country's economy and must be helped to achieve this, and there should be no exploitation of blacks by whites.

"There must be adequate protection until the black man himself wants all protection to be abolished. This is the acid test of the white man's sincerity."

Speaking about Soweto itself, Mr Rive described it as "no longer a slum, but it is in general a drab and dreary place."

Nevertheless, it compared more than favourably with many of the vast residential areas of the major cities of Africa, Latin America and India.

He said housing was the first priority, and the existing shortage was estimated at about 33 000 houses. "I hope the provision of houses on a large scale will gain momentum in the near future," he said.

But Mr Rive added that he did not think large-scale sub-economic housing projects should be launched at this stage.

"More than 80 percent of homes are in the sub-economic class. We should now concentrate on better type economic housing — those who want and can afford better homes, to be accommodated, and the vauum left in the sub-economic class, to be filled by those who have nothing at all."

Dealing with the specific problems that Soweto faces, Mr Rive said that throughout its history it had been the victim of politics. It had always been regarded as a dormitory town, and until recently little or no permanency was permitted.

He said Sowetans came from different ethnic groups, and while a substantial proportion were urbanised many were "not far removed from a simple pastoral lifestyle which has altered little during generation of South African blacks, who do not want, nor need, handouts."

But Mr Rive added that he did not think large-scale sub-economic housing projects should be launched at this stage.

"More than 80 percent of homes are in the sub-economic class. We should now concentrate on better type economic housing — those who want and can afford better homes, to be accommodated, and the vauum left in the sub-economic class, to be filled by those who have nothing at all."

Dealing with the specific problems that Soweto faces, Mr Rive said that throughout its history it had been the victim of politics. It had always been regarded as a dormitory town, and until recently little or no permanency was permitted.

He said Sowetans came from different ethnic groups, and while a substantial proportion were urbanised many were "not far removed from a simple pastoral lifestyle which has altered little during the past century and more. Some clung to tribal customs.

There were about 3 000 witchdoctors in Soweto who wielded a great deal of influence, and many of the people were "trapped between two worlds, between a past age and the space age."

On the other hand, there was a young and rapidly emerging urban group with no direct ties with tribal homelands.

"They are materialistic. They feel frustrated and humiliated by statutory discrimination. They are more politically aware than the rural or tribal black.

"Many feel resentment towards the authorities and are in sympathy with radical political organisations."

[Editorial: "The Kind of Straight Talk We All Want"]

[Text]

WHENEVER a voice like Mr Louis Rive's surfaces from the rigid framework of Afrikanerdom, we fear without exaggeration that he will be silenced before his remarks take seed.

It would be difficult for the white establishment to doubt Mr Rive's credentials as he has an excellent track record as former Postmaster General. Still we fear the type of talk he gave in London, sane and sensible as it was, is going to jar many in the white fold.

We hope the Government and others would study his speech made at the South African Club dinner at the Savoy Hotel in London, carefully. Most of the things he said, we and others have been saying for years. But coming from us, such sentiments are branded as incitement, and stirring up of racial hatred.

As chairman of the Greater Soweto Planning Council we hope his words would not be treated as sheer rhetoric. In fact, our slight knowledge of the man convinces us he meant exactly what he said. But we will obviously be considered prejudiced.

This is the kind of straight talk we would like to hear more often and sometimes practised.

"It would be sheer folly", he said, "to underestimate the potential, the strength of character and the culture of the present generation of South African blacks who do not want or need handouts." Mr Thebehali please note.

We could easily take issue with some of the things Mr Rive said about so-called pressure groups which chanted for freedom, for we have to disagree with part of the argument.

Having said that, we most certainly have to hand it to Mr Rive for assessing our problem in such a direct and sincere way.

White Officials on Council

[Text]

SOWETO Council's Mr Nico Malan dropped another shocker yesterday when he announced that white officials now seconded to the council are to be put on the permanent staff.

Mr Malan is Chief Executive Officer of the Soweto Council. He is responsible for all administration in the area.

This means that "mayor" David Thebehali's ambitions when he assumed powers to Africanise the council staff have aborted, or are shelved. Previous claims that councils were established to have blacks running their own affairs have also been dashed.

The news should also come as a shock to the many black staff officials on the council who hoped to be appointed to senior positions. Previously the staff was told that white officials would be phased out when blacks became suitable to fill their positions.

And the white officials, when put on permanent staff, would be paid from Soweto monies. In fact, white officials who are at present seconded to the council are being paid by the Soweto Council. There are 150 of these officials.

Mr Malan said in an interview: "I also get my salary out of Soweto monies. Everybody working for the council does."

Mr Malan said the council employs 2 016 people, about 150 are white officials. He said these officials are in the process of being transferred from the West Rand Board and permanently put on the Soweto Council staff.

The presence of these white officials has caused bitterness to the people of Soweto. Apart from getting huge salaries paid out of the Soweto rents, the white officials still stand a chance of being paid inconvenience allowances for working in a black area.

And Mr Malan, speaking on behalf of the council, claimed yesterday that Soweto people had disregarded the anti-rent campaign and were paying the increased rents without fuss.

"Only a small fraction is not paying and this does not perturb us," he said.

Mr Malan said about one percent of the masses were not up to date with their rent or are resisting increased rent. He said the percentage worked to about 1 000 of Soweto residents. The 1 000 included people resisting increased rents, pensioners, welfare cases and those handicapped by ill-health, he claimed.

"The response on increased rents was so good in August," Mr Malan said. "I am optimistic that the October response will be the same as in August. People are paying the increased rents. They realise that cost of living has gone up."

Appeal Against Rent Increase

Johannesburg POST in English 29 Oct 80 p 29

[Text]

A BLACK trade union has appealed to Prime Minister P W Botha to intervene in the Soweto rent crisis.

The General Secretary of the Black Allied Workers Union Mr Samuel Nhlapo yesterday sent a telegram to Mr Botha urging him to intervene.

The telegram read: "The rent crisis is similar to the Afrikaans medium problem in 1976. Intervene in good time or prepare for another riot situation."

Mr Samuel Nhlapo yesterday told the Star the authorities were normally "careless" with warnings from community leaders. In 1976 they were warned that a riot situation was looming but they went on with their plans. We are warning them again and unless they reason with us human lives will be once more destroyed and they will claim that they were not warned," said Mr Nhlapo.

Mr Nhlapo's union was one of the organisations that took a decision, at the weekend, to march to various West Rand Board offices in Soweto to protest against high rents.

The recent rent crisis in Soweto started in August when the Soweto Community Council announced a R13,05 rent increase for all houses.

On Saturday the Diepmeadow area will increase rents by R4 and the Soweto Civic Associations have organised protest marches on that day.

RESIGN FROM COUNCIL

Black consciousness organisations are also planning to force Soweto Community Councillors to resign from their positions. In Chiawelo residents plan to march to the homes of two councillors in their area this weekend.

The only two women councillors in Sowet have been asked by the militant Soweto Women's Federation to resign their positions.

Soweto Council Shortfall

[Article by Harry Mathebela]

[Text]

THE Soweto Council has incurred a shortfall of nearly R3-million in five months.

And indications are that residents are not paying the increased service charges introduced last August.

Financial statistics for August, the month when the first R4,35 phase of the R13,05 increase for services came into force, show that 22 000 families owe the council R1 175 000 for water and electricity alone.

The debt is R96 000 higher than the previous month, according to reports tabled at the council's executive committee's monthly meeting yesterday.

In another report on rental statistics for August, the executive committee disclosed that "the situation at Orlando West Extension, Dube Village and Pimville Zone 5 is unsatisfactory and that the rent arears are 34%, 35% and 51% respectively."

The situation in other areas — especially Zola, where less than 1% of the rents was owing — was "pleasing," the report said.

The rent owed by traders was also said to be "extremely high". In Moroka alone the cumulative arrears had reached R14 386 while the monthly debit stood at R5 482.

It was also disclosed that the council had budgeted for an income of R2 189 050 for September but received only R1 782 740.

The executive committee reported that for the period from April 1 to August this year, the council spent R11 636 889 but received only R8 836 700 — a shortfall of R2 790 189.

Most of the council's income was spent on water, electricity, sewerage fees and staff salaries and wages, said the report.

TWENTY BLACK CITIES NEEDED BY END OF CENTURY

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 30 Oct 80 p 1

[Article by Patrick Laurence]

[Text]

NOT one, but 20 black cities the size of Soweto would have to be built between now and the end of the century, Mr Andre la Grange, a senior research worker at the influential Pretoria-based Bureau for Economic Research, said yesterday.

Mr La Grange was commenting on news reports that a black city as large as Soweto was being planned north of Bronkhorstspruit.

Many of the new cities would be situated on or near the axis running from Rustenburg in the west to Middelburg in the east, if present plans for balanced economic growth were fulfilled successfully.

In terms of recent policy announcements by the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, the new objective is "balanced growth" along already established development axes, of which the Rustenburg-Middelburg axis is a prime example.

The plan aims at steering a middle course between further concentration of activity within the four major metropolises — PWV (Pretoria-Witwatersrand-Vereeniging), Durban-Pinetown, Port Elizabeth-Uitenhage and Cape Town — and the hitherto largely futile attempt to deflect growth into the "black homelands" or along their borders.

According to Dr "Flip" Smit, of the Human Sciences Research Council, about 21-million additional blacks will have to be accommodated in South Africa and the homelands before the end of the century.

The choice is between 20 Sowetos or 40 Mdantsanes (Mdantsane is a rapidly-growing black township near East London).

Dr Smit, who is one of South Africa's foremost demographers and who has advised the Minister of Co-operation and Development, Dr Piet Koornhof, on problems arising from black urbanisation, favoured the 40-Mdantsanes option.

Population projections by Professor J L Sadie, of the University of Stellenbosch, illustrate the rapid growth of the black population. By the year 2 000 there will be 37,7-million blacks constituting 74,4% of the total population, against 18,3-million and 70,4% in 1970.

The implications for urban planning of these figures are contained in another calculation: by the end of the century 75% of blacks will live in urban areas, against about less than 30% in 1970.

Reflecting on the prospect of 20 more Sowetos in the next 20 years, Dr G M E Leistner, director of the Africa Institute, stressed that it was not enough merely to plan for the development of white and black cities along development axes.

Attention should also be given to the establishment of "common co-operation areas" where joint planning for the white and black cities could be carried out, he said.

Decisions would have to made about shared cultural and sporting facilities as well as "common problems and functions," Dr Leistner added.

NEW TRANSVAAL NP SECRETARY DISCUSSES PARTY UNITY

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 17 Oct 80 p 17

[Text]

One man believes that uncertainty in NP ranks can be used to the good of the party.

He is Professor Jannie Pieterse who next year takes over as secretary of the NP in the Transvaal and therefore as chief NP organiser in the province.

This is a crucial party post in view of veiled criticism by the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, of the level of NP organisation in the Transvaal.

In an interview this week, Professor Pieterse referred to reports of "confusion" in NP ranks.

He said this "confusion" had already been turned to the advantage of the NP as it had raised the interest of party supporters who had lapsed into apathy.

Once the interest of supporters was raised, the communications network of the party organisation could step in and convey the party message to the rank-and-file, he said.

And the party message is that the basic NP principle of separate development remains untampered with, he says.

"Accents in the party may differ, but the principle remains the same."

Professor Pieterse's theory that out of uncertainty there can be strength, rests on the premise of effective communication and organisation.

And although he mostly avoids the question, it is obvious that the NP believes he is the man for the job in the Transvaal.

At a time when the NP youth is showing great interest in the politics of the left and the far-right, Professor Pietese, who is 51, has shown he can command the trust and respect of youth.

He is director of the University of Pretoria's student service bureau.

The professor is convinced that youth today is no different from the youth of any generation.

"There is a tendency of youth to question," he says. But only a very small and highly vocal majority of Afrikaans youth displayed dissident tendencies, he believes.

The vast majority remained stable. At Pretoria University, often regarded as the most conservative campus in the country, Polustu, the new verligte student organisation has made little impact he says.

Professor Pieterse is keeping any changes he has in mind under close wrap until he takes over from the veteran Transvaal party secretary, Senator Jack Steyl, in the new year.

INKATHA URGED NOT TO ENTER COMMUNITY COUNCIL ELECTIONS

Johannesburg POST in English 27 Oct 80 p 8

[Editorial]

[Text]

TWO issues of singlar importance to our lives have to be addressed with seriousness and with cool heads.

The first is Inkatha's reported speculation about standing for elections in the community councils, and the second is the wholesale closing of schools.

Whatever the reasons for Inkatha's new political stand we are somewhat apprehensive that more division and hatred is going to result from their participation in community councils.

If Inkatha is trying to use the councils as a means to enter urban politics and thus effectively increase their might, they are surely being naive.

With their force in numbers and shrewd leadership potential, Inkatha may well wipe the floor of all contenders if they enter this sorry business. They will, however, have buried all the credibility they have managed to get in urban areas and increase divisiveness among blacks, urban and rural. They would also be giving the councils the kind of publicity and even credibility in some quarters, which they hardly deserve.

We do not wish to enter into any lengthy argument with Ikantha, particularly as any kind of questioning of their stand usually results in a veritable plethora of replies, but may we presume to advise them. They will be losing all sorts of friends and sympathisers amongst us if they dare enter this scenario.

As for the schools, we wish everybody could be aware of the fact that we are in post June '76 days. In our days students did go on strike, and boycott classes, for sometimes ridiculous complaints, but the problems were quickly sorted out at the school. Sometimes there was a caning, often there was a disciplinary committee action and sometimes even the occasional expulsion and suspension.

Today schools are closed.

The mood in our education has changed, and perspectives have to change too. Teachers and students, plus members of the department, are all highly emotional and it is easy to have a major confrontation stemming from the most insignificant school issue.

BUTHELEZI ADDRESSES EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 17 Oct 80 p 17

[Text]

STRASBOURG — The struggle in South Africa was essentially political and the use of violence to try and solve problems had no hope of success for the foreseeable future, kwaZulu chief minister and Inkatha president, Chief Gatsha Buthelezi, has said in Strasbourg.

Addressing members of the European Parliament he said that the majority of blacks believed that the highest priority should be given to political developments inside South Africa and that the use of violence was something that "may occur in the next generation."

"The central nature of the South African struggle is political. It is not an armed struggle — it is not a struggle in international debating chambers."

Chief Buthelezi said that while he understood the anger and frustration which led blacks to seek military training. "That anger and frustration is misdirected at this point in time."

He said the African National Congress mission in exile had sought for almost 20 years to initiate change in South Africa "and some of them deeply resent and are politically afraid of the massive strides Inkatha has made over a brief five-year period.

The ANC, he said, perceived itself as a government in exile and sought international recognition as the sole representative of 20 million people. This was power-mongering, he said.

Chief Buthelezi said that as a Black South African he wished to tell the ANC mission in exile that it was responsible to those who had elected to stay in South Africa and "there is no prospect of you becoming the tail that wags the dog."

It needed to understand that the struggle would be won by South Africans at home.

Chief Buthelezi dismissed the Black Consciousness movement as a spent force and said talk about the "real struggle" being underground was "just political balderdash."

Turning to white politics within South Africa, he said it had to be accepted that there had been fundamental change in approach and theer was a definite realisation that change would have to take place.

He did not say this in a spirit of optimism that whites were about to introduce fundamental and radical change, but people in Europe had to understand that the situation here was radically different from places like Zambia, Zimbabwe or Mozambique.

"White South Africans are part of Africa and in centuries to come they will still be part of Africa. White South Africans are going to survive as Africans. They have no alternative and this produces a dimension which many analysts try conveniently to forget.

"White South Africans perforce have to adapt as Africans and they will do so. That process of adaptation cannot take place successfully without black political responsibility towards whites.

"It cannot take place without black initiatives to encourage Whites to adapt and to respond to the realities of the situation," the chief said.

Although he had no illusions about the fact that whites would resist power sharing, he had no doubt that they would come to share power.

"All I am convinced about is that politics in South Africa revolves around the central theme of blacks getting whites to share political power without driving whites to suicidal courses of action where destructive violence will pass a point of no return."

Dealing with the policies of the present government, Chief Buthelezi said these were couched in "vague and unspecific terms," there was no real content to the constallation of states idea and nobody really knew what was meant by the term.

BUTHELEZI SAYS WHITE MAJORITY OPPOSES CHANGE IN STATUS QUO

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 7 Nov 80 p 13

[Text]

CAPE TOWN. — Chief Gatsha Buthelezi, Chief Minister of KwaZulu, defended himself against charges by the external wing of the ANC that he was "collaborating" with the South African Government, when he addressed the Club 100 in Cape Town.

"It is silly for our brothers in exile and the surrogates here to sell the myth that I am a 'collaborator' all of a sudden," he said on Wednesday night.

"No one who follows politics is unaware of the long history of harassment I have endured at the hands of the SA Government through the Bureau for State Security, the defunct Deaprtment of Information, officials of the Department of Bantu Administration and the Security Police," he said.

Division

Anyone who fanned the flames of division between Black and Black was clearly not a friend of Blacks.

"No one who knows that in any guerrilla war the guerrillas only succeed to the extent that the local population gives them moral support, can fan the flames of fratricidal strife between me and the mission wing of the ANC," he said.

Chief Buthelezi said Inkatha, of which he was president, believed that every effort made within and outside the borders of South Africa was important. For this reason, what the guerrillas did was relevant to the Black liberation struggle in South Africa.

Status quo

The fact that so few Whites supported the Progressive Federal Party indicated beyond any doubt that the majority of Whites did not want to upset the status quo in South Africa, Chief Buthelezi said.

He told the predominantly White audience the dangers facing South Africans were a direct result of racist policies Whites had pursued "ever since they seized power through the barrel of the gun."

The majority of Blacks and a mere sprinkling of Whites did not accept the status quo.

He said that in the past 70 years Whites, or the majority of Whites, had pursued policies which rejected the Black person as a participant in decision-making.

Barometer

No one could deny that the recent Simonstown and East London North by-election results were a good barometer showing where the majority of Whites stood — "even in the eleventh-hour situation in which we find ourselves in South Africa.

"These are very unpleasant realities, but we have just to face them and not try to sweep them under the carpet," Chief Buthelezi said.

The President's Council was another example of where the majority of Whites stood — not just the Government.

The Government had "on sufferance" accepted a sprinkling of Coloured, Indian and Chinese faces in an advisory President's Council. But Black faces could not be countenanced even in an advisory body of that nature.

Places

For the Blacks, there was no place in decision-making machinery but a lot of places in the South African Defence Force.

Black and White had to accept each other, and live together in South Africa, however difficult they found it to accept each other as brothers and sisters. — Sapa.

WRITERS ASSOCIATION CONGRESS HEARS JOSEPH MAVI, ELECTS OFFICERS

Johannesburg THE VOICE in English 22-28 Oct 80 p 5

[Article by Khangale Makhado]

[Text]

CAPE TOWN: At the fourth annual general congress of the Writers Association of South African (WASA), recently held at the St Francis Cultural Centre, Langa, it was resolved to open its membership to all workers in the newspaper industry.

Hence the formation of the new body, Media Workers Association of South Africa (MWASA).

WASA, which was formed four years ago, was for Black journalists and writers exclusively.

The recent dramatic turn was levelled at bringing together all workers in the newspaper industry.

This means MWASA's main objective is to allow Black journalists, photographers, cleaners, labourers, messengers clerks, drivers and mechanics, to identify as one group.

What appears to have led to the intended amalgamation of workers were divisive tactics of employers, in order to cause ill-feeling among workers.

The theme of the congress was "The Workers in the 80's".

Guest speaker was the president of the JHB Black Municipal Workers Union (BMWU), Mr Joseph Zenzele Mavi, who hit headlines during the recent strikes by municipal workers.

He pointed out that South Africa has already entered a phase when industrial relations would be a critical factor in the survival of its society.

It was "disturbingly a phase for which the vast majority of our citizens, employers or employees, are perilously ill-equipped.

"The first area I am concerned with is that of industrial democracy.

"Broadly, this involves a sharing of decision-making control and power at the workplace, equally between employer and employee.

"This should not merely be a workplace phenomenon but the logical step of a major sectal movement, namely people's desire today to have a greater control over their lives.

"Even an influence in shaping their destines.

"To accommodate rather than oppose this powerful social movement is what management should be striving for.

"But today management is running the risk of losing control and being unable to manage at all," said Mr Mavi.

MWASA, like Wasa, upholds the Black Consciousness philosophy and rejects the idea of affiliating to mixed trade union federations.

The newly elected national executive committee of MWASA is: Zwelakhe Sisulu President, Mrs Maud Motanyane General Secretary, Willie Bokala Assistant Secretary; Treasurers Charles Ngakula, Phil Mtimkulu, Rashid Seria, Marimuntu Subrimoney is vice president.

The much-coveted "Henry Nxumalo" Award, which last year went to Can Themba posthumously, this year went to the Western Cape's Region of MWASA, for having produced a newsletter "Grassroots".

In his summary the president told congress that time was now ripe when MWASA had to abandon the chalk board and instead do some fieldwork.

METHODISTS DISCUSS MINISTRY TO GUERRILLAS, CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE

Chaplains to Guerrillas

Johannesburg POST in English 23 Oct 80 p 3

[Article by Charles Mogale]

[Text]

THE Methodist Church is prepared to send chaplains to guerillas across the borders.

The move has the blessings of the general secretary of the South African Council of Churches (SACC), Bishop Desmond Tutu.

"In such cases, the church must remain neutral," Bishop Desmond Tutu said.

The gospel could not be preached on one side while "the other side" was ignored.

"We support them warmly," Bishop Tutu added.

The Methodist Church's conference at Welkom, which made the decision yesterday, made a call for Methodist ministers to volunteer as chaplains to guerilla forces.

The church agreed to accept financial responsibility for posting chaplains outside the country.

An East London businessman, Mr Robin Midlane, said he took strong exception to church money collected in South Africa from relatives of "boys on this side" being used to send a chaplain to the sons of other Methodists "actually fighting against us."

However, the Rev Fremont Louw, chairman of the Northern Transvaal district of the church, said the decision had been taken on the basis that ministry would be extended to those "on the other side".

The church has found that new structures are necessary because its members were involved in military conflict and defence forces other than the country's fell within the church's boundaries.

The Methodist Church of Southern Africa embraces Botswana, Lesotho, Swaziland, Bophuthatswana, Namibia and Mozambique.

The Rev Simeon Nkoane, Dean of the Anglican Church, in Johannesburg, said the Anglican Church would have to consider seriously following the Methodist's example.

Leaders of other denominations could not be reached for comment. In 1977, the chaplain-general of the South African Defence Force, Major-General J A van Zyl, said the then Minister of Defence, Mr P W Botha, had no objections to churches "ministering to the enemy."

The remark came after the Dutch Reformed, Anglican, Catholic and Methodist churches had made statements in favour of ministering to all sides in a conflict, including guerillas.

PFP Reaction on Disobedience

Johannesburg THE VOICE in English 4 Nov 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Irrelevant PFP"]

[Text]

WHILE THE Progressive Reformed Party is perhaps the better of the two evils (Nationalist Party), most Blacks still regard it as irrelevant to the political struggle.

The Party's decision to reject the sanctioning of civil disobedience to unjust and discriminatory laws, as endorsed by the Methodist Church's Annual Conference, is a clear indication of how out-of-touch the PFP is with Black thinking.

As a matter of fact, civil disobedience is viewed by Blacks as a mild form of achieving a just society.

At this point in time, most Blacks would even interpret the civil disobedience Methodist resolution as a non-event.

For the PFP to regard this as unacceptable is, therefore, extremely difficult to comprehend.

The PFP's attitude towards the civil disobedience issue, is perhaps one of the reasons why Blacks do not discern any significant difference between the ruling Nationalist Party and PFP.

In fact, some Black people prefer the Nationalist Party for its blunt application of apartheid.

'TOKEN' BLACK SPORTSMEN, FOREIGN BLACK ENTERTAINERS CRITICIZED

Bishop Tutu Comment

Johannesburg POST in English 28 Oct 80 p 9

[Text]

HE was opposed to "so-called multi-racial sport because blacks are usually only token blacks such as Errol Tobias on this farce of a rugby tour to South America," said Bishop Desmond Tutu, the General Secretary of the South African Council of Churches in Port Elizabeth at the weekend.

Bishop Tutu was addressing about 800 people at the Sportsman of the Year function of Kwazakhele Rugby Union on Saturday night. He said rugby was still "the most racist sport".

"People like Tobias are used as window dressing to pretend that rugby is being normalised. Blacks are being used really to try and get South Africa back into international sport to evade the increasing international pressure on this country to change its iniquitous political polices.

"Blacks are being used to get us to say that sport has nothing to do with the rest of our lives — that it has nothing to do with the inferior educational system where 77 schools have at the moment been closed and over 50 000 pupils are not at school."

"If you mix on the sports field, why should you not mix afterwards? What does mixed sport mean when you still live in match box houses, when you have no street lights, when you have wholly inadequate transport to your place of work because by law your ghetto must be so many miles from where you work.

"No, multi-racialism or mixed sport is a strategy really for the benefit of white South Africa.

"I am glad that certain blacks have shown that their ability has nothing to do with skin colour.

"I have no desire to see our country destroyed and so I do want to urge that we use every peaceful method to bring about real change. Anything short of force to get us to the conference table to talk about political power-sharing because that is where the salvation of our country lies."

Ray Charles Concert Incidents

Johannesburg POST in English 27 Oct 80 p 2

[Article by Moeti Molelekoa]

[Text]

THERE WAS stone-throwing at the Ray Charles concert in which a white man, believed to be a radio producer, was slightly injured in Welkom at the weekend.

About 900 music fans defied a call by their local black consciousness movements to totally boycott the blind American singer's concert which was held at the Thabong Stadium, Welkom, on Saturday.

Just before the concert could start there were demonstrators carrying placards with slogans such as "Go home Ray, we don't want you here". Demonstrations were organised by the Welkom branch of Azanian People's Organisation (Azapo).

The majority of Ray Charles' posters were destroyed. Instead, placards condemning the show were pinned up. Security police confiscated the placards which were on the walls of the stadium shortly before the show.

Large contingents of heavily-armed police patrolled inside and outside the stadium. There was noticeable tension throughout the show. Police escorted the people and cars out of the stadium after the concert.

Ray Charles was accused by Welkom Azapo for staging the show in this country during the present political situation. Azapo said as Ray took part in the American civil rights struggle for political freedom of American blacks, he should co-operate with his fellow blacks in South Africa.

HORWOOD VOICES CONCERN ABOUT EXPANDING MONEY SUPPLY

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 7 Nov 80 pp 1, 2

[Text]

THE Minister of Finance, Senator Owen Horwood, last night warned he might have to impose controls on the money supply.

Expressing concern at the rapid expansion of money in the system, he said this could lead to massive price jumps later in the year.

Speaking at the 25th anniversary dinner of Union Acceptances Ltd, Sen Horwood suggested the authorities were looking at ways to control both the rising net foreign reserves of the banks and the expansion of bank credit.

He expressed the view that, while the economy was buoyant, and the problems were those of prosperity and success, he did not want to see economic growth hampered by general demand inflation.

At the same time, the Minister said he was satisfied with the performance of his budget and that, far from being inflationary — as some sources claimed — it was having a marked stabilising effect on the economy.

There would have to be a reassessment of the role of exchange control and large discounts on forward dollars at a time of current account surplus, excess domestic liquidity and unduly low money market interest rates.

The skyrocketing broad money supply was posing a threat of general demand inflation.

After rising by 12,6 percent in 1978 and 13,3 percent in 1979, the broad money supply had increased in the first three-quarters of this year at a seasonally adjusted rate of nearly 28 percent.

This rate of increase was more than double the broad guideline of 10 to 12 percent which he had laid down for 1980 earlier in the year.

Then, too, the seasonally adjusted annual rate increase of the supply had accelerated from 13,7 percent in the first quarter of the year to 17,5 percent in the second quarter — and 48,6 percent in the third quarter.

"One does not have to be a devout 'monetarist' to appreciate that increases of this magnitude could have serious inflationary consequences," Sen Horwood said.

The inability to effectively control the money supply was particularly worrying in the present circumstances. The very success of the country's growth policy had absorbed most of the surplus capacity in the economy and had highlighted the serious shortages of certain kinds of skilled labour.

But in spite of the disinflationary monetary impact of the budget, the money supply was rising excessively.

There were two main reasons for this. The first was the balance of payments surplus as reflected in the rising net foreign reserves of the banking system — and the second was an increase in bank credit in the private sector.

LONG-TERM WATER SUPPLY BELIEVED AMPLE

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 31 Oct 80 p 1

[Text]

South Africa has more than twice as much water available for the future than recent alarmist estimates by the Government's Commission of Enquiry into Water Matters.

This means that the looming water crisis predicted by the Commission is off — for good.

The revised water potential estimates made by the Department of Water Affairs' chief Engineer, Mr T P C van Robbroeck, indicate that the country will not have a water crisis.

According to Mr van Robbroeck, brackish water is likely to be desalinated into fresh water supplies by the year 2020 to 2030 when the country's natural resources are likely to become stretched to the limit.

The Water Affairs estimates indicate South Africa can produce almost four times as much water as it now consumes, or about 40 000 000-million (40 milliard) cubic metres a year.

This is well over twice the estimated demand on water resources by the end of the century of some 18,6 milliard cubic metres a year.

The new optimistic picture of South Africa's future abundance of water is due to lower estimates of future water consumption by the average South African.

The Government Water Commission estimated that the country would use more than a thousand litres per capita by the year 2000. Mr van Robbroeck and his colleague, Mr J G du Plessis, estimate per capita consumption at 341 litres, by that year.

At present the per capita water consumption in South Africa is 230 litres, with a daily high of 503 litres in the industrialised southern Transvaal.

According to Mr van Robbroeck judicious management of water resources will ensure that about 80 percent of mean annual surface runoff can be used and then reused through return flows from irrigation, urban and industrial use.

BUSINESS ORGANIZATIONS SHOULD INCREASE COORDINATION

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 27 Oct 80 p 13

[Article by Fridjhon]

[Text]

IT WILL be interesting to see whether members of the Federated Chamber of Industries, the Afrikaanse Handelsinstituut and Seifsa — not to mention dozens of other lesser important employer organisations — respond to the call made by Mr Bob Goodwin of Assocom for more co-operation and co-ordination among them.

He said in his presidential address last week that the Prime Minister had set an example of what could be done by streamlining and rationalising the public service. He believed that the Prime Minister and his Cabinet colleagues were entitled to ask what the 1980s would see by way of closer co-operation and less duplication of effort in the business sector.

Pledging Assocom's support to explore all possible channels for a joint effort, Mr Goodwin added that his plea stemmed from a desire to see business organisations adapt to changing circumstances.

Certainly conditions have changed since the bad old days when the FCI and Assocom were always at daggers drawn and the AHI adopted a closed-circle tribal attitude. While Seifsa sneered down its nose with all the superiority of steelmakers who were contemptuous of the "needle trade" and other light industries.

Assocom and the FCI could find little common ground, with the distributive trade fighting industrialists who constantly petitioned the authorities for higher tariffs. The shopkeepers wanted cheap goods while the manufacturers grumbled that they could not compete with the so-called rice-bowl wages paid to workers in the Far East.

The Handelsinstituut was committed to building up Afrikaner participation in both commerce and industry at a time when the other groups were dominant in the business field. It slavishly echoed Government policy and appeared to be a branch of the Nationalist Party. The AHI welcomed both manufacturers and merchants — not to mention mining and the motor trade — in its magic circle and did not experience the Assocom-FCI conflict of interest. The unity of Afrikanerdom came first.

And Seifsa remained a law unto itself — a breakaway organisation from the FCI, largely because of a clash of personalities among its paid officials.

But that's all water under the bridge.

The bad old days have become the good-time present.

Assocom recognises that unless infant industries are protected, the South African economy will not expand, more workers will not be employed and there will be smaller markets to cater for. Assocom has stated unequivocally that there should be reasonable protection, but this should be by tariff barriers and not by import control.

With true free-market philosophy, the association's attitude is that if a businessman wants to import goods and pay the Customs duty it is up to him to decide whether the goods will land at competitive prices.

On the other hand, among the ranks of Assocom are many industrialists who subscribe to most of the principles enunciated by that body.

The AHI has shed its former attitudes and is now as vociferous in criticising Government policy as it affects business interests as is any other employer organisation. Its members include hundreds of businessmen who have "arrived" and who are secure and confident because of the successes they have achieved. It is no longer narrow and jealous in its attitudes.

AHI today could move towards co-operation from a position of strength. Judging from last week's Assocom Congress and the turnout of delegates from all over the country, as well as from its performance and clear-thinking in recent years, Assocom, too, talks from a sturdy platform and a depth of membership.

The FCI and Seifsa are well established, but these two organisations are not as outspoken as the other two; they appear to be more introspective and inclined to operate from behind closed doors.

But all these organisations, and the other little ones besides, have many problems in common. In fact, if they are prepared to be forthcoming and honest, they will acknowledge that they have more agreement areas than those of disagreement.

Labour, railways, Government services, fiscal policy, group areas problems — there is a patchwork of problems about which these organisations frequently visit the Government to make representations. Cabinet Ministers, senior public servants, the Reserve Bank must get a little bored with receiving a mutiplicity of delegations from the private sector, all who have come to make the same complaints and proffer the same solutions to any given question.

One strong delegation representing the total business community would not only have more clout, but would be representative of the best brains in the country. Government policy is to encourage the private sector to take initiatives — but these initiatives must be forceful and articulate, not repetitious mumblings from many groups.

There is another reason why the business organisations should get together and this should be the most telling of all to any businessman. The costs of running employer organisations are mounting every year which means that subscriptions are getting bigger and bigger. A time will come when large organisations who currently make big contributions to all the employer bodies are going to cry halt.

A pooling of resources would cut costs to members and would reduce an administrative burden which will become unmanageable in a few years.

Of course, this will mean a clash of personalities. But this is something which will have to be faced. With South Africa's manpower shortages, it cannot afford duplication and replication of administration and other services.

A start must be made somewhere. The beginning could be more joint consultation with joint studies so that petty jealousies are dissolved by the catalyst of common interest. And then a joint commission to go into the pros and cons of amalgamation.

Centralised government is getting stronger and stronger under the Botha programme; unless the business community sets up a strong centralised organisation which speaks for everyone who upholds the free enterprise system there is a danger that in the long run, the Government and the bureaucracy will be able to dominate by splintering any private sector opposition.

SURVEY SHOWS SHARP COST OF LIVING INCREASES FOR POOR

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 29 Oct 80 p 4

[Article by Gerald Reilly]

[Text]

ROCKETING living costs for the poorer section of the population are highlighted in a survey to be released later this week by the University of Port Elizabeth.

The survey, compiled by the Institute for Planning Research, shows that in the 12 months ending in October the minimum subsistence level (MSL) for blacks will have risen by 18%, and for coloureds by 18,9%.

Even more alarming, according to economists, is that for the six months May to October, the increase in the MSL for blacks will be 11,2% and for coloureds nearly 10%.

And the chairman of the PFP's economic commission, Mr Harry Schwarz, has made an urgent call for the Government to remove GST from basic foods and to slow down the unprecedented increases in food prices.

He was supported by leading trade unionists, who have pleaded with the Government for the past two years to abolish GST on basic foods like maize products and bread.

Mr Schwarz said any loss of revenue because of the removal of GST from essential foods would be a sound investment in security.

The institute claims the huge increase in blacks' living costs is due mainly to the big escalation of food prices.

This is borne out by the Consumer Price Index for September, which showed that last month food prices rose by 5,6% and, for the 12 months to the end of September, by more than 29%.

The institute found the minimum wage needed for a black family of six in Johannesburg was R195,77 and for a coloured family of five, R211,27. Figures for Pretoria are only minimally less.

Mr Schwarz said the rise in food prices was one of the biggest "calamities" to hit South Africa for a long time. The increases in the past few months had been "outrageous" he said, "and I'm not satisfied the increases are due entirely to higher costs.

"The Government is neglecting this vital area and doing too little to keep prices at a reasonable level."

A serious feature of ever-rising food prices was their socially destabilising effect, Mr Schwarz said.

"Action is necessary, not only because of the morality of pricing food out of the reach of many thousands of families, but also because of the dangers to the country's security," Mr Schwarz said.

The vice-president of the Trade Union Council of South Africa, Mr Steve Scheepers, said Tucsa had repeatedly asked the Government to remove GST from basic food.

"However, the Minister of Finance has told us that administratively it would be too difficult to exclude some products from the tax."

ARMSCOR CHAIRMAN SAYS ARMS EMBARGO NEGATED

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 13 Nov 80 p 2

[Text]

PLANNING by Russia, its satellites and the Africa Bloc at the United Nations against South Africa would have to assume a completely new dimension. This is because the Republic had succeeded in blunting the UN's compulsory arms embargo and was on the way to becoming a net exporter of arms, the chairman of Armscor, Commandant Piet Marais, said in Pretoria yesterday.

Addressing the Pretoria Press Club, Cmdt. Marais said the aims of the UN Security Council arms embargo in November, almost exactly three years ago, had been to make south Africa a "soft" military target and to test the effectiveness of sanctions.

South Africa had been forced to meet the challenge of sanctions and to neutralise it.

There had been the need, in any case, to strengthen South Africa's military capability. However, South Africa had also had to "lick" sanctions, because, if the arms embargo had succeeded, other sanctions would have followed.

The extent to which South Africa had succeeded in meeting the arms embargo challenge had been illustrated at the UN recently, Cmdt Marais said, when Britain had rejected out of hand all of about 30 new sanctions proposals against the Republic and France and the United States had also rejected numbers of them.

Cmdt Marais said strategic studies institutes in London and in the United States had also made it clear South Africa was now completely independent regarding arms supplies in terms of the sort of warfare it might face. They were going further and saying tht the Republic could now export arms.

Recognition

This amounted to international recognition that South Africa had succeed in frustrating the first aim of those powers seeking its downfall.

Planning against South Africa would now have to assume a completely new dimension and move away from the theory that terrorist movements could take over as had happened in Zimbabwe.

International propaganda against South Africa had also started to change in the light of the country's successful negation of the arms embargo, the Armscor chairman said.

AFRICA COOPERATIVE ACTION TRUST HOLDS CONFERENCE

Minister on Agricultural Production

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 13 Nov 80 p 12

[Text]

DURBAN. — It had become crucially important to the entire population that agricultural production in the Black national states should be increased to give these valuable agricultural areas their rightful place in feeding the total population and providing enough food for export, the Deputy Minister of Development, Mr J J G Wentzel, said in Durban yesterday.

South Africa was already in an unfavourable position compared with other African and developing countries as far as arable land was concerned, Mr Wentzel told the conference of the Africa Co-operative Action Trust.

While it was generally accepted that 0,4 ha of arable land per head of the population was needed to feed a country, South Africa would have only 0,32 ha per head by the year 2000.

Seventy-six percent of the territory in the Black national states was in areas with rainfall exceeding 500 mm a year and 33 percent of arable land in these states was classified as having high potential.

"Yet the production in these areas is only one-sixth to one-seventh of that on comparable land in the rest of South Africa," Mr Wentzel added. "Most of the national states are not self-sufficient in food production."

KwaZulu was in a desperate position.

It had been estimated that KwaZulu had the potential to feed 16-million people, but it was unable to feed the three-million Zulus living in the region and, even worse, had to rely on imported food.

"There are many reasons why regions like KwaZulu have thus far not been able to live up to their agricultural potential. Among these are a lack of motivation in the farming community and the tendency for its residents to seek work in White areas, especially in the industrial sector where they feel they have a better chance of attaining prosperity and security."

The agricultural situation in Southern Africa as a whole was such that Lesotho, Botswana, Swaziland, Angola, Mozambique, Zambia, Zaire and Malawi were nett importers of food, the Deputy Minister said, adding: "There is much uncertainty about the agricultural future of Zimbabwe."

Looking at the situation in the sub-continent realistically, it was clear that South Africa — including the Black national states — would have to play an increasingly important role, not only because of agricultural resources, but also because of potential human resources.

South Africa was the only country in Africa exporting on an extensive scale and still in a position to raise production, as it had done by 30 percent in the decade from 1970 to 1980.

It was also one of seven countries in the world which was a nett importer of food.

The Republic also exported agricultural know-how and many African countries had already made use of the wide range of facilities the country offered.

It was futile simply to say that African countries had to raise their food production or that it was sufficient to give them technological aid. What was needed was an effort to identify the basis for and the methods of co-operation, Mr Wentzel said.

"Africa can no longer rely as heavily as in the past on the industrialised countries of the world to solve its problem of low food production, starvation and malnutrition.

"The agricultural problems of the continent are complex and extensive, but if the will exists and political differences can be neutralised, they are problems which can, and must, be solved by the peoples and governments of Africa themselves." — Sapa.

Southern Africa Common Market

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 13 Nov 80 p 12

[Text]

DURBAN. — The establishment of a Common Market for Southern Africa, which could be accommodated in the Prime Minister's concept of a constellation of states, was suggested yesterday by the Deputy Minister of Development, Mr Wentzel.

Mr Wentzel told the conference of the Africa Co-operative Action Trust that, as in the case of the European Common Market, agriculture would play a crucial role in establishing and maintaining a constellation of states.

It would have to form a structure by which the different states would be linked so that all the participants could benefit from agricultural development in Southern Africa.

Development planning in a regional context would require specific forms of consultation and joint decision-making between authorities in South Africa and similar authorities in the Black national states on the nature of certain agricultural programmes.

"My Government's desire is to embark on a broad strategy of support for small businesses to accommodate the highest human input possible," Mr Wentzel said.

"You will agree that the small farmer will fit in very favourably in such a broad strategy."

A strategy of this nature had been discussed with the Black national states last month at a meeting under the chairmanship of the Minister of Co-operation and Development, Dr Piet Koornhof.

He did not want to take the matter any further, Mr Wentzel said, except to add that the discussions had been "very fruitful."

Noting that the food situation in several Southern African countries had become critical, the Deputy Minister said there were serious food shortages and production was dwindling in Mozambique, Angola, Zambia and Zaire.

"These countries have many agricultural problems in common with the rest of the continent, but the political situation rules co-operation on the agricultural level out completely."

An organisation like the Africa Co-operative Action Trust could play a meaningful role, particularly with the support of private enterprise.

"The barriers that have been put up artificially by politicians do not exist for organisations like ACAT and the private sector," Mr Wentzel added. — Sapa.

Kwazulu Land Bank Proposal

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 13 Nov 80 p 12

[Text] DURBAN. — The creation of a peasant land bank was an urgent necessity, KwaZulu's Minister of the Interior, Dr Frank Mdlalose, said yesterday.

Dr Mdlalose told the symposium on rural development that the free enterprise system, to which KwaZulu was committed, could not meet the challenge of benefitting the peasant economy.

"The KwaZulu government has given thought to the idea that it may be more important to develop a sustainable rural development system based on positive land use, rather than to invest heavily in expensive additional manufacturing industries and the creation of new urban areas in rural KwaZulu.

"One of the most urgent needs of our day, besides the efforts of organisations like ACAT, is a peasant land bank.

"The free enterprise system cannot meet the challenge of benefitting the peasant economy. It will be increasingly under suspicion and will eventually be cast into disrepute.

"We need to solve the problem of making investments in the peasant economies profitable both for the investor and for the peasants."

Dr Mdlalose said that free enterprise would have to convince people in rural areas that it would benefit them if there was to be any chance of its surviving.

One of the best ways of making the system endure was to move the focus of development from urban areas to rural KwaZulu.

"If not, you must not blame the Zulu people if they abhor the free enterprise system."

The Deputy Minister of Co-operation and Development, Mr J J G Wentzel, told the symposium that there could be no solution to the food problems of Africa unless the rural farmer wielded effective buying power.

"This should lead to a chain reaction expressing itself as a stimulus for the manufacturing industries in urban areas as well."

Mr Wentzel said that rural development now taking place in KwaZulu could lead to the formation of co-operatives to whom money could be loaned by development agencies, and eventually to the formation of a specialised financing body like the Land and Agricultural Bank of South Africa. — Sapa.

MINISTER ANNOUNCES COMPULSORY BLACK EDUCATION

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 11 Nov 80 pp 1, 2

[Article by Jaap Theron]

[Text]

COMPULSORY education for Black pupils is to be introduced on January 1.

In what is seen as a major step towards equal education opportunities for all population groups, Dr Ferdi Hartzenberg, Minister of Education and Training, said in a statement yesterday that sub-standard A pupils from the Pretoria townships Mamelodi, Atteridgeville and Saulsville would be the first to start with compulsory education next year.

I understand Dr Hartzenberg is also discussing the introduction of compulsory education with school committees from Krugersdorp and Potchefstroom and later this week with committees from Soweto with a view to extending it to these areas.

Apparently it is the intention of the Government to conclude similar discussions with school committees in all four provinces before the end of the year in order to give the benefits of compulsory education — on the same level as White, Coloured and Indian pupils — to as many Black pupils as possible as soon as possible.

Compulsory education for Black pupils will start on sub-standard A level and will then automatically and on a differentiated basis from area to area be carried on to the next standard each year.

Dr Hartzenberg said in his statement the school committees of the three Pretoria townships had accepted — and were prepared to adhere to the responsibilities such a step would impose on them.

Further details of the programme of compulsory education would be furnished in due course.

I understand that among other responsibilities, the school committees have accepted that parents, under the compulsory education system, could be prosecuted if their children stayed away from school or if they boycotted classes.

Dr Hartzenberg said in an accompanying clarification that it has for a long time been the goal of the Government to provide equal education for all population groups.

The standard of education was laid down by his department and was identical to the standards laid down by other education departments.

But the quality of education was determined mainly by what happened in the classroom.

Several steps had been implemented to improve the quality of teaching. And the time had been reached where the Senior Certificate could become the only entrance qualification at certain training colleges.

In-service training programmes for teachers were proceeding, while the upgrading of initial education was gaining momentum.

The new Education and Training Act had become effective on January 1, this year; and had created opportunities for planning education in its totality, he said.

These positive steps had enabled his department to announce the introduction of compulsory education at the first schools at this stage. But, Dr Hartzenberg said his department's general development programmes had been seriously retarded in certain areas as a result of unrest at schools.

HORWOOD: GOVERNMENT SPENDING TO BE HELD IN CHECK

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 14 Nov 80 p 8

[Text]

THE current economic upswing should continue well into 1981 says the Finance Minister Owen Horwood.

Delivering the keynote address at the Financial Mail's 1980-conference yesterday he forecast that the economy will inevitably reach an upper turning point, which will be followed by a temporary downswing or a levelling off.

But this, he does not believe, is cause for concern, and said that, happily the problems South Africa faces at the moment are the problems of prosperity. After all, as Senator Horwood said yesterday: "The indications are that the subsequent new upswing will probably take the economy to new record highs".

The Minister made a series of forecasts at the investment conference. He believes the rate of increase of real gross domestic product could be relatively high again next year, although probably lower than the abnormally high rate experienced this year.

He said: "This would be the case even if the upswing continued throughout 1981. The reason is that in 1981 the growth will take place from a much higher base than in 1980, and in an economy in which virtually all the surplus capacity will have been absorbed."

He predicts that at present a rate of growth of around 5 to 6 percent is indicated for 1981 which would represent "an excellent performance".

On the rate of increase of real private consumption, he expects a slowdown to five to six percent next year compared with the seven percent recorded this year. But this too will be a "most satisfactory outcome".

He sees the most crucial variable is Government consumption spending. "If it were to rise at an excessive rate, the inflationary consequences could be serious." But the Minister intends to maintain a tight rein over Government consumption spending. "If it were to rise at an excessive rate, the inflationary consequences could be serious." But the Minister intends to maintain a tight rein over Government spending, he warned again yesterday.

BLACK LAWYERS MEETING--Homeland governments' attitude towards black attorneys was attacked at the Black Lawyers' Association's (BLA) general meeting in Pretoria, yesterday. The meeting was attended by lawyers from many parts of the Transvaal. The Press was not admitted but a statement was released later. This strongly condemned Bophutha-Tswana government for restricting a member Mr George Maluleke from entering Bophutha-Tswana without a visa or written permit. Mr Maluleke's exemptions under the Bophutha-Tswana Aliens and Travellers Act were withdrawn by Mr G Mekodi, Minister of Internal Affairs in August. The cancellation followed Mr Maluleke's criticism of President Mangope during the recent Nafcoc 16th annual conference held at Sun City. [Excerpts] [Johannesburg POST in English 27 Oct 80 p 3]

BLACK CITIZENSHIP, PROPERTY OWNERSHIP--Blacks should be made citizens of South Africa and should be allowed to own property, the President of NAF-COC, Mr Sam Motsuenyane said in Johannesburg today. Speaking at the annual ASSOCOM meeting, following the passing of a motion to involve all population groups in private enterprise, Mr Motsuenyane said that he did not see how blacks could feel happy about nation-building "in a country where they don't belong." "How can you make anyone a capitalist without ownership of property?" he asked. "This congress and the business community must press for citizenship and ownership of property of all the people in South Africa. The motion put forward by the Pretoria Chamber of Commerce said that the success of the Prime Minister's economic policy would largely depend "on the extent to which the rights of economic opportunity and property are given to all population groups to give them a stake in the free enterprise system." ROBBEN ISLAND PRISONER RELEASE--A Robben Island prisoner, Decon Mathe (22), one of the nine Atterdigeville men convicted this year on charges under terrorism act, was yesterday set free by an appeal court. The Transvaal Supreme Court in Pretoria yesterday set aside both Mathe's conviction and sentence while confirming conviction and sentence of the other eight men. Those still to serve their sentences at the Island are: Thamsanqa Gerald Mkhwanazi (38), a POST reporter, Sermiah Kgokong Majatladi (23), Ronald Mamoepa (19), Lebogang Christie Mokone (18), Petrus Senabe (22), Andrew Moeti Phala (18), Cornelius Leeu (18), and a 17-year-old youth. Mkhwanazi and Mjatladi were each sentenced to seven years imprisonment while the others, including Mathe were sentenced to five years imprisonment each at the Pretoria Regional court. GRENADE ATTACK IN SOWETO--Three people were wounded when two handgrenades were hurled at the West Rand Administration Board offices in Soweto, police said yesterday. Windows were shattered and the verandah of the building was damaged in the blasts. Last night Brigadier J J Hamman, Divisional Commissioner of Police for Soweto, said the grenades were foreign-made and that police believed the incident was a terror attack involving at least two people. The grenades were thrown from near the security fence around the Wrab offices in Diepkloof Zone 1 about 9:30 pm on Wednesday. Police were investigating the possibility that the attack was linked to the general rent rise in the surrounding Diepmeadow area from November. CISKEI STUDENTS ARREST--Zwelitsha--Ten members of the Council of South African Students were detained by the Ciskei government at the weekend after they had attended the funeral of a former Robben Island prisoner, the secretary of the Ciskei Intelligence Services, Brigadier Charles Sebe said yesterday. In an interview with reporters in Zwelitsha, he said prior to the detention of the students he had met with the organisers of the funeral, who were former members of the banned African National Congress. "One of the matters discussed was that it had come to the notice of my office that at some funerals the ANC was utilising schoolchildren to dominate such funerals. "This is against the norms and traditions of the Black people, and has never been done in this country. In this process, where the ANC utilise the schoolchildren, the aims and objectives of the ANC are highlighted," Birg Sebe said. He said the action was regrettable because the ANC had been banned and would not be allowed to continue with its activities in the Ciskei. [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 5 Nov 80]

EXCISION FROM LEBOWA TERRITORY--The Chief Minister of Lebowa, Dr C N Phatudi, will make an urgent call to the Minister of Co-operation and Development, Dr Piet Koornhof, to meet the people of Moutse in Dennilton over the decision to excise Moutse from Lebowa territory. The proclamation of the excision, published in the Government Gazette of October 24, says Moutse will be administered by the central government as from November 1. At a meeting in Moutse yesterday, where Dr Koornhof had been expected, Dr Phatudi told a gathering of about 5,000 that Dr Koornhof had told him he was unable to attend but would arrange a meeting on another day. On October 23, the people of Moutse were told by the Deputy Minister of Development, Mr J J G Wentzel, that Moutse would be handed to the Kwa Ndebele homeland and they had to choose between falling under Kwa Ndebele and moving to the areas of Lunnysloot and Emmerton in Lebowa territory. QWAQWA VIEWS ON INDEPENDENCE--The Qwa Qwa Government under its present leadership does not intend taking Pretoria-style independence. Two Cabinet Ministers of the Basotho national state made this clear at a public meeting in Atteridgeville, Pretoria, yesterday. The stand was endorsed and applauded by scores of the ruling Likoankoetla Party supporters present. "Qwa Qwa will never take independence because we will not be deceived by promises from the South African Government," said Mr S K Marumo, Qwa Qwa Minister of Works. Earlier Mr S C R Yamabolu, Minister of Interior, had told a highly responsive audience: "Pretoria-style independence is out for Qwa Qwa while Likoankoetla are in control. Freedom is still very far for us." He said the State might consider taking independence if the United Nations was involved in the negotiations. TEACHERS' DEMANDS--The new Minister of National Education, Dr Gerrit Viljoen, yesterday promised the country's 50,000 White teachers he would make a statement "in the immediate future" on interim salary adjustments. At the same time the Minister was told by the teachers' representatives at a meeting in Pretoria the teachers did not want the Commission for Administration (formerly the Public Service Commission) to handle their case. They were demanding, instead, direct access to the Cabinet in negotiation and moves to put an end to the rapidly escalating crisis in the country's education system. LOANS TO SUGAR FARMERS--Durban--Natal and Zululand sugar cane farmers, who suffered crippling drought conditions earlier this year, will receive Land Bank loans this week. An official of the South African Sugar Association said about 400 farmers would receive loans. Some of the first to receive the loans will be from the Heitonville district, Zululand, an area which has been devastated by drought for about three years. He said some applications for loans had been turned down. This had applied to some Indian farmers who were farming less than the 8 ha considered by the Land Bank to be economical. The association was to take up their cause again with the Land Bank. Rain was still badly needed in the cane belt in Natal and Zululand. Some new cane which had been planted was looking particularly weak because of the lack of rain. He said that the loans received this week would be particularly helpful in that farmers could now plan the new planting season. [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 11 Nov 80 p 8]

SA AS LENDER--Nedbank's chief executive Rob Abrahamsen has called for South Africa to become a lender in the international markets. Speaking yesterday Mr Abrahamsen strongly advocated that the country should move into the markets where to date it has been solely a borrower. After all, he said, the banking system in South Africa is sophisticated enough to handle such a move and this would simply be a natural extension of the present situation where South Africa is operating in international lending markets via trade finance. Such a procedure would obviously please the bank by giving them an outlet for funds they cannot lend at home, even to local multinational subsidiaries. COOPERATION WITH BOLIVIA--La Paz--The South African and Israeli ambassadors met top Bolivian officials yesterday to express their countries 'support for continuing economic cooperation with the military government of General Luis Garcia Meza. Israeli Ambassador Mr Shlomo Levy med the Education Minister colonel Arial Coca in La Paz to offer economic support for rural education and training programmes. South Africa's ambassador to Bolivia, Mr Oswald Albers, who is based in Buenos Aires, met Gen Garcia Meza. He expressed his government's desire to extend technical assistance programmes in the areas of mining and agriculture. Government officials said earlier South Africa was one of their best providers of outside technical assistance. Economic aid from the United States and many other Western countries was cut back after July 17 military takeover which brought Gen Garcia Meza to power.--Sapa-AP. BOTLOKWA DISPLACED PERSONS--Displaced people of HaMakgato in the Botlokwa area near Pietersburg have decided to go back to their old homes from which they were evicted during the forced removals in the area last year. More than one hundred families have already returned in a move seen as a challenge to the authorities who have threatened to prosecute them if they did so. The decision to return was taken during the recent long weekend and followed a year of squatting in other peoples' homes under appalling circumstances. Several memos have been sent to the government over the wretched accommodation and pleas made for permission to go back to the Makgato area, spokesmen for the families told POST. The government replied that it was discussing the matter with Lebowa authorities--but refused to give further details and ignored subsequent memos. During last year's resistance to removals, the then Chief Commissioner for Northern Transvaal, Mr J Pieterse warned that people who tried to re-settle would be prosecuted. But a member of the families' committee, Mr Elias Rammabi, said yesterday he hoped the government would not do that. Mr Rammabi also referred to Dr Koornhof's recent promise to spare the other Botlokwa clans from removal. "If they are no longer going to be moved, why us?" he asked. NEW ARMY RATIONS PACK--The South African Defence Force has paid heed to the grumblings of the troops and a new 24-hour ration pack--guaranteed to please even the fussiest soldier--has been designed for use in the operational area. The SADF is well aware of Napoleon's maxim that a army marches on its stomach and complaints over the lack of variety in the "ratpacks" and the condition of the food was investigated and the results was a brand new pack. The improvements to the new "ratpack" include: --Different colour codes on the sides of the packs to indicate the various ration combinations; --A civilian company has taken over the packaging from national servicemen and exercises much stricter quality control; --Less water is needed to prepare the contents of the new pack; --The new pack contains a greater variety of food; --The lifespan of the contents is much greater; --The contents are packed more securely and are waterproofed. Each pack is date-stamped to ensure troops do not receive old food parcels. The new packs are diet-balanced and one will meet the needs of an active soldier for 24 hours. The new packs include a variety of tinned food, biscuits, cheese, milk, tea, coffee, sweets, condensed milk, breakfast cereal, sugar, drief fruits, matches and even chewing gum. INCREASE IN SHIPPING RATES--Freight rates will be increased by an average of 14 percent from January 1. The Europe/South and South-East Africa Conference says the increase have been approved by the South African Government and will apply to northbound and southbound freight. The lines said that "as customary", they would shortly be in touch with the main exporters of cargo "in regard to the renegotiation of commodity contracts which account for at least 80 percent of South Africa's exports to Europe". The increase had been caused by "inter alia, the ever-rising cargo, container and ship operating costs". Over the past 12 months the lines had had to contend with a 14.08 percent inflation rate calculated in accordance with Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development statistics. These took into account inflation weighted proportionately to the currencies in which the lines incurred their costs. "It does not, however, take into account bunkers or currency fluctuations for which provision is made separately by means of BAF and CAF. "The lines' costs over the past 12 months have increased by something over 12 percent. Included in the increased ship's costs is a contribution to cover the ever-increasing costs of replacing the fleet, a vital factor if continuity and reliability of service is to be guaranteed over the years."--Sapa. DIESEL ENGINE PROJECT BENEFITS--Cape Town--South Africa can no longer afford to be dependent on foreign countries for the supply of such a vital vehicle components as engines. Dr Schalk van der Merwe, chairman of the Economic Committee of the President's Council, yesterday told the annual congress of the Motor Industries Federation, that the Atlantis diesel engine project, which had partly originated from the country's isolated position in the world, had produced really impressive major benefits for South Africa. There were, for instance, foreign exchange savings of the order of R260-million a year, he said. The most important, possibly, was a reduction of the present variety of more than 200 different diesel engines to 11 models. [Excerpt] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 6 Nov 80 p 8]

KING EMPHASIZES IMPORTANCE OF TRADITION, CULTURE

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 5 Nov 80 p 1

[Text] HIS MAJESTY King Sobhuza II has once again strongly deplored the decline in culture, tradition and respect within the country.

Addressing a crowd of about 3,000 people who flocked to the Lobamba Royal Kraal yesterday afternoon, the King restated his personal observation of what he called the destiny or direction of the country and its people.

His Majesty's first and foremost criticism was that of the loss of respect amongst the citizens of the country. He noted that everyone is being thrown into confusion due to irrespect. Respect, he said, makes the country a good country in the same way that lawfulness does.

In the latter's respect he appealed to the nation as a whole to adopt an orderly and dignified way of living and in elaboration of this statement he said that each and everyone should learn to accept what he or she is offered and not to privilege themselves.

Coming to the question of culture, the King stressed the importance of this aspect because, as he said, the loss of culture means the loss of the nation to foreign influence. "If one takes such places like Johannesburg, for instance, and carefully studies it, one is immediately faced with the reality that there is no form of tradition or culture whatsoever."

In emphasis to the loss of respect and traditions in the country, His Majesty stated that the young Swazi generation is being subjected to this situation not because they disrespect their parents but because they are not getting the proper form of advise and teachings from the parents.

"As a result, they are at a loss of which way to take," he said.

Another aspect which His Majesty mentioned was that of the failure of proper administration by the community Chiefs. He pointed out that on many occasions he has had the misfortune of learning that some Chiefs do not know their own subjects or that they hide people with no good references in their communities.

He therefore reminded all those concerned that the system of "Kukhonta" is done through the King of a country, namely, himself, so that in case of emergencies the local authorities of that community will be able to bring the matter before him.

"However, the Chiefs tend to come to me only when they have realised that the subjects they have been hiding under their wing are a menace to them," King Sobhuza said.

It was for this reason therefore that His Majesty declared that from now on legislative laws will operate forcefully and effectively to everyone.

He gave an example of people refusing to move from any place they had been put, and said that forceful eviction will be adopted. He attributed the failure of chiefs in reporting matters regarding their subjects to corruption.

An important point which His Majesty also made was that of excessive drinking in the country. He reflected that last year people complained about the rate of drinking in the Kingdom and said that it is destroying the country's image.

He went on to say that Parliament was called to look into this matter. One aspect which he pointed out in regard to liquor was that of drinking and driving. Drinking, he emphatically stressed, does not correspond with the latter. This is why, he said, in countries like England drinking hours are limited. He stated that drinkers in Swaziland, where any time is drinking time, should not be allowed into their cars after drinking.

He also recalled his predicament when, recently, he was involved in an accident which almost had fatal results. Apparently, one drunk driver collided with the limousine in which the King was being driven.

"All because of liquor," said the King.

DINNER HELD FOR CHINESE INDUSTRIAL MISSION

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 13 Nov 80 p 5

[Text]

IN HER bid for industrial development especially decentralisation of industry in the country, Swaziland needs the active co-operation and participation of such countries as the Republic of China. So says the Minister of Industry, Mines and Tourism, Prince Nqaba.

Speaking at a dinner session in honour of the Chinese Industrial Mission at the Swazi Inn Prince Nqaba said that Swaziland regards the Republic of China as her partner in development.

Addressing top dignitaries who attended this occasion, the Minister pointed out that the Chinese Mission's visit could not have been more timely. The problem of industrial development is a two-fold challenge, he said.

"First it is to increase industrial production so that we as a country can earn more, and so that more and more of our people particularly those who are in the rural sector may have greater employment opportunities. Second so that we may gain access to the world's wider market."

Prince Nqaba went on to encourage the Mission to make whatever investments they felt necessary in the Kingdom.

"You have seen that there is room for further investment by your people in such areas as mining, electronics, raw materials processing, ceramics and other forms of macro-industry", he said.

He then expressed his hope that the Mission's visit will be followed by concrete measures because, as he said, our people have yearned for prosperity for much too long and that the sooner we jointly bring the day of prosperity nearer, the better for us all.

Swaziland, he continued, feels encouraged to see that the Republic of China believes, like us, that actions speak much louder than words.

However, the unfortunate thing, Prince Nqaba said, is that very few investors ever accept the need to plough back some of their profits into the country's further development.

"For indeed development of a country is meaningless if it does not mean the development of the people-especially the rural masses."

The second unfortunate aspect, he continued, is that the fruits of development and the incentives to development tend to go to those who are comparatively better off and not those who are in the lowest rung of development.

FINANCIAL ASSETS, PAYMENTS FIGURES FOR SEPTEMBER GIVEN

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 13 Nov 80 p 7

[Text]

SWAZILAND'S net foreign assets decreased E6.7 million to E122.5 million during September, but were E21.9 million higher than the same month last year. During the month, export receipts were boosted by a E5 million seasonal payment for sugar exports, but this was offset by major import payments of about E14 million.

Government creditor position with the banking sector still remains strong. The deposits during the month increased E1.8 million to E69.2 million. This however, may not reflect that Government was in a budgetory surplus, but expenditure may have more than offset increased inflows of domestic revenue.

Bank lending to the private sector increased E11.1 million to E107.4 million during September. Of the increase in bank lending, E7.1 million was towards the sugar industry.

Borrowing by banks from the Central Bank declined E2.0 million in September.

During September money supply increased E1.6 million to E63.2 million a level representing 27.7 percent increase from a year ago.

Savings deposits stood at E20.3 million at the end of the month, an increase of E3.3 million from September last year. Time deposits increased E3.0 million during the month, but were E1.2 million lower than last September.

While banks loans and advances increased by E11.1 million deposits rose by E4.3 million. This resulted in a squeeze on liquidity, which is reflected by a E14.9 million fall in liquidity during the monmth under review. Due to the expected rise in the demand for loans and advances and a slower rate of increase in deposits in the next few months, the tight liquidity position may prevail up to the first quarter of 1981.

RURAL WATER SUPPLY OBJECTIVES STATED

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 14 Nov 80 p 1

[Text]

ABOUT 25 percent of Swaziland's rural population may be provided with water supply services by 1983, the Kingdom's Permanent Representative to the United Nations, Mr. Norman Malinga has said in New York.

Addressing the inauguration of the International Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation 1981-1990 decade in New York recently, Mr. Malinga said government's target was to extend water supply to 80 percent to the urban population by 1983.

He said government's intention here is to provide water supply services to 25 percent of the rural population by 1983 so that by the end of the decade almost all of Swaziland population will have access to clean water.

During this decade member states of the United Nations will assume a commitment to bring about a substantial improvement in standards and levels of services in drinking water supply - and sanitation by 1990.

Mr. Malinga said Swaziland was committed to implementing the goals of the water decade, but pointed out that as a developing country this Kingdom was faced with the problem of lack of qualified staff.

The Kingdom, he said, was also faced with the problems of lack of heavy cost of capital improvement such as installation of sanitary equipment and pipes.

He appealed to the international community to assist Swaziland financially in order to advance the training of much needed water technicians and to advance the standard of present technical staff.

Mr. Malinga said various government agencies were committed to making clean water available in both the rural and urban centres. The Swaziland Water and Sewerage Board, he said, was providing 60 percent of the urban population with water which met the required standard of the World Health Organisation.

ENERGY MASTER PLAN TO BE PREPARED

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 13 Nov 80 p 2

[Text]

THE MINISTRY for Commerce, Industry, Mines and Tourism has announced that an energy master plan was being developed for the Swaziland government.

The project is being financed by the West Germany Technical Aid Organisation, Kreditanstalt fur Wiederaufbau. The consultants selected to carry out nation-wide energy studies and to formulate the energy master plan are Fichtner Consulting Engineers of the Federal Republic of Germany.

The objective of the energy plan according to the Ministry's statement is to review the natural energy resource base of Swaziland and to make recommendations to reduce the country's dependence on external energy supplies.

Over the next six weeks, the consultants will be collecting all available information about the import and usage of all forms of energy.

Using this information the consultants will make use of a computer modelling technique that is able to simulate various energy and economic scenaries.

The computer can also evaluate their effect on the country's energy supply and utilization patterns within Swaziland to the end of the century based on economic parameters as well as an imposed governmental or technoligical constraints.

The final draft report is expected to be submitted by June next year. The public and government departments are requested to give support to this project by providing all the information and data required by the consultants in the course of their studies.

NSIBANDZE DISCUSSES ISSUE OF WORKERS IN SOUTH AFRICA

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 27 Oct 80 p 3

[Article by Chris Freimond]

[Text] THE possibility that South African mining houses might, at some time in the future, reduce their recruitment of labour in neighbouring black states, prompted the formation of a commission to investigate alternative employment opportunities within the states.

This was explained by the deputy Prime Minister of Swaziland, Senator Ben Nsibandze, in an interview with the Rand Daily Mail.

Representatives of Swaziland, Zambia, Zimbabwe, Mozambique, Botswana, Angola and Lesotho met in Mbabane earlier this month to discuss common problems related to migrant labourers working in South Africa.

The countries — excluding Zambia which prohibits labour migration to the Republic — supply more than 250 000 workers a year to South Africa who generate at least R50-million in deferred payments and family remittances sent home.

Shortly after the Mbabane conference, Zambian Labour Minister Mr Josa[illegible] [illegible]una was reported to have said the states wanted to end the migrant labour system altogether.

Sen Nsibandze said he believed the Zambian Minister had been misquoted.

"There was probably a misunderstanding. The commission will look at alternative job opportunities for our peoples within our own countries in case employment for our workers in South Africa is reduced or ended at a future date," he said.

Six of the seven states were heavily dependent on jobs in the Republic to help curb serious unemployment problems at home. There was no question of cutting off such a valuable source of work and income, he said.

Migrants whose contracts were not renewed or who no longer wanted to work in South Africa, had to trained and absorbed into the local work force, and this would be also considered by the commission, he said.

It would also aim for the co-ordination of recruiting procedures in the different states, he said, as at present various regulations and practices applied which, it was hoped, would be standardised for the benefit of the migrant workers.

One of Swaziland's most serious unemployment problems was 5 000-6 000 school leavers flooding the job market each year, and in many cases, young men with fairly good educations, had to accept jobs as miners in South Africa because no other work was available.

Women school leavers, who could not go the the Republic as migrant workers, were even worse off, Sen Nsibandze said.

Reliable sources said that the journalist, Boris Rudenovitch Assoian, of NEW TIMES magazine, sent a request from Salisbury asking for a visa last week. It was reported later that this request had been granted by government here. Mr. Assoian wishes to enter Swaziland from Maputo, where he spent the weekend. No other details about the group, or the reason for their visit, were available at the time of going to Press. [Text] [Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 5 Nov 80 p 1]

LESOTHO RED CROSS DELEGATION--The Lesotho Red Cross society Administration team, which arrived in the country on Monday were today scheduled to leave Swaziland to go back to Lesotho. The team is led by the Secretary General of the Lesotho Red Cross Society, Mr. G. L. Mosala. In a Press briefing at the Baphalali Red Cross Society headquarters at Mbabane, Mr. Mosala said that the purpose of their visit to Swaziland was to accord themselves with the southern Africa visit exchange programme, whose members include Botswana, Malawi, Lesotho, Tanzania, Swaziland, Zambia, Angola, Zimbabwe. The aim of this exchange programme is for members of the eight countries to familiarise themselves with projects being undertaken by each member state for their development programme. Lesotho has also got four divisions. However, their system of meeting the nation's needs differs vastly from those used in Swaziland in that instead of mobile clinics being operated all over the country theirs are solid concrete structures built in various parts of the country. In Swaziland the mobile clinics offer free medical services to the people but in Lesotho clinics are run on the same basis as the Swaziland government clinics, which means their patients have to pay to be treated. However, this system is completely independent of the government. [Excerpts] [Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 31 Oct 80 p 2]

The mill is designed to process imported maize and produce the whole range of maize products for the Swaziland market. At present, mealie rice and samp are imported ready packaged at prices dictated by the exporter. A spokesman at NIDCS said that maize growing projects are in view, and it will be an encouraging factor that the means to process are already established. 'HANDS OFF' WARNING ISSUED TO OTHER COUNTRIES

Kampala UGANDA TIMES in English 6 Nov 80 p 8

[Text]

UGANDA has warned Kenya and the Sudan to keep their hands off her internal affairs.

In a statement issued in Kampala yesterday, the government said while Uganda welcomed dialogue among her neighbours and other countries in the region as a positive step towards regional understanding and cooperation, she did not accept that this should be achieved at the expense of some other states in the region.

Reacting to reports that the two countries had reiterated in a communique after talks in Nairobi that the only lasting solution to the Uganda situation was a free and fair election following the immediate and complete withdrawal of foreign troops from Ugandan territory, the statement said:

"This is not in the spirit of good neighbourliness. We also find it totally at variance with the known principles of independence and non interference in the internal affairs of states."

The communique appeared in the Kenyan press. And the government described it as a "complete surprise and totally unacceptable."

Uganda had repeatedly made clear to her neighbours, friends and the world at large its commitment to conduct free and fair general elections. But it was surprising that the neighbours had found it fit not only to doubt her good intentions but also to suggest that "We should conduct the affairs of this country in the manner they themselves wish us to.

"Uganda has never advised any of these countries on how to conduct their elections or for that matter any other business that falls purely within the domain of their jurisdiction.

"We have questioned for instance the presence of foreign troops in their countries and yet these same countries have conducted elections while these foreign troops are in their territory.

"As a matter of fact we would like to believe that some of these countries that have found it their business to advise us on the conduct of free and fair elections have themselves never conducted one and would be totally at a loss if they found one. We doubt moreover that they have ever believed in or recognised free and fair elections.

"For our part while we do appreciate the interest our neighbours and friends are taking in our forthcoming general elections we would have appreciated it more if this interest was positive and constructive.

"Uganda once more reiterates it to the whole world and her neighbours in particular that:-

- The only "foreign troops" that are on Ugandan territory are liberators from Tanzania and we do not regard them foreign as such; certainly not in the sense foreign troops are present in some of our neithbouring countries.
- These "troops" are here at the invitation of the government and the people of Uganda and they are perfectly welcome to stay as long as the government and people of Uganda feels the need for their presence.

- The exercise of conducting elections to which the government of Uganda is seriously committed has absolutely nothing to do with the presence of these "troops".
- The government and people of Uganda are determined to carry out a free and fair election and the only assistance they require from their friends and neighbours is that Uganda as an independent and sovereign nation should be a free and fair elections this exercise unhindered by outside inteference."

COURT ACTION REPORTED INSTITUTED ON MUSLIM SUPREME COUNCIL

Kampala WEEKLY TOPIC in English 31 Oct 80 pp 1, 12

[Text]

COURT action is being instituted to dislodge Sheikh Kassim Mulumba and his group from the Headquarters of the Uganda Muslim Supreme Council which they are "occupying illegally".

This was disclosed at a Press Conference yesterday by Sheikh Kamulegeya, who was elected Chief Khadi following the recent UMSC convention at Makerere and other members of the UMSC Executive.

Newsmen at the Press Conference were shown copies of documents issued by the Registrar of Companies which name Sheikh Abdulzak Matovu as Mufti, Prince Badru Kakungulu as Chairman of UMSC, Sheikh Kamulegeya as Chief Khadi, and the other office bearers that were elected at the Makerere convention.

It was contended at the Press Conference that the officials listed in the official documents of the Registrar of Companies were duly elected in accordance with the constitution of the council, which is a legal body registered under the law of the land.

In a statement released to the newsmen, the Executive called upon all sundry to refrain from dealing with "Sheikh Mulumba and his friends" as if they were leaders of the Uganda Muslim Supreme Council. It warned that anybody dealing with "illegal persons purporting to be acting on behalf of the Uganda Muslim Supreme Council" was doing so at his or her own risk.

The statement said that the properly elected officials of the Council were being barred from occupying the premises of the Council through the use of "organised thugery". It recalled that an ugly incident took place on September 26th, 1980 when thugs were organised to hurl stones at Muslim leaders who went to attend Juma prayers in the Old Kampala Mosque.

It added that in an attempt to avoid a repeat of such dirty incidents, the Executive had requested Government for protection for the muslim top officials before they can take up their offices at the UMSC Headquarters.

On allegation by Mulumba and his group that Prince Badru Kakungulu imposed himself as Interim Chairman of UMSC after the Liberation War, the Executive pointed out that Sheikh Mulumba was himself appointed Interim Chief Khadi by Prince Kakungulu as Chairman of the Council.

"Why did Mulumba accept the appointment if he knew that the person appointing him was just imposing himself", they argued.

MUSEVENI REPORTED URGING UGANDANS TO FIGHT 'FASCISM'

Kampala WEEKLY TOPIC in English 31 Oct 80 pp 1, 12

[Text] UPM's Interim Chairman Yoeri Museveni, who is also Vice Chairman of the Military Commission, has called upon Ugandans to unite and fight "primitive fascism" or be doomed to a worse calamity than that they faced under Idi Amin's murderous regime. He was speaking at a Press Conference he convened at the Movement's Headquarters in Kampala.

Replying to a reporter who pointed out that UPC's President, Dr. Milton Obote, had challenged his position as Vice-Chairman of the Military Commission, Museveni said: "I have no time for replying to what Obote says. Let him come and remove me".

Museveni told newsmen that the last few days had been "very sad days in the history of our country in which murder and terror had been unleashed on the people with savage cruelty.

The UPM had raised this problem at Military Commission, Cabinet, administrative and party levels and demanded remedial action to stop these wanton atrocities but the situation has only got worse, he said.

"With allegations of torture of innocent Ugandans, with mass bodies being thrown on highways, senseless killings in Kampala and other parts of Uganda, and alleged killings in army barracks in exactly Amin style, the situation points to only one factor – the resurgence of primitive fascism," the UPM boss declared.

He warned that leaders and their agents who perpetrate heinous plans of murder in the hope of grabbing power were only sowing seeds of more blood for the future.

"Uganda needs leaders freely and fairly elected and not leaders that come or maintain themselves in power through intrigue, terrorism, bloodshed or even sham elections", he stressed.

Saying that time would come when the criminals in the current murder designs would have to account for the lives of innocent Ugandans killed, Museveni contended that Ugandans participated and welcomed the liberation war not merely to install any particular leader or group of leaders but to bring an end to the killing of innocent Ugandans, regardless of their tribe, religion, or ethnic lineage.

"The Uganda Patriotic Movement, therefore, calls upon all Ugandans to forget their differences and unite to fight against resurgent fascism. We call upon political leaders to realise the seriousness of the situation and forge a common front against the primitive fascists".

Museveni disclosed at the Press Conference that UPM Executive had written an open letter to the Chairman of the Military Commission on the subject of security. Copies of the letter were released to the newsmen present.

Apart from cataloging several killings in various parts of the country and other incidents, the letter pointed out that it was the duty of the government to "provide security of person and property" in exchange of unqualified loyalty from the citizens.

"It is no use for the government to plead helplessness in the performance of this most primary task," the letter charged.

It added: "This continued wave of senseless destruction of life strikes at the very roots of the fundamental human rights that have been lacking in Uganda for the last ten years."

The letter urged that if the Government was incapable of providing security for the lives and property of Ugandans, then the people themselves should be given the right to organise their own security without fear of recrimination from any government quarter.

"Failure to do so," it said, "while the senseless murders continue, would be conclusive proof of Government's loss of legitimacy."

Copies of the letter were circulated to President Nyerere of Tanzania, President Moi of Kenya, the UN Secretary General, all accredited representatives, International Human Rights Organisation, all members of NCC, all political parties, and the mass media.

Asked if he thinks the Military Commission is capable of ending the present insecurity in the country, Museveni said the Commission had already taken steps to try and arrest the situation.

"I am convinced that the Military Commission has the ability to deal with the situation, otherwise I would not continue to be associated with it" he said.

And when a reporter pointed out that nothing was being done even when murders were committed in broad-day light, Museveni referred him to the committee set up by the Military Commission to investigate the current violence in the country. He said the Committee would probe all the incidents exhaustively and ascertain the facts.

MUWANGA STATEMENT: MC SETS UP PROBE COMMITTEE ON KILLINGS

Kampala WEEKLY TOPIC in English 31 Oct 80 p 12

[Text]

IN the wake of the current wave of violence in the country, chairman Paulo Muwanga has issued the following statement:-

It is with grave concern that I make this statement. The single most important relief the people of Uganda had on the fall of the Amin regime was and remains the hope that killings would end.

It is very sad indeed that our hopes that killings went with Amin have yet to be fully realised. Ugandans have continued to be killed since liberation. It is true that killings or "disappearances" of persons have been less than under Amin; but that is no comfort at all. The killing of one Ugandan is as painful as the killing of several or many.

Recently bodies of persons were found dumped along Kampala-Entebbe road. Other bodies were found only a few days ago on the Lugogo by-pass. The police have several reports of killings in and around Kampala. The situation is a lot better in the rest of the country.

The police reports on bodies of persons found dead in and around Kampala would indicate that there is a gang or gangs of killers in or around Kampala.

One aspect of the recent spate of killings in Kampala was discussed yesterday by the Military Commission. The Commission decided to appoint a Committee to investigate in depth whether or not the bodies found on the Kampala-Entebbe road were of persons who had been in custody - namely any jail or jails; army barracks or police cells. The Committee will also go into other aspects of this very sad event.

I have discussed this grave development - killings of Ugandans by Ugandans - with colleagues and senior officers in the security forces. New measures are being taken at once to meet the situation. Meanwhile, appeal to all who have any information on these killings to report to the police.

I do also appeal to all to report to the police without delay the presence in their areas of suspicious characters and persons in possession of arms or army uniforms.

DP PAPER CLAIMS PLOT REVEALED TO ASSASSINATE DP LEADERS

Kampala THE CITIZEN in English 3 Nov 80 pp 1, 6

[Text] A plot was unearthed that DP leaders from the Northern region were to be assassinated on November the 6th, 1980 by a UPC clique through manipulation of a certain section in the peoples militia in Kitgum district.

Reliable sources, said Tiberio Atwoma-Okeny DP Vice President General, while addressing a press conference at the DP Headquarters last week, had it that those on priority list included Okeny himself, Deputy Minister of Education Ambrose Okullu, and the Minister of Industry Dr. Obonyo. Later the same purge was to be extended to other DP leaders in other areas particularly West Nile.

He said he himself had so far escaped four attempts to finish his life. All were reported to the police but no steps to improve the situation were taken. He said that the attitude of government makes him suspect some people in government as the perpetrators, and therefore "it might be High time for the DP to design some self-protecting plans".

He cited the incidence of the 11/8/80. While at his home in Kitgum, three UPC youths were caught behind his house armed with arrows and bows with the intention of killing him. They were taken to police but nothing was done. On the second incident one UPC leader, Patrick Lutele, organised an ambush, stoned his car and a lorry when they were coming from a rally.

Okeny said that during his two hours is detention in the Militia barracks in Kitgum he saw one UPC leader Obol Lakal, a relative of the Militia Commander agitating the Militia against DP.

During the registration period, Okeny went on, while he was taking o'd women and the sick to register, he was badly treated and manhandled at the roadblock because they said he had to have a Police permit to go to the registration centre. Although, later the Police commander intervened and said, Okeny needed not have a permit, two UNLA soldiers forced their way into his vehicle and forced him to drive to the Militia barracks where he was badly beaten losing a tooth and breaking his glasses. On appeal to the Commander UNLA (Banya) no sympathy was shown. As he freed him he told him that he had recieved orders from above to watch him (Okeny) and other two DP cabinet Ministers in Kitgum while in the area.

How can there be fair elections under such a helpless situation, Okeny wondered.

In the same Press conference, the deputy Minister of Education Mr. Ambrose Okullu said the UPC leadership has no National motive and has decided to put out all what it has at hand to make the forthcoming General elections unfree and unfair. The UPC, Okullu went on insists on Multiboxes so that they can practice fraud in anyway they want. Registration officers at Padur in Kitgum were beaten up and imprisoned because they were not UPCs.

The Deputy Minister however contended that generally the Milltia in Kitgum was one of the best and he himself and Okeny were among those who organised it. The Militia are basically good men and did a good job in preventing cattle raiders, and guarding the country against outside incursions. But these people were left unattended to by the government and now UPC is misusing them.

On his personal life, Okullu said attempts have been made on his life several times while in Kitgum. One of the incidents, he said, occured on the 13/10/80 while he was at his home in Kitgum. His house was surrounded by armed Militia and their commander told Okullu that he (Okullu) was not allowed to be there, and that he had received orders from one of the Top Security personnel to deal seriously with DP politicians like him.

The Chairman of the Democratic Party, Mr. Boniface Byanyima said they have held a number of discussions with the Military Commission on the security situation but not much appear to have been done. He said that they have suggested to the Military Commission to replace all UNLA soldiers in Northern region by TPDF if the discipline among them cannot be applied and in order avoid revange.

Now that the security situation has tremendously deteriorated in the whole country, the chairman stressed, it is a matter of urgency that the UNLA soldiers be confined to barracks and be replaced by the TPDF or Tanzania Police. The curfew in Kampala must also be lifted to enable us to protect ourselves. He however noted that not all the UNLA is bad, but it is the clique within it comprising of former General Service Unit (GSU) State Research Centre and the UPC people.

The Secretary General of the DP. Wazarwahi Bwengye said, the intimidation seems to be government instigated as each UPC branch chairman especially in *Bu*shenyi moves around with body guards and guns and goes on intimidating people. In Kasese he said, Bazira, a UPC and former NSS director supplied guns to the Rwenzururus and agitated them to be against DP.

A DP National Executive member for Northern region Engineer Sam Drale, who was in Moyo at the time of registration when the fighting there erupted and escaped through Juba and Khartoum in Sudan, to Nairobi and back to Kampala with the assistance of the United Nations High Commission for refugees, told journalists that the DP leaders are very perturbed with the government for not telling the people and the world at large the truth on what is going on in West Nile especially Moyo.

Drale whose journey from Moyo took him more than fifteen days, said on arrival in Kampala, that he had met the Chairman of the Military Commission and appealed to him to restore order in West Nile but he said nothing seems to have been done as arson is still being carried out there.

Engineer Drale appealed to international aid agencies to rush massive humanitarian aid to the people of the area to enable them to rehabilitate themselves.

The DP Publicity Secretary Mr. Valeriano Assa Ovonji who was in Nebbi (South West Nile) when the confusion started told newsmen that the confusion was started by a clique of UPC in the UNLA to eliminate DP leaders and the people of the region. He said, it started by disarming those members of UNLA who were not pro-UPC.

He said, all Madi people who had settled in Nebbi district for a long time and over 600 muslims in the district were killed together with other DPs there. He told newsmen that he was hunted for four days and his vehicle, a benz, was looted adding that he remained in hiding for more than two weeks until the 20th October 1980 when he was smuggled out of the district in a boat. He said that the situation started going back to normal when the Tanzanian soldiers started reaching the area.

POLITICAL PARTIES APPEAL FOR SOLUTION TO VIOLENCE

DP: Send Troops Back

Kampala UGANDA TIMES in English 30 Oct 80 p 8

[Article by Willy Mukasa]

[Text]

THE Military Commission has been urged to take Ugandan soldiers back to the barracks and to replace them with the Tanzanian troops.

The call was made at a Press conference at the DP (Democratic Party) headquarters in Kampala yesterday by the Party's officials, who included the vice-president general, Tiberius Atwoma Okeny, the national chairman, Mr B. Byanyima, the national general secretary, J. Bwengye Mr Sam Drale and Mr V. A. Ovonji, the publicity secretary.

The officials said despite the several appeals to the Military Commission to take steps and improve the security situation in Uganda, intimidations, harassment and killings of innocent people, especially those who did not belong or support the Uganda People's Congress (UPC) continued unabatted. Most of the victims were DP supporters, they claimed.

They believed that the intimidation and killings were being instigated and perpetuated by a political party.

The DP leaders said the rival party had resorted to all kinds of desperate means to ensure that the elections were disrupted. The officials were obviously referring to the UPC.

The officials said they had reasons to believe that there was a clique in the Uganda National Liberation Army (UNLA) which was being instigated by that party to carry out "these intimidations, harrassments and senseless killings."

Okeny then cited a number of occasions when he was arrested by members of the militia in the different parts of Kitgum District, taken to the barracks where he had been inhumanly treated. He said he had been hospitalised for more than a week. He had scars on his body to support his claims, he said.

Okullo said on October 13, he was intimidated in Kitgum by a commander of the militia who claimed he was carrying out the directives of a highly-placed army officer. His body-guard had been disarmed and his car driven away. He fled to Gulu and later to Kampala through "panya" roads, he further claimed.

"All the above incidents were reported to the police but it seems no steps have been taken," Okeny and Okullo said.

Okullo asked: "Why are these things happening?. What are the remedies and who is going to provide these remedies?"

There were two possible alternatives, he suggested. The first — but negative step — the militia should be disarmed. The second — the positive — they should be absorbed in the national army, the police and prisons.

The first alternative was negative because the militia's role in the protection of the people of the district and their property against the rustlers could not be overemphasised.

Okullo warned that if the government did not take remedial steps to arrest the worsening security situation, Ugandans could be forced to resort to any kind of means to protect their lives and property.

Bwengye pointed out that insecurity was now nationwide. He cited an occasion last week when his bodyguard had been disarmed and he had to flee to safety through "panya" roads.

He further pointed out that the party's president general Mr Paul Semogerere, had been intercepted when he was returning to Kampala from a DP public rally at Busembatia and his bodyguard disarmed. Semogerere is presently in London.

Bwengye further claimed that during the registration exercise many DP supporters had been intimidated. He claimed that there was a clique among Ugandan soldiers who were being fed on tribalism. He suggested that the soldiers should be removed and confined in their barracks.

Drale described the atrocities which were going on in Moyo, Arua and Nebbi as very grave. The country and the world should be informed about them by the government. What was going on in those areas was mostly sparked off by tribalism.

Drale put the figure of the displaced people in Moyo District to about 30,000 people. These required massive humanitarian aid if they were to survive.

Ovonji said that during the troubles in Nebbi, he had been hunted by soldiers for four days. He also fled to Kampala through "panya" roads.

Conservative Party Complaint

Kampala UGANDA TIMES in English 30 Oct 80 p 8

THE Conservative Party (CP) leadership yesterday asked the Military Commission to investigate the wave of killings characterising the elections campaign period.

As the CP was making this appeal, the chairman of the Military Commission, Mr Paulo Muwanga, announced at a press conference in Kampala the commission's decision to appoint a committee to investigate in depth the killings in and around Kampala.

Mr Kalule Kawoya, party legal advisor, Mr Henry Kyeyune, assistant publicity secretary, and Mr Nsambu Nsubuga, member of the executive committee said Uganda had been rocked by a wave of killings, destruction of property and intimidation since September last year. This had made life brutal and nasty.

"It's now time to probe these killings, and prosecute those responsible".

SALT SCANDEL REPORTEDLY SENDS FOOD, BEVERAGE OFFICIALS ON FORCED LEAVE

Kampala WEEKLY TOPIC in English 7 Nov 80 pp 1, 12

[Text] A salt scandal in Foods and Beverages has resulted in some of the top men in the company being sent on forced leave by Commerce Minister Kategaya until a Committee he has set up to probe the matter completes its work.

While Uganda is experiencing an acute shortage of salt which has escalated the price of that essential commodity to a level almost out of reach of the common man, thousands of tonnes of paid-up salt lie stranded in Mombasa. The unfortunate confusion is traced back to a back-door deal between a white briefcase-businessmen and some officials of Foods and Beverages.

The inquiries mounted by Weekly Topic Investigation Desk indicate that sometime in January this year, the Central Tender Board awarded to a British "brief case businessman" a tender for the supply of 10,000 tons of salt. The businessman and his wife are said to own a firm that has a paid-up capital of only £100.

The purchaser of the salt was the state-owned Foods and Beverages on whose behalf the Central Tender Board entered into an agreement with the British businessman. According to the agreement the salt was to be delivered by the supplier to Kampala at a total cost of about 1.2m/-. It was also agreed that the salt was to be delivered from Eden within three months time, arriving in Kampala sometime in April.

No salt was delivered in April but the British businessman re-emerged in July and succeeded in "persuading" some top men in Foods and Beverages to alter the terms of the agreement to the effect that the salt would be delivered to Mombasa instead of Kampala. He also convinced them to accept that the quantity of salt would be reduced to 8,300 tons on the pretext that salt price had gone up.

All these adjustments were agreed upon between the businessman and the officials of Foods and Beverages without any consultation with the Central Tender Board.

After the rather dubious adjustments, the supplier shipped the salt to Mombasa but it turned out to be only 6,000 tons imported from India and not from Eden as had been agreed. It is not known, therefore, whether the salt is of the quality that had been contemplated in the agreement.

One strange aspect of the whole affair is that while the salt was exported from India it was insured with two insurance companies, one based in Britain and the other in Sri Lanka.

Even the process of paying for the salt was surrounded by some mysterious dealings. Before Foods and Beverages could submit the papers from the suppliers to their bankers, the British businessman presented photo copies of the documents to the Bank and was about to be paid when someone from Foods and Beverages intervened.

The Bank was told that the suppliers should transport the salt to Kampala before payment is effected because the transport charges were included in the total price. The supplier promised to travel to Mombasa and arrange with some forwarding and clearing firm to deliver the salt to Kampala, but never did.

In spite of this, the businessman succeeded in getting the full payment remitted by the Bank to London via a Kuwait Bank registered in London. It is interesting to note that the money was remitted when the Bank was not in possession of the original documents and the remittance was not effected through Westminister Bank, who are the traditional agents.

Foods and Beverages are now faced wih an ugly situation where they have to pay about 100,000/- per month in demurrage and storage charges for only half of the consignment actually paid for. And the "briefcase businessman" is nowhere to be seen.

Meanwhile, the Minister for Commerce has instituted measures to get to the root of the matter. He has set up a Committee to probe all the aspects of the scandal and sent some of the top men in Foods and Beverages on forced leave until the Committee completes its investigations. Already, two local commission agents of the British business man have been apprehended for questioning.

KAUNDA CLOSES UNIP MEETING, REASSURES NATION ON SECURITY

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 8 Nov 80 p 1

[Text]

THE security situation in the country is now under control, President Kaunda assured in Lusaka yesterday.

President Kaunda gave the assurance when he closed the 15th UNIP National Council meeting at Mulungushi Hall.

He told councillors that when the story of the coup plot was told in full, Zambians would appreciate that God was with them.

The President said the Party and its Government and the people of Zambia were building a strong society based on genuine love for man and that God would not leave them alone in their endeavours.

"If we build our society on love we cannot fail. Of course the enemy is strong and determined, but he cannot be more powerful than God and love. No power on earth will destroy us once our efforts are based on these two principles," he told the councillors.

The leadership had no hatred for anybody and those who had been arrested in connection with the plot and those who might be arrested in future had no need to fear if they were innocent because Zambia followed the rule of law which she was very proud of.

Offend

"We cannot arrest you because you are short or too tall or because you are white, but only when you offend the people of Zambia and I speak as a free man because I live in the free society of Zambia," the President said.

The President also stressed the importance of a strong Party machinery and urged leaders at all levels to ensure UNIP ticked throughout the country.

He emphasised the need for increased production not only in agriculture, but in all sectors of the country's economy.

Dr Kaunda said during the past one week, the National Council looked at national development in all five areas of human endeavour — political, economic, social and cultural, scientific and technological and defence and security.

But while the Central Committee studied the resolutions made in connection with these, all leaders must remember the importance of Party organisation.

"District governors and their regional officials, constituency, branch, section and village leaders and Members of Parliament and indeed leaders at national level must see to it that the Party continues to be strong without reservations," he said.

The strength of Zambia, he added, depended on a well organised UNIP, but leaders could not organise the Party without knowing what the institution stood for.

"Hence the importance of political and security education which cannot be overemphasised. Once we get to know, accept and appreciate the meaning of Humanism and the socialist path, then we will become good political educators."

He urged the councillors not to talk about Humanism only, but to live it because by leading by example, they would teach more effectively instead of just shouting from rooftops.

On production, he said by the next National Council, leaders would be required to report having produced not thousands of bags of maize, but millions.

He hoped the Central Committee would not set the date early to give people a chance to produce more food and the leaders time to report their successes.

Leaders at all levels throughout the country must supervise the "lima" programme, encourage commercial farmers and check on the "operation food programme".

Commending the councillors, the President said the National Council finished three days earlier than planned because of their commitment to the national cause and their appreciation of the difficult security situation in the country.

Meanwhile, a Ndola Rural chief warned yesterday that if there were people in his area working with enemies of the nation they would be booted out.

Chief Machiya said this when he addressed villagers at his palace celebrating the fifth anniversary of his reign.

The chief told the crowd, which included Ndola Rural district secretary, Mr Lemmy Shadunka, that like other chiefs in the district, he was loyal and solidly behind the leadership of President Kaunda, adding that he would not condone those wishing to work against the Party and its Government.

The chief directed all village headmen in his area to report any strange people to him so that he would personally take them to the police.

● Crime on the Copperbelt has decreased drastically during the curfew period, Copperbelt police chief, Mr Julius Zulu said in Ndola yesterday.

UNIP COUNCIL RESOLUTIONS EXAMINED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 10 Nov 80 p 1

[Editorial]

[Text] AS we said in this column last Friday, the recent National Council session was down to earth and serious.

We need not therefore harp on past deeds and misdeeds but look forward to the follow-up action on the deliberations of the National Council — Zambia's august policy-making forum.

The issues which the Council tackled are not of the mundane nature but ones which demand immediate attention for they are vital to the survival of the Republic.

And the nation is anxious.

The delegates to the National Council vary from those officials of the Party who lead from the village level to those in the Central Committee.

Hence what came out of the National Council session in the way of resolutions can be construed to be for the good of the whole of Zambia.

We may then look at some of the resolutions which are of an immediate concern to the masses.

MILITARY TRIBUNAL — This is overdue for how many times in the past have the masses in demonstrations and other channels called on the Party and its Government to take firm action against "enemies" of the country?

Certainly people who elect to live by being saboteurs, renegades and other misfits must be answerable for their actions.

With a military tribunal they would not be let off the hook so easily; for the ingredient will be involvement not a police officer forgetting a "warn and caution" statement.

DECENTRALISATION — The National Council acted within its powers to urge the Party and its Government to "reprimand" the Mineworkers Union of Zambia for sacking officials who took part in the recent Party ward elections.

Those MUZ leaders who felt they were a law unto themselves by dismissing other people must feel the weight of the Party.

Sixteen MUZ officials are reported to have lost their posts because they followed Party policies.

Many labour leaders are members of the National Council and we hope that they are not going to come back tomorrow and say they were not part and parcel of the Local Administration Bill re-introduction in Parliament decision.

DISCIPLINE — President Kaunda dwelt on this in his opening speech and now that the National Council has echoed him, the other organs in charge of interpreting speech and resolution into action should move in.

They must start with Freedom House; the Party's accounting system report is nothing but an indictment of indiscipline.

CRIME — certainly the law enforcement agencies must be given all the support. But support alone will not solve our woes unless the people know that "crime does not pay".

KAUNDA URGES ROMANIANS TO CONTINUE AID

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 10 Nov 80 p 1

[Text]

PRESIDENT Kaunda will not be deterred in steering Zambia on the path of development in the agricultural, mining, industrial and technical fields despite anti-revolutionary activities which have beset the nation.

And he has appealed to the Romanian government, which he said had made significant contributions to the development of these sectors, to continue aiding Zambia.

Dr Kaunda was speaking when Romanian first deputy minister of foreign trade and international economic co-operation, Mr Ion Nicolae, who led a 12-man delegation called on him at State House yesterday.

He said Zambia was experiencing problems created by what he called "hard core" anti-Party elements. But these would not discourage him in seeing that development in various fields including mining and agriculture forged ahead.

"We have had problems here, but we are relaxed. We know these will pass. I know the struggle is reaching a certain level for those who wanted to destroy us. It is an ideological struggle, but we will overcome it."

He told the delegation that the most dangerous of his enemies had been arrested adding: "Courts will soon try these people to see that justice is done."

He said Zambia was set for development in all areas and hailed Romania for the role it had played in the country's development, but Zambia still needed help, he added.

"Your country and our country agree on many thoughts and ideas. I can assure you that we in Zambia are ready to cooperate with you, to work with you fully until we reach great heights in development," Dr Kaunda said.

Noted

Mr Nicolae told Dr Kaunda that his country would continue helping Zambia and noted that the delegation's visit was aimed at identifying areas of cooperation especially training in various fields.

He said his delegation would report progress to his country's head of state, President Nicolae Ceaucescu, on how best to help Zambia.

MILNER RETURNS, ZIMBABWEAN PASSPORT CONFISCATED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 7 Nov 80 p 1

[Text]

FORMER Home Affairs minister, Mr Aaron Milner, who is understood to be sought by police, arrived in Lusaka from Zimbabwe yesterday and declared that there were three people in the top leadership of the Party and its Government who were allegedly misleading President Kaunda to achieve their selfish ends.

He said the unnamed people had allegedly launched a campaign against him and other prominent and successful people in Zambia.

"Because of this vendetta, I have decided to take the advice from my mother and uncles to renounce my Zambian citizenship because it has become impossible for me to live here," he said.

Immediately he arrived at Lusaka airport, Mr Milner was whisked to one of the VIP lounges by security authorities who detained him for an hour while they searched his luggage. They confiscated his Zimbabwean passport.

Mr Milner said at his Makeni farm later that one of the people who searched him said he could be deported to Zimbabwe since he was no longer a Zambian.

He said he was not asked anything by the authorities at the airport, but added that if he were guilty he would not have come back.

Speaking to a Times team at the farm, Mr Milner mused: "The culprit is back," and gesturing expansively at his huge maize field, orchard and cattle, he added:

"That is what killed me. In this country you are a criminal and renegade if you work hard."

Announcing that he had renounced his Zambian citizenship, Mr Milner, who sometimes spoke emotionally and looked bitter, said he took the decision because certain leaders allegedly did not appreciate what their colleagues had done for the country.

He said: "I have suffered for the past four years and now when I thought everything was over and started to recover, there comes this."

He still loved Zambia and President Kaunda and he would re-apply for the citizenship in future if common sense started to prevail.

Mr Milner explained that he would remain in the country for a while because he had to sell his property including the farm.

He charged that three top leaders had allegedly launched a campaign to discredit others and that these were deliberately misleading Dr Kaunda by feeding him wrong information designed to further their own selfish ends.

"I know this gang of three, but their time will be up very soon. They will be flushed out like the 'Gang of Four' in China which misled Mao," he said.

He said he had no time to engage in subversive activities because he helped build this country and would not like to see it destroyed.

The former minister said there were few people in the Central Committee now who could claim to have done as much as he had for Zambia and the liberation struggle in Southern Africa.

"For eight years, I moved weaponry for freedom fighters from Dar es Salaam personally and I now have to be treated like this and after 28 years of my life in this country, I became a part of it and yet some people have dared to make me feel alien," he said.

But Mr Milner emphasised that he still had faith in President Kaunda and Zambia as a whole and that he was confident that one day reason would prevail, adding that it was because Dr Kaunda was Head of State that he had decided to return.

"If it were a rogue like Idi Amin, I would not have taken any chances," he added.

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY TRIBUNAL RECOMMENDED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 10 Nov 80 p 1

[Text]

THE 15th UNIP National Council, which ended in Lusaka last Friday, has recommended the setting up of a military tribunal to hear cases against saboteurs.

And the Central Committee has been instructed to continue pursuing the matter — but there is no indication whether people accused of being involved in last month's coup plot would be tried by a military tribunal.

Sources within the council disclosed last week that the meeting had rejected a proposal that a military tribunal be set up to try people allegedly involved in last month's coup plot.

The sources said all the 12 committees of the council had rejected the proposal and it was not going to be one of the resolutions.

But member of the Central Committee Mr Bob Litana said the National Council had resolved that there was need for a military tribunal to hear cases against saboteurs.

Addressing a Press conference at Freedom House in Lusaka, he said the National Council recommended that the resolution of the fourth National Council regarding the military tribunal be implemented.

On deteriorating discipline which formed the core of President Kaunda's opening address, the council resolved that the laws be reviewed to make punishment stiffer.

He also recommended that the administrative machinery of major national institutions be revamped, investigations must precede suspension and the Party, public service and regulations in schools and other places of learning be tightened.

On the economy, the council resolved that the findings of the recent working party on salaries and conditions of service for the public service be implemented quickly.

The Ministry of Commerce and Industry should review prices with a view to lowering the cost of living, it was resolved.

On politics, it said leaders at various levels should undergo intensive political education and the syllabus should be penetrating enough to make such habits as political and moral decadence, abuse of authority, dishonesty, dissidency look ridiculous and thereby help towards their complete elimination.

Mr Litana, who is chairman of the Elections and Publicity, Sub-Committee said the National Council felt that the economy needed productive and not consumptive investment.

Because of the practice of hoarding large sums of hard currency in places other than financial institutions by some members of the public, legislation should be enacted against this practice.

Financial institutions were urged to give loans on favourable terms to large scale commercial State farms, rural reconstruction cooperatives, the Zambia National Service, producer cooperatives, peasant and family farms and private commercial farms.

Foreign investors should be made to contribute to the development of the economy by bringing in foreign money instead of borrowing their capital from Zambian banks, it was resolved.

A foreign exchange reserve fund for purchasing the critical basic needs in production of consumer goods had been suggested.

The council said there was need for economic pricing because it was counter-productive to over-price beyond the purchasing power of the people.

It called for a national pricing policy which would strike a balance between economic pricing and the purchasing power of the low income group.

It noted that the prices of some imported goods were exceedingly high and that measures to reduce such prices should be taken by the Ministry of Commerce and Industry.

The council urged strict, frequent and detailed monitoring of the use of foreign exchange in order to stop manipulation.

It also recommended that the Tender Board system be applied to the importation of essential commodities.

HARMONIOUS TIES OF PARTY, ZCTU ENCOURAGED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 10 Nov 80 p 5

[Text]

PRESIDENT's Citizenship College principal, Mr Emmanuel Chalabesa, has appealed to the Party to maintain a harmonious relationship with the Zambia Congress of Trade Unions.

"Let us not be misled by current events in the country whereby people are being made to believe that UNIP hates the ZCTU or that the ZCTU hates UNIP," he said.

Closing a week-long seminar for credit union representatives at the weekend, Mr Chalabesa said anybody who had followed the struggle for Zambia's independence would agree that UNIP and the ZCTU were "Siamese twins."

Mr Chalabesa, in a speech read on his behalf by college public relations officer, Mr David Tonga, said:

"UNIP and the ZCTU are Siamese twins which cannot be separated easily. Therefore, hating one of these twins is hating the other.

"I would like to declare that whoever hates the ZCTU leadership is also hating the UNIP leadership."

Quoting President Kaunda when he opened the just ended 15th Party National Council meeting at Mulungushi Hall in Lusaka, Mr Chalabesa said UNIP was a workers Party just like the ZCTU. "What is the difference then?" he asked.

A worker organisation or a workers party meant that members of both organisations should strive to fight for better conditions of living for their members, he said.

During their one-week stay at the college, the participants were taught among other things cooperative law, credit unionism,organisation, definition and benefits as well as management.

The principal told the participants that the college expected them to implement what they learnt "no more and no less. You should go out and teach others."

He later presented certificates to the participants.

GOVERNMENT SEIZES PASSPORTS OF PROMINENT CITIZENS

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 8 Nov 80 p 1

[Text] THE Government has seized passports of more than five prominent Zambians for unspecified reasons.

Among those whose passports have been withdrawn is former minister of foreign affairs and member of the Central Committee, now a prominent Lusaka businessman, Mr Vernon Mwaanga.

Home Affairs Minister Mr Wilted Phiri confirmed yesterday the Government had withdrawn passports from "less than ten" Zambians for security, political or other reasons.

Reasons for each case, he added, were different, so he could not be specific.

Mr Mwaanga, who confirmed his passport had been seized by the Government last Tuesday without giving him reasons, charged that some people had ganged up against him, adding: "My case has been pointedly of a persecution nature."

This is the second time his passport has been withdrawn, the first was in 1977 when it was impounded for eight months.

Mr Phiri said others whose passports had been seized were Mr Elias Chipimo, a prominent businessman who was detained on October 24 and released last Tuesday, Zambia Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU) chairman Mr Frederick Chiluba, general-secretary, Mr Newstead Zimba and assistant general-secretary, Mr Chitalu Sampa.

It is understood 11 passports have been withdrawn from prominent Zambians, including those of former Bank of Zambia governor, Mr Valentine Musakanya and Zimco executive director, Mr Patrick Chisanga who are in detention.

But Mr Phiri could neither confirm nor deny the reports, saying: "To the best of my knowledge I can confirm the withdrawal of passports only for the five people I have mentioned, although there could be more."

Mr Phiri could not say whether the seizure of passports was connected with the recently foiled coup plot against the Government. "I am not obliged to give specific reasons for the withdrawal of passports."

Mr Phiri said the passports for Mr Mwaanga, Mr Chiluba, Mr Sampa and Mr Zimba were seized last week, while Mr Chipimo's was withdrawn after his remarks in April urging Third World leaders, especially those in Africa, to review their policies towards single party constitutions.

Mr Chipimo said then: "It is a numbing experience that successive presidents all over the Third World tend to end up with a bullet in their heads.

"Isn't there something wrong somewhere if beneath apparent calm and submission, a sergeant rises and bumps off the head of a president to an immediate popular acclaim?"

Mr Mwaanga's passport is understood to have been withdrawn as he was about to leave for Swaziland on business.

Mr Phiri declined to discuss the circumstances under which Mr Mwaanga's passport was seized.

Mr Mwaanga said he was going to Swaziland to attend a regional bank meeting as chairman of the newly established Bank of Credit and Commerce Zambia Limited.

He was also going to see his daughter who had fractured her arm during physical exercises at her school.

Mr Mwaanga has four children schooling in Swaziland.

He was accosted by immigration officials who called him to their office and "politely" told him they had orders from the Ministry of Home Affairs to seize his passport.

"I have no idea what this is all about. I am absolutely flabbergasted. I have been a fairly articulate defender of this Government inside and outside having held so many important posts in it and being a founder-member of the Party," said Mr Mwaanga.

"This is a very strange way of rewarding citizens who are loyal," he said.

Mr Mwaanga recalled that at one time, he was implicated in a cattle theft scandal and when he sought to clear his name in the courts of law, he was allegedly prevented from doing so.

He was referring to the Mumpanshya report into Zambia Railways affairs where it was stated that a top executive in the railways, in league with a former minister, removed cattle from Botswana destined for Zaire at a siding in Southern Province and substituted them with skinny animals.

UNFAIR CRITICISM OF 'TIMES' CHARGED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 9 Nov 80 pp 1, 7

[Article entitled: "Why Crucify the Press?"]

[Text] THE 15th National Council of the Party is finally over, but isn't this really just the end of the beginning?

Inside the National Council we learn tempers were high, the mood was tense but somehow business was conducted. This clearly was one of the most crucial meetings of the Party policy-makers at that level. Now the nation expects action.

In a preview of the meeting on the eve of its opening, we analysed the problematics of Third World politics, concluding that some politicians laying claims to national representation were in fact only pandering to the sentiments of regionalism in the process of serving their sub-national interests.

And the meeting got to a hot start. When voting was conducted for the chairman of the council, whispers were heard between supporters of contestants paying homage to sub-national affinities, during the heavy lobbying.

Accusing fingers were also pointed at regional or tribal groups as being culprits of the foiled coup plot.

Inside Mulungushi Hall some delegates wondered: Will this be a repeat of that hazardous, acrimonious Mulungushi 1967 general conference? At that meeting the nation came out bruised by the pitfalls of regionalism.

If the nation has not come out bruised again from this year's meeting, at least the national Press, especially our sister newspaper the Times of Zambia, has. The debate on the manner in which the Times covered the proceeding was one of the hottest.

From inside the National Council we were informed that one delegate went to the extent of saying that the entire leadership of the Party was "rotten", except President Kaunda.

How can the entire leadership be rotten? If so, then this delegate must also be rotten since he is part of the leadership he condemns.

We are informed that this is because some delegates felt the Central Committee failed to censor the Times. Some of the stories reported should not have been published, so they felt.

In trying to ensure that coverage of National Council meetings is in future censored, some delegates suggested that Press briefings should be given only by the council chairman and not by the Chairman of the Elections and Publicity Sub-Committee of the Central Committee as at present.

This was so because they were convinced that some of the "unwanted" stories were leaked to the Press by the incumbent council spokesman, Mr Bob Litana.

How did the Times journalists get the story that a proposal for military tribunal had been rejected by all the 12 working committees of the council? How did the paper get the document on critical recommendations from the communication and public works working committee?

So Mr Litana was concerned. He came out of the plenary session and phoned the Times of Zambia office, summoning the team covering the council meeting to see him.

"Why were you people lobbying for stories? Why have you been prying for news when I promised to be briefing you every day? You are competing for what? Now you have put me in ... with the National Council." Mr Litana was clearly embittered and embattled.

As he spoke to the two journalists his vice-chairman, Mr Fines Bulawayo was passing by. "Fines, come here," the chairman called out. Mr Bulawayo replied: "Me, I don't talk to animals," referring to the reporters.

Where then is the sense of security and confidentiality at National Council meetings? How then would Mr Litana be crucified for the alleged leakages, more so that when he speaks, he is always quoted by name? The offending stories were quoting either documents or sources: And one expects that if the delegates knew what they were talking about, they would have realised that Mr Litana would not be quoted just as "sources within the council".

In the process, the Press got crucified to the extent that the police were detailed among them. However, the nation is to gain from this unfortunate incident: One hopes that in future those who handle confidential matters will have a clear sense of security.

Whether or not the Times of Zambia reporters will be put on the cross at Golgotha, they will only be benevolent sacrifices giving great benefits to those who purport to be champions of national interests.

But the issue of the Press was not the only problem discussed.

In any case the problem of the mass media was an appendage to the bigger one of whether or not the country should establish a military tribunal. It was the first time in the history of the council that a proposal from Freedom House was defeated by delegates.

One would expect that they would exploit this defeat by singing to the world as to how democratic Zambia was, instead of seeking sacrificial lambs.

Unfortunately, the professional hazard of politicians is that they are bad losers. While they remain the repositories of power it is most difficult for them to accept defeat.

The mood of the Central Committee in making their ill-faded proposal can be understood in the light of the prevailing security situation.

By throwing out the suggestion, it can be assumed that the delegates did not support the Central Committee in their attempts to correct the threat to national stability.

But as the delegates argued, surely the country has enough provisions in the present laws to safeguard national unity and maintain the peace. And if the Central Committee needed to tighten up the present measures, it was not imperative that such measures should be ratified by the National Council.

If the security of the country is gravely threatened, why wait for the Party National Council? On the other hand we find that the other occupational hazard of politicians is that they always want to do themselves "proud" by creating a mood of mass support, even where this is not necessary. When defeated, they hit back hard and harsh.

Along this thinking, one hopes that those charged with keeping the peace will still go ahead with the establishment of a military tribunal if they are still convinced that this is what Zambia needs.

However, against this persuasion they will have to be dissuaded by the fact that what has kept Zambia together is President Kaunda's option for mercy and forgiveness instead of excesses against his enemies.

From inside the National Council, we hear that delegates were informed that the Party and its Government now have conclusive evidence that some people with claims to national leadership, including trade unionists, had uniquitous links with a foreign power.

If that is the case, the nation expects the authorities to act firmly and with speed. International imperialism, in its mission to subvert Third World countries, operates on many levels.

It infiltrates not just the trade unions, but the national bourgeoisie and the political leadership as well. It would, therefore, be unbelievable that there has been collusion with some people in the national political leadership. That would be a unique omission by international forces of subversion.

It will, thus, be disturbing to hear from inside the National Council that some delegates were singing the hymns of tribal and subnational politics.

When this becomes the pattern of debating national issues, then the duty of the Press becomes extremely crucial. The mass media should in such circumstances expose those that pander to tribal sentiments.

The process of democracy demands that national issues, however critical and whatever depth of acrimony, should be discussed in public. It would be folly to expect mass mobilisation if only the nice but false mood was fed to the public.

It is also surprising that some of the delegates even opposed the use of the word "comrade", claiming that Zambia was not a communist state.

Has the nation not been told that Zambia will be a socialist country as it proceeds to Humanism? Is the word comrade not in fact a socialist way of expressing solidarity?

It sounds petty that such an issue would be raised in a crucial meeting like the National Council. But it raises the question: Perhaps the forces of reaction have taken charge.

One prays that during future conferences, the newspapers will be allowed to tell the people the true picture during discussions. Only then will the broad masses know in which direction the nation is going. Don't they have a right to know which national leader is saying or doing what?

GEARING-DOWN OF NAMBOARD DESCRIBED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 10 Nov 80 p 1

[Text]

THE Government will spend about K2 million in paying out terminal benefits to an estimated 8,000 Namboard workers when provincial marketing unions take over the bulk of the company's operations in January, company sources said in Lusaka yesterday.

According to the sources, the figure was arrived at during crucial talks held between the Government and Namboard last month to determine when the workers would be laid off.

In preparation for the mass redundancies, Namboard general manager, Mr Daniel Luzongo has already sent out letters to the workers warning them of the impending lay-offs.

Namboard sources said some workers started resigning on their own after securing employment elsewhere. At the company's headquarters, eight workers are reported to have quit, they added.

The K2 million would be paid out in accrued leave days, lieu of notice payments and other benefits.

President Kaunda announced the re-organisation of Namboard when he launched the multi-million Kwacha "operation food production" last May.

He said Namboard's activities would be reduced to the barest minimum to enable the organisation to make profits.

Decisions so far communicated to Namboard management are:

● That with effect from January 1, 1981, Namboard will cease to deal in seeds, implements and all agricultural chemicals other than fertilisers.

● Namboard will hand over its depots to provincial co-operative marketing unions on December, 31, in Luapula, Northern, Southern and Eastern provinces retaining only the depots at provincial centres at Mansa, Kasama, Monze, Livingstone and Chipata.

● That Namboard will hand over all its depots to provincial cooperative marketing unions on March 31, in Lusaka, Central, Copperbelt, North-Western and Western provinces, retaining only Lusaka main depot, fertiliser complex at Natuseko, Bwana Mkubwa, Kitwe/Chambeshi, Solwezi and Mongu.

'STAR,' 'GOLD MINE' BOYS HOOLIGANISM EXAMINED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 9 Nov 80 p 3

[Article by Terence Musuku: "Mishanga Sellers Speak Out"]

[Text] JUSTICE long denied, as a political concept, demands the use of force to gain redress. But, in legal perspective, jungle law is never condoned nor tolerated in any civilised society — the laws of the land must be obeyed by everyone all the time, without conditions.

Hence, the reign of terror that rocked Ndola last June when the Masala Star Boys and Gold Mine Boys ran amok can be reviewed and analysed in different ways by different people of various professions.

Recollectedly, the two groups of boys surged rather spontaneously in different directions of Masala and Lubuto townships, beating up people indiscriminately for no apparent reason.

Their tragets were school teachers and school children as well as school buildings which they wanted damaged to vent their anger.

For a week the entire city was gripped with tension and fear as the boys intensified their unlawful activities.

To contain the worsening situation, teachers, parents and political leaders had to call a meeting at which they worked out the means of stopping this kind of youth hooliganism.

However, believing that "there is no smoke without fire", and in pursuance of truth and justice, I set out last week to find out precisely what had prompted the boys to hold an entire population to ransom.

Speaking through their leader, Patrick Siadenda, aged 19, Masala Star Boys told the Sunday Times that whatever cases of misconduct or promiscuity they had committed, political and civic leaders in Ndola were to blame.

Siadenda further explained: "What we did was a way of protesting to the highest authorities that the youth of Ndola were suffering non-stop in many ways... We are unemployed and unable to continue our education because of corruption in schools and we can't obtain national registration cards because the registration officers are even more corrupt."

"As a means of trying to become self-reliant in accordance with the Philosophy of Humanism we try to sell cigarettes and other commodities to those who can afford to buy. But the police are there to apprehend us", he added, in an expression of deep anger and frustration.

For Masala Star Boys, Siadenda disclosed, the last straw was when one of their friends was allegedly shot dead by a security guard in Masala township. He had been accused of trying to steal from a bar.

"Our comradeship as cigarette sellers lies in unity and ability to defend a comrade in trouble. When our friend was shot dead, we expected people in authority to condemn the killing of a human being in that way, but nothing happened, so we started protesting by attacking anything in our way," Siadenda said.

"Bruce Lee" Chalwe, leader of the rival group — Gold Mine Boys, who operate around the Main Masala market — said his group had decided to beat up teachers as a form of counter-punishment or retaliation for the sufferings they underwent when they were school children.

Chalwe disclosed that, in fact, the arrangements for the beatings teachers received were an inside job. School children at particular schools had fed the Mine Boys with clear information regarding which teachers and classes of children to attack at suitable times.

The Gold Mine Boys charged, among other things, that some teachers in certain primary and secondary schools were a manace to society. "They run too much with school girls, yet headmasters take no action against them."

The boys further alleged that corruption was so rife in some schools that in order to be given repeat places in Grade Seven or Form Three parents were required to pay something between K30 and K40.

"We wanted to beat them up so that they stop their immoral and greedy activities. We wanted justice and fair play to prevail in schools in respect of selection for places in Grade Seven and Form Three and to demand that headmasters and teachers show an example in behaviour and character," Chalwe said, adding: "How did we go wrong?"

But Copperbelt chief education officer, Mr Andrew Musukwa, contended that if there was an iota of truth in the boys' allegations, they should have reported the culprits to his office for action to be taken.

Mr Musukwa contended: "Corrupt headmasters or anybody else in the Ministry of Education and Culture accused of corruption or immoral conduct in the execution of their duties, must be exposed.

"But can only act on data given, otherwise the so-called corrupt ministry officials will continue misbehaving unpunished."

Mr Musukwa, however, conceded that school children in Zambia today were susceptible to committing cases of promiscuity one after another.

There were a number of factors, he said, which brought about this state of affairs...

He, as one example, pointed out that unlike in old days when education was only for the cream — the most intelligent students — education these days had become a right for everybody.

"So when and where we fail to provide education for everyone, it becomes a social problem. You can get or expect anything, something like the current Masala Star Boys and Gold Mine Boys," he said.

Mr Musukwa recalled that in his era as a boy, there was only one secondary school in the whole country — Munali. A boy who earned a place to Munali in those days was regarded as a genius, unlike now when so many each year qualify as secondary school students.

On students' indiscipline, Mr Musukwa urged all institutions, parents and individuals in positions of influence to give a helping hand.

He said it was not only the responsibility of teachers. It was a cancer that required concerted efforts to overcome.

Acting provincial social welfare officer, Mr Syantondo Chiyanika, speaking merely as a professional social worker, looked at the issue in a different light.

He said: "As social workers, we are dictated by our own considerations in cases involving the youth, call them rightly as juveniles. We don't look at the gravity of the offence committed, but we look at the surrounding circumstances of the offence committed."

He went on: "We believe that like young trees in the forest, youths need conducive climate to grow in a healthy manner. Similarly, children have to grow in healthy surroundings and environment to be healthy mentally and physically."

Any child from eight years is criminally responsible, according to the laws the land.

But Mr Chiyanika, propounding social work pholosophies, said: "With our knowledge of personality development, a number of conducive factors must be gathered and put together to determine why a child committed a particular offence.

About the Masala Star Boys and Gold Mine Boys, he said their allegations against some school teachers could have been valid while, at the same time, they might have acted out of mob spirit.

In peer group, a child acts from a feeling of what he would like to be. In the period of adolescence, boys tend to feel identified by portraying a mood of self-importance. This is their trying period when, in the case of boys, they start considering themselves as equally important just because a little of beard starts growing on their chins.

"... For young girls, their breasts start bulging out. Perhaps we call this as their dangerous period because, in some cases, their actions are beyond the control of both their parents and other authorities."

Mr Chiyanika, however, pointed out that the Party and its Government were trying by all means to alleviate the youth problem. This had been manifested by the creation of the Ministry of Youth and Sport.

The new ministry, he warned, was however not expected to bear fruit overnight. "The ministry has its own teething problems."

Endorsing Mr Musukwa's sentiments, Mr Chiyanika said that the youth problem anywhere in the world demanded intensified efforts of various institutions, instead of leaving everything in the hands of the government.

Bishop Robert Tailor, Anglican Bishop of Central Zambia, attributed the youth problem to what he termed as a breakdown in parental discipline in urban conditions.

Parents, he said, did not have sufficient control. "It becomes a chain reaction in that teachers also fail to maintain discipline in their school children."

The bishop further pointed out that conditions in urban areas were not what they used to be 30 years ago, culminating, hence, in having children acting outside their parental control.

Looking at youth problems universary, the bishop said that children were everywhere questioning the discipline of their teachers and other elderly people in society.

"In many ways, the world is in a mess. The youth feel inclined to question the wisdom of their parents and other citizens about the tension, violence and utter failure to solve these and many other problems. Ultimately, they come in and try to solve the problems in their own way."

The bishop, nevertheless, felt optmistic that with the upsurge of religious activities among the youth in recent years, the youth had become disenchanted and would no longer try to find solutions to their problems through violence.

Solutions

Instead, the bishop hoped, the youth would be trying to find solutions by going to church.

The youth episode in Ndola's Masala and Lubuto townships cannot be analysed insularly. Perhaps, the boys had a valid point. They expected attention from those in positions of influence.

They also believed, as a point of conviction, that their senior citizens in Ndola had an obligation to help them with educational and other facilities needed in order to have a bright future.

However, it would appear the youth went beyond the bounds by attempting to "kill the hen that lays the golden egg"

They should have realised that two wrongs never made a right. As the provincial chief education officer said, their complaints should have amply received the due attention, if they had been presented to appropriate authorities.

Robbers

Take one point into consideration:

The Gold Mine Boys warned that if the police continued to arrest them for illegal selling of cigarattes, they would become fulltime robbers or bandits.

They number well over 250! One of them said: "As far as we are concerned, our business is decent because we don't steal. We buy and sell, we don't steal to sell ... is that not decent ... unlike teachers who demand K40 to offer someone a place in school?"

The police, however, argue that business carried out in conflict with the existing laws is indecent. Selling "mishanga" at inflated charges is both illegal and indecent.

But the "mishanga" boys contended: "We don't use force. On the contrary we use polite approach while selling, which is why we succeed. You may want to know that we make as much as K70 a day at monthends", one said.

"We did not create the shortages. In fact as soon as the shortages are over at any time in future, we will switch to something else. All we will not accept is to allow ourselves die of starvation."

About "molesting" passengers at bus stations, they said the same thing applied: "When there will be more transport, no more queuing for buses and other vehicles, we will set the passengers free. Inadequecy of transport created this booming business."

The youth problem, from the foregoing, is more serious than most would be inclined to think.

They need education, jobs, clothes, food and shelter; unless urgent measures are taken, the nation faces more explosions similar to the topical Masala Star Boys and Golden Mine Boys' temporary reign of terror.

FIRING OF MUZ STEWARDS DENOUNCED

Firings Follow Boycott

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 8 Nov 80 p 1

[Text]

THE Mineworkers Union of Zambia Nkana branch has sacked ten shop stewards who took part in the recent Party elections for the introduction of the decentralisation system.

The shop stewards received their letters informing them about the branch executive's decision yesterday.

The sackings come barely five days after President Kaunda ordered MUZ leaders to explain to him reasons behind their boycott of the elections.

At its bi-annual conference in Livingstone, MUZ passed a resolution to boycott the elections in protest against the introduction of the new local government system and announced that any official who participated in ward elections would lose his union post.

The Nkana branch is the second to take action against its members, the first being Konkola which dismissed six shop stewards eight days ago.

The Nkana branch executive met on November 5 to decide on the action to take against officials who took part in the elections and the letters of sackings are dated November 6.

One of the letters which was signed by branch chairman, Mr Moses Bwalya, and his secretary, Mr Roy Yumbe, reads:

"I am writing to inform you that the branch joint executive which met on November 5, has endorsed the decision made at the Livingstone bi-Annual conference that those who took part in local government elections be told to resign, failure to comply they should be relieved of their duties.

Relieved

"You are, therefore, from today relieved of your official duties as shop steward. I am sorry that this decision was taken by our topmost conference which we cannot constitutionally overule."

Dr Kaunda said last Monday it was peculiar that MUZ fired its shop stewards from their posts for taking part in the elections.

He demanded to know the meaning of a resolution by the union to boycott the elections and asked union officials to prepare a report on the defiance of the elections.

Editorial Comment

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 8 Nov 80 p 1

[Editorial]

[Text] WHAT is the Mineworkers' Union of Zambia (MUZ) really up to? Its open defiance against the Party is continuing. Ten shop stewards have been sacked for having taken part in the recent ward elections.

This is the second time MUZ has done it. First it was its Konkola branch which sacked six shop stewards who were successful in the ward elections. The latest sackings have been effected by the Nkana branch.

The move came barely five days after President Kaunda had ordered MUZ to explain, in the shortest possible time, the grounds for its defiance.

That defiance stems from MUZ's opposition to decentralisation in as far as the mine townships are concerned. This raises certain fundamental issues.

Firstly, MUZ does not own any mine townships. These are owned and are a direct responsibility of the mine managements.

Secondly, why should MUZ, through its current defiance, declare a dispute with the Party and its Government over decentralisation? It knows very well that it does not directly negotiate with the Government, but with the two mining companies — NCCM and RCM through CISB.

Thirdly, and most importantly, what is the stand of the mining companies over decentralisation in as far as their mine townships are concerned? Their conspicuous silence is worrying.

Did they, through CISB inform MUZ well in advance the probable effects on the welfare of its members of the proposed new local government system? So far as we know this was not done.

The logical action for MUZ was to declare a dispute with the mining companies over the issue and not to wantonly defy the Party. Or are they merely a cog in a larger political wheel of defiance against UNIP?

On the other hand it could be taken that MUZ has discreetly passed a vote of no confidence in CISB. This is possible because CISB has taken MUZ for a ride on a number of important issues.

For example, MUZ was not informed of the introduction of the new salary structure for junior expatriate miners under the so-called "Salary Administration Related to Performance" (SARP).

Mining sources claim that this system was introduced to placate expatriate miners especially white British miners irrespective of their qualifications.

They had their salaries doubled within the past nine months. An expatriate British foreman who in September last year was getting K810 is today receiving over K1,600 per month. This is an open secret.

And yet MUZ has not protested. But it decides to defy the Party with impunity. Is that not being counter-revolutionary? Both MUZ and CISB should now be probed thoroughly. The Party is supreme.

Reinstatement Ordered

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 10 Nov 80 p 1

[Text] THE 15th UNIP National Council has called on the Mineworkers Union of Zambia to immediately reinstate the officials who were sacked for taking part in the recent Party elections.

The council called on the Party and its Government to reprimand the supreme council of MUZ for its action.

This was said yesterday by member of the Central Committee Mr Bob Litana when he announced the resolutions passed by the council.

Mr Litana, who is chairman of Elections and Publicity Sub-Committee told a Press conference at Freedom House that the council condemned the ultra-vires action by MUZ for punishing officials who exercised their legitimate rights in standing for Party elections.

Opening the National Council, President Kaunda directed MUZ to explain in the shortest possible time the reasons behind the sacking of the officials.

Mr Litana said following the explanation by Dr Kaunda in his opening address on the proposed decentralised local government administration, the council resolved that the Bill be re-introduced in Parliament.

"The Bill should be re-introduced in the National Assembly without amendments to matters of fundamental principle enshrined in the Party constitution and without further delay," he said.

The proposed decentralised system was accepted by the 14th National Council, he explained.

On the Zambia Congress of Trade Unions, Mr Litana said the council condemned the agitation by the ZCTU for a countrywide strike.

He said the council requested the ZCTU to call off the strike threat and warned that any trade union movement that led workers into illegal strikes would have some of its rights withdrawn by the Party.

Zambia and the rest of the world.

"The council recognised the need for a rational and scientific re-organisation of the economy by insisting on a structure and operational strategy that puts emphasis on basic needs of the majority of the people," he said.

Trade union movements should know that the Party and its Government on one hand and unions on the other, were interwoven.

Union leaders should avoid making derogatory statements against the Party leadership of which they were part, Mr Litana said.

On finance, economic and planning, Mr Litana said the council recognised the limited financial resources of the country, the unfavourable copper prices and the worsening terms of trade between

BRIEFS

KAUNDA SALUTES BULGARIA--President Kaunda yesterday praised Bulgaria for her commitment to help Zambia develop. He described as "excellent" the reception accorded him and his delegation by his Bulgarian counterpart, President Todor Zhivkov, during his visit to that country in September. Dr Kaunda was speaking at a State House luncheon in honour of a Bulgarian delegation led by ambassador in the ministry of foreign affairs, Mr Dimiter Valev, when they called on him. Mr Valev, who was accompanied by deputy director of the world hunting exposition Bulgarian 1981, Mr Stefan Manolov, and that country's charge d'affaires to Zambia, Mr Georgi Constantinov, presented a special message to Dr Kaunda from President Zhivkov. The President later held talks with the Bulgarians. [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 9 Nov 80 p 1]

IAN SMITH RETURNS FROM VISITS ABROAD

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 13 Nov 80 p 1

[Text] MR IAN SMITH arrived back in Salisbury yesterday afternoon to a quiet reception from Rhodesian Front party officials.

Mr Smith was returning from a two-week visit to Britain, the United States and Canada, where he had talked to "people of influence", he said.

In the United States Mr Smith gave a series of lectures which were designed to "bring the free world to its senses", he said in an interview yesterday.

He was met with a barrage of hecklers who tried to disrupt some of the meetings.

As I anticipated," he said, "there was an orchestrated campaign and attack against me by some people who accused me of suppressing majority rule in the past."

Mr Smith said these were, in the main, Cubans and Iranians and not Americans. He said these people had helped his cause.

"I think that was why the Americans voted for Reagan. They were fed up with the pot countries throughout the world kicking them (the Americans) around and defeating them."

The Americans and Canadians had been very impressed by Zimbabwe, he said. In Canada Mr Smith had private discussions with top industrialists and businessmen.

These men had told Mr Smith they intended to form a body to make representations to the Government in Ottawa.

He had met the same response from private individuals in the United States, where Zimbabwe had been termed "the Persian Gulf of strategic minerals".

Mr Smith had stressed on his visit "that if the free world does not come in and play its part, it is quite clear to me who will".

Mr Smith said "the agitators and riff-raff who are not Americans" had upset the Americans themselves. They had "warmed" to him because of this agitation.

"I stressed the point how easy it was for a handful of people to frustrate the free people," Mr Smith said. "If we want the rest of the world to come in and help us we will have to behave."

Mr Smith had not yet read up on the unrest in Bulawayo so he was unwilling to comment, but said "most people in the country are concerned that there appears to be a bit of a breakdown in law and order". The Government had to "get on top of this".

Mr Smith denied newspaper reports which had said the purpose of his lectures was to talk about apartheid.

"If they want somebody to speak on apartheid they must get somebody from South Africa. I am not an expert on that," he said.

He did not remember anybody asking him to speak on the subject.

Mr Smith also denied he had received $5 000 to speak at a university in America. He said the whole tour had been arranged by an agent who demanded a cut.

"The upshot of the matter is that I never requested any fee," he said. If there was anything left after the hotel expenses had been paid, however, "I would say 'thank you'," Mr Smith said.

Asked about his plans, Mr Smith said he was hankering for his farm.

He had no plans to leave the country and he would contribute in whatever way he was needed.

"I do not get tired easily," Mr Smith said, adding: "There is no point blithely living on my farm if the country goes up in smoke."

REPORTAGE ON ZIPRA-ZANLA GUNBATTLES

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 12 Nov 80 p 1

[Text]

THE ZIPRA/ZANLA gunbattles and rioting in western Bulawayo have left 43 dead and up to 400 injured. Most of the casualties were civilians.

The ceasefire agreed to on Monday night by the warring ex-guerillas has held firm, and yesterday the situation at the Entumbane encampments was quiet as civilians throughout the western suburbs returned to their homes.

It is not known how many former guerillas died in the large-scale rocket, machinegun, small-arms, mortar and rifle-grenade battles, but police and army officers are surprised that large numbers were not killed.

One source said only six of the ZIPRA and ZANLA men had been killed, although "quite a few civilians living in the Entumbane area died".

As police in armoured vehicles patrolled the west in force and units of the National Army remained on standby in the area, scores of heavily armed guerillas returned to their Entumbane bases yesterday morning.

The main battle-front was in the new housing estate itself, where more than 3 000 ZANLA and ZIPRA men were housed.

But gunfire and rioting spread throughout the densely populated western suburb on Monday as guerillas broke out from their bases and mobs of thugs took to the streets.

Of the 43 dead, about 20 were shot and the rest were beaten, stoned, or stabbed to death, according to hospital staff.

A police spokesman said among those killed were three off-duty members of the National Army who were shot on Monday night after the battles at Entumbane had stopped.

The unarmed soldiers, all members of the former Rhodesian African Rifles, were dressed in civilian clothing when they were "executed".

Their bodies were found at a bus terminus in Magwegwe.

Grenade

The remainder of the death toll is made up by a five-year-old girl and a woman, both of whom are unidentified, and 18 men, of whom 15 have not been identified.

Although there were no new outbreaks of fighting yesterday seven children were injured in northern Entumbane when a rifle-grenade which they had been playing with went off.

Two of the youngsters were critically injured, while police said the other five were seriously hurt.

The police spokesman warned that suspicious objects must be reported to police, and not interfered with.

Last night police and National Army details were stationed inside the Entumbane guerilla encampments.

The fighting there, which started on Sunday night, finally ended when, after requests from the authorities and threats that strong action would be taken, the ZANLA and ZIPRA men agreed to lay down their arms.

Collect

Sources said that on Monday night the camps were visited by the commander of 1 Brigade, Brigadier Mike Shute, the head of ZIPRA, Mr Dumiso Dabengwa, and the ZANLA chief, Mr Rex Nhongo.

That night army ambulances moved in to ferry off the dead and wounded from inside the encampments.

The high-ranking army delegation remained in Entumbane for about three hours that night, talking to men in all four encampments.

Sources said the delegation returned again yesterday morning, when the ex-guerillas agreed to hand over their heavier weapons.

At about 2.30 p.m. hundreds of police and National Army men in armoured troop-carrying vehicles moved into the encampments to collect mortars, machineguns and rocket launchers.

They were handed over by the former guerillas, who are now armed with their personal arms only, said the source.

Maintenance teams are to move into Entumbane today to repair damage to buildings and power lines.

Mpilo Corridors Crowded

THE corridors of Mpilo hospital were crammed again yesterday with wounded people awaiting medical attention as the total number treated over three days crept towards 400.

By midday, there were 43 bodies in the mortuary as a result of the two days of violence.

Of those 43, the mortuary staff thought six were members of ZANLA or ZIPRA at Entumbane, three were members of 11 Battalion of the National Army and the remaining 34 were civilians.

Detective Inspector Eric Roberts, part of the CID team investigating the violence, said the three members of the National Army had been murdered rather than killed in action.

"They all happened to live in the western housing area. At the time they were shot they were unarmed and off duty," he said.

Inspector Roberts said only about half of those brought in dead so far had been shot. The rest had died from stabbings and assaults.

He said the majority of the 43 dead had been executed rather than being hit in the firing which took place between the ZIPRA and ZANLA forces.

"Most people have just been murdered for being on the wrong side and that sort of thing," said Inspector Roberts.

The floor of one room at Mpilo mortuary is now solid with two lines of dead men — disfigured, naked and some of them dead for up to 48 hours.

The fridges at the mortuary are already full with routine hospital deaths and there is nowhere to store the bodies of those killed on Sunday and Monday.

Almost half of these have not been identified.

The unidentified bodies include the one woman and the one child, aged about five, who were killed.

The stench of death is already overpowering and nauseating. The bodies must be disposed of soon, say mortuary staff.

Police are now appealing to people who think they may have lost a relative to report to the police post at Mpilo as soon as possible.

Any body that is not claimed by 12 noon today will be disposed of by the authorities, police say.

Dr Ernest Mason-Baker, senior pathologist at Mpilo, says he is anticipating that a number of the bodies will not be identified at all.

He said that in seven years at Mpilo he had never seen anything like the casualties which have been brought in in the past two days.

Besides casualty and intensive care, two wards at Mpilo are being used for victims of the recent violence with about 25 in each ward. Doctors and surgeons describe both the bizarre and the tragic — a child with a bullet so lightly lodged in his head that it had damaged nothing, an 18-year-old woman completely paralysed by a grenade blast.

Many of the wounded say they were victims of straightforward political violence, like the Magwegwe man who was battered severely on his head and body for admitting that he supported ZANU (PF). He said he was running away at the time he was attacked.

Others in Mpilo's ward A3 were caught in the crossfire of the battle. Jasper Mhlove, who lives at Entumbane itself and works at Bamba Zonke Motors in Mpopoma, was walking around the western housing area looking for his wife and family on Sunday morning.

As he passed the garage where he works, as a pump attendant, he encountered a large group of armed ZIPRA soldiers.

"I noticed that the air pumps were still on the forecourt and started to move them into the office," said Mr Mhlove.

"As I picked them up, they shouted to me to get down, I lay flat on the ground on my stomach.

"Almost at once shooting started and the next think I knew I was hit. I don't remember anything after that until I got to the hospital.

"I don't know why they started shooting. I suppose they were being fired at. I know they didn't shoot at me on purpose."

Mr Mhlove has a large graze in his left side and a badly damaged left arm. He said he had not seen his wife for more than two days.

Sithole Plea, Death Toll Given

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 13 Nov 80 pp 2, 1

[Text]

THE president of ZANU, the Rev. Ndabaningi Sithole, yesterday called on the Government to disarm all former guerillas throughout the country.

In a statement condemning the weekend outbreak of violence in Bulawayo, Mr Sithole said there could be no realistic reconciliation when thousands of ex-guerillas are "still so dangerously armed and apparently living beyond the control of the law".

"ZANU unreservedly condemns the recent shootings and killings that took place in Bulawayo and equally condemns those who precipitated . . . the violence which cost the lives of 50 souls.

"ZANU calls on the Government to disarm immediately the ex-guerillas so that civilians at Chitungwiza and Entumbane and elsewhere near the rural assembly points may live in peace and security," he said.

Mr Sithole said the violence had been brought on by inflammatory statements that made a mockery of Zimbabwe's independence.

"God forbid that this should go on," he said.

Iana reports that Mr Chris Sakala, publicity secretary of Bishop Abel Muzorewa's United African National Council, yesterday made an angry attack on ZANU (PF), following the sacking of UANC offices in Gatooma by a group of ZANU (PF) "dancers" dressed in East German camouflage.

Mr Sakala described the attack as "cowardly" and he went on to blame the ruling party's leaders for the violence in Bulawayo.

He said they had made inflammatory and irresponsible statements at rallies, such as calling for the creation of vigilante groups which would take the law into their own hands.

Death Toll Rises

The death toll from the gunbattles and rioting in western Bulawayo rose to 51 yesterday as more bodies were discovered. Some of the victims had been "executed".

The centre of the fighting, Entumbane, remained quiet during the day as Police Support Unit details searched the surrounding bush for bodies.

Among the dead found yesterday were four young men who had been beaten and murdered in a Luveve riverbed, apparently on Sunday night.

One had been shot several times after having had his hands tied behind his back.

The four men were all dressed in civilian clothing and had no identification papers of them.

It is thought they may have been off-duty members of the ZANLA contingent not involved in the fighting.

Throughout yesterday morning a steady stream of men and women entered Mpilo mortuary, fearing they would find a relative or friend among the corpses.

The grisly scene inside the overcrowded mortuary left many visibly shaken. Several people said they were unsure whether anyone they knew was among the dead: some bodies were badly decomposing.

One man said: "All people should see this. If they knew what they were doing surely the fighting would stop. Ministers should come to this mortuary.

"They talk a lot, but they should see this, maybe then they would really try to stop the killing."

A ZANLA commander, who refused to give his name, identified five of his men among the dead. It is understood two more bodies were identified as National Army men.

Officials at the mortuary said they believed 11 ZANLA men and four ZIPRA men were there.

Funerals

Of the 51 bodies taken to Mpilo mortuary ony 12 had not been identified by last night. [as published] However, many of those that were identified were not claimed, and arrangements for paupers' funerals were being made.

At Mpilo, police arrested a man in the hospital grounds, after an injured man awaiting treatment, Mr Morris Sibanda, pointed him out to police as being one of a group which severely beat him in Pumula North on Tuesday night.

Mr Sibanda was beaten with bottles and stones "because I am Shona".

There were few reports of trouble in the western suburbs on Tuesday night as the 7.30 p.m. to 5 a.m. curfew took effect.

● For the past three days, people have been streaming out of Bulawayo.

Deserted

Some people who deserted their Entumbane, Njube and Mpopoma houses at the height of fighting on Sunday night and Monday morning walked from the city and waited for rural buses 10 to 20 km from the city.

A conductor of one bus, Mr Amos Moyo, said: "We picked up passengers who had walked long distances overnight on Monday to get away from the violence.

"Some had covered more than 10 km on foot." Mr Moyo said. Many of the women had little children and young babies plus a few household utensils.

Police Deny Rumours of 'Massacres'

BULAWAYO.

RUMOURS that thousands of people died in the fighting between ZIPRA and ZANLA forces and the bodies buried in mass graves near Entumbane were scotched last night in a statement from Assistant Commissioner G. W. Day, police officer commanding Matabeleland.

Mr Day said Entumbane was returning to normal and that all weapons other than personally issued 7,62 calibre AKs had been removed from the ex-guerillas' camps.

He said all personal weapons within the camps that were not needed for guard duty or by the military police had been locked in armouries.

"There are rumours of thousands of people having been killed," he said. "Our official death toll at this stage is 80 Africans and one European, 11 of whom have been identified as ZANLA forces and four ZIPRA forces. There is also a rumour that camps have been burying their dead in mass graves. No evidence of this has been found."

Mr Day said that not all bush areas had yet been searched and appealed to the public to report any bodies discovered.

Police believe it is possible that weapons may have been concealed in houses within the townships by certain misguided adherents of the different factions," he said.

"It is the desire of the commanders of ZIPRA, ZANLA, police and National Army that anyone having knowledge of the whereabouts of such arms caches is to pass on this information to the police as soon as possible."

Mr Day said police and National Army had discovered a "considerable number of unexploded devices" and there would be explosions as these were destroyed.

The blasts should be ignored unless a statement to the contrary was issued.

Anyone finding "suspicious looking objects" should report them immediately and there would continue to be increased patrols by police and National Army, he said.

NKALA STATEMENTS ON PRESS 'DISTURBING'

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 10 Nov 80 p 8

[Editorial]

[Text] SOME of the statements by the Minister of Finance, Senator Nkala, relating to the Press are extremely disturbing.

The assertion by the Minister that the newspapers must come directly under the control of the Government runs counter to previous assurances that in Zimbabwe a free, independent and responsible Press will be not only encouraged but protected by the Government.

Senator Nkala accuses the newspapers, among them the Herald, of imperialist and racialist policies and of wanting to promote civil war.

This is absolute nonsense and it is an accusation that the Herald rejects with all the strength it can command.

We have worked strenuously to promote the interests of Zimbabwe, to encourage the peaceful development of our country and we have never failed to condemn those whose actions and utterances, wittingly or not, serve destructive causes.

Senator Nkala should know as well as, if not better than, anyone that Zimbabwe's international reputation is of the utmost importance for the future welfare of the people of this country.

For a senior Minister to be talking about direct Government control of the Press will damage that reputation.

We do not know at this stage if Senator Nkala was truly reflecting Government's intentions. It is to be hoped that he was talking out of turn.

It is certainly worth recalling that both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Information have on other occasions proclaimed their support for a free and independent Press in Zimbabwe.

It was Dr Shamuyarira who said the Government and the population at large cannot be kept informed by servile mass media. Direct Government control as Senator Nkala proposes would mean just that.

OFFICIALS DENOUNCE POLICE HARASSMENT

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 12 Nov 80 p 7

[Text]

THE Deputy Secretary in the Ministry of Manpower Planning and Development, Mr Ibbo Mandaza, claimed in the Salisbury Magistrates' Court yesterday that he had been harassed and intimidated by police.

Mr Mandaza is facing four charges under the Miscellaneous Offences Act, one charge of assault and one charge of criminal injuria.

The charges under the Miscellaneous Offences Act include two counts of resisting arrest, one count of using threatening, abusive or insulting words in a public place and one count of resisting being placed in police cells.

Inspector C. Buchanan, who was called as a State witness, said Mr Mandaza had been obstreperous and unco-operative when he arrived at the Central Police Station on the night he was arrested.

He said Mr Mandaza had refused to answer routine questions and started shouting insults at the police. He then threatened the police mobile inspector, who had arrested him, with assault.

In the cross-examination by Advocate B. W. K. Whaley, for the defence, Inspector Buchanan said because of Mr Mandaza's position he had been treated very carefully and was not provoked while he was at the station.

The constable in charge of the cells was then called to give evidence for the State. He said Mr Mandaza appeared to be very angry when he was brought to the cells.

Mr Mandaza was then called to give evidence. He said on the night in question, he and his wife had been drinking with friends. On their way home they stopped at a robot on the Lomagundi Road and a police vehicle pulled up next to them.

He said his wife indicated that the occupants of the police vehicle were laughing at them or their car which has several Zimbabwean flags stuck on it. When he pulled away from the robot the police vehicle followed in an intimidatory fashion close behind him, he said.

He said he decided to stop and ask the police what they wanted because he could not stand the harassment. When he stopped the police also stopped and he approached them asking what they wanted.

He then recorded the names of the police in the vehicle and informed them he was going to report them. He then decided to go home but was told by the police that he could not as another police vehicle was coming.

He said after waiting a while he decided to carry on home as it was a cold night and his wife was not well. After giving the police his name and address he continued down King George Road but was stopped by two police vehicles several hundred metres down the road.

He said when he got out of his car he was told to put his hands up, was frisked and told he was under arrest. He then asked if he could give the car keys to his wife. He said he was not allowed to so he threw the keys to her.

He said when his wife came forward she was struck by a policeman and went sprawling. He then became very angry because his wife had been assaulted and he was pushed into the police vehicle and handcuffed.

At the police station he said he told the police they were responsible for the whole incident and his wife had been left in the dark on the King George Road. He also said he wanted to lay a charge against the police for assaulting his wife, but they pretended not to hear him.

Mr Mandaza then said: "This is how you behave —typical Rhodesian police." He was then threatened with assault by a police inspector, he said.

He was advised by the African police to go to the cells and they walked with him there. At the cells he tried to get in touch with Mr Tekere but was not able to and he was released the next day.

He said he later submitted a written complaint to the Deputy Minister of Home Affairs and to the Commissioner of Police.

On cross-examination, the prosecutor, Mr D. J. M. Sankey, made application that the complaints be submitted as evidence as they had been referred to during the defence. Mr Mandaza interjected and said this was not possible as they were confidential.

Advocate Whaley said the application was precisely objectional and should not be placed in evidence.

The trial was then adjourned and the magistrate, Mr C. A. Ratcliffe, said he would make a decision as to whether the application would be granted when the trial resumed next week.

Youth Minister Hits at Police

SINOIA.

THE Minister of Youth, Sport and Recreation, Mrs Teurai Ropa Nhongo, yesterday accused Zimbabwe's police force of "not sympathising with the peoples of Zimbabwe, who are suffering from the activities of armed hooligans and political malcontents," reports Iana.

Addressing leaders of the Mashonaland West Women's League in Sinoia, Mrs Nhongo said the "enemy" was taking advantage of the ruling ZANU (PF) policy of national reconciliation.

These elements were trying to bring about chaos in the country, said Mrs Nhongo, who is the wife of ZANLA commander Rex Nhongo.

Mrs Nhongo's remarks, echoed those of the Information Minister, Dr Nathan Shamuyarira, who at the weekend accused the police of taking sides with the Minister of Home Affairs, Dr Joshua Nkomo, the leader of the Patriotic Front.—Iana.

REPORTAGE ON LOCAL ELECTIONS

Threat of Intimidation

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 10 Nov 80 p 1

[Text] Bulawayo

The Government would ban local government polls in towns where intimidation was rife, the Deputy Minister of Local Government and Housing, Mr Godfrey Chidyausiku, told a ZANU (PF) rally at the White City Stadium, Bulawayo, yesterday.

He said: "If there is intimidation the election will be stopped.

"If intimidation continues we will call in the soldiers to maintain peace. We are tired of intimidation. You should have confidence in your Government."

Mr Chidyausiku said the right of voting extended to lodgers was being abused. In Bulawayo one house had been registered as having 34 lodgers.

Mr Chidyausiku said this was being done by parties other than ZANU (PF).

The Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs, Dr Witness Mangwende, said the Government was now faced with the task of raising the standard of living of everyone in the country.

"This is the war we have been thinking of. But we may not be able to start this war unless we clean some of the existing rubbish."

He said the people should come forward and tell his Ministry if they do not agree with the foreign policy being conducted.

The Deputy Minister of Education and Culture, Mrs Victoria Chitepo, said the Government was planning to introduce pre-schools throughout the country so that mothers could be free to concentrate on other jobs.

Mrs Chitepo urged mothers to form committees to work out how they would like to see the pre-school system operating.

She denounced people who wait for the Government to do everything for them.

Matter of Life, Death

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 10 Nov 80 p 1

[Text] Bulawayo

The PF Parliamentary whip and chairman of the Bulawayo Residents' Association, Mr Sidney Malunga yesterday told a 20 000-strong rally that the local elections were a matter of life and death, and that they must help the 23 PF candidates to win.

He said PF supporters should remember that the elections would be held in spite of their party leader's suggestion that they should be postponed because of irregularities in the registration of voters.

Mr Malunga said: "Our councillors should show the ZANU (PF)-dominated Government that our party is above tribalism, racialism and regionalism, and is dedicated to serving the nation as a whole."

The PF National Deputy Secretary for Transport, Mr Willie Dlamini, vehemently condemned tribalism and deplored a suggestion by the Education Minister, Dr Dzingai Mutumbuka, that Shona would be taught in Matabeleland but not Sindebele in Mashonaland.

Ward 8 Gives Equal Chance Guarantee

All voters in Ward 8, which covers Salisbury's southern suburbs, have been invited to a meeting tomorrow night to be addressed by the four candidates contesting the local government elections in the area.

The meeting, at the Waterfalls District Community Hall, will start at 7.30. Ward 8 includes Waterfalls, Southerton, Lochinvar, Parktown and Prospect.

The candidates are Mrs Esther Rawson, Mr John Chambwe, Councillor Norman Henry and Mr Francis Zindoga.

Mr Nicholas Musezewa, secretary of the Waterfalls Residents' Association, which is organising the meeting, said the candidates would have an equal opportunity to address the meeting to help the voters make a choice.

His association was non-political and was trying as far as possible to maintain this approach to the elections.

"We are not taking sides," he said. "We are not giving any special favours. Our attitude is that all four are our candidates."

In an interview Mr Francis Zindoga, UANC national chairman and former Minister of Law and Order in Bishop Muzorewa's Government of National Unity, said his standing in the forthcoming elections had nothing to do with his political affiliation.

"Ward 8 made it perfectly clear in August this year that in no circumstances would it allow party politics to interfere in its affairs, and I subscribe to that view.

"We in Ward 8, and Waterfalls in particular, are unwavering in our belief that residents are the best judges of what is in their interests, and the best managers of their own affairs, and therefore that party politics has no role in local government."

Mr John Chambwe is campaigning on a Patriotic Front ticket. He stood in the same ward last year and lost to Councillor Norman Henry.

Councillor Henry, in his election manifesto says he has always opposed the intrusion of party politics into local government and "now, more than ever before, I believe it is our duty to preserve the respect and viability of our community".

He has been involved in civic affairs for 19 years, nine of them on the former Waterfalls Town Council and 10 on the city council.

Not Much Time

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 12 Nov 80 p 8

[Editorial]

[Text]

THE local government elections in Salisbury will be held in 10 days' time.

Seven candidates have been returned unopposed and there will be contests in the 29 remaining wards. For the first time thousands of people in the suburbs which used to be called African townships will be voting for their representatives on the city council.

Regrettably for a variety of reasons there has been little opportunity for the candidates to make themselves known to the electorate. More than 100 candidates were put forward and in some wards there will be three- or four-cornered elections.

There is an urgent need now for the electorate to be given as much information as possible about voting procedures and about the issues in the election.

There should be a publicity campaign explaining in clear terms how votes will be cast and where the voters will have to go on the polling days.

Party politics will play a major role in the new wards but the voters should be given every opportunity to hear the candidates themselves and to judge them on their individual merit.

Far-reaching decisions will have to be taken by the new council and it is essential for the well-being of the city as a whole that the best possible men and women with opinions of their own be elected to the council.

There is little time left before the elections. But what is available should be spent in calm and rational debate. This is not the time for emotional calls.

REPLACEMENT OF MP'S POSES LEGAL PROBLEM

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 13 Nov 80 [page not given]

[Text]

GOVERNMENT legal experts were yesterday studying the method by which two MPs who have been appointed to diplomatic posts are to be replaced in the House of Assembly.

The legal problem arose after the appointment of Dr Ariston Chambati (PF, Mashonaland West) and Mr Farai Masango (ZANU - PF, Mashonaland Central) as Ambassador to West Germany and High Commissioner to Tanzania respectively.

The acting Secretary to Parliament, Mr Laurie Moore, confirmed that both men were now required under the Constitution to resign their seats in the House of Assembly, but the Registrar-General, Mr Brian Oliver, said the method of replacing them was not clear.

The replacement procedure appears to have been blurred by the various electoral ordinances promulgated by the former Governor of Rhodesia, Lord Soames, during his four-month transitional administration.

Constitutional experts are now trying to establish whether the two parliamentary seats are to be filled by nominations based on the party list system followed in the February elections for the 80 black seats, or by means of by-elections in the two electoral provinces in which the heads of missions were elected.

Should it be ruled that the seats are to be filled by nominations by the parties to which the MPs belong, it has also to be decided whether the nominees must be the candidates whose names appear immediately below those of the departing MPs on the party lists lodged with the Registrar-General or whether they could be candidates fielded in any electoral province.

Both Mr Chambati and Mr Masango have not yet resigned from the House of Assembly, according to Mr Moore. Parliament has been told they will do so as soon as they have been "formally appointed".

The vacancy in the Assembly caused by the resignation last month of Wing Commander Rob Gaunt (RF, Highlands) is to be filled by a by-election if more than one candidate comes forward when nominations are called.

This is because the election for the 20 white seats, all captured by Rhodesian Front candidates, was conducted on a constituency system.

RIDDEL COMMISSION TO STUDY TRADE UNION STRUCTURE

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 13 Nov 80 p 2

[Text]

BULAWAYO.

ONE of the tasks of the Riddell Commission is to examine whether there should be a consistent trade union structure for all workers in the country, the chairman said here yesterday.

Mr Roger Riddell said in an interview that at present some unions were horizontal in structure—representing similar employees across a number of industries—while others were vertically structured—representing all workers in a particular firm or industry.

"I think there is a feeling that the present system is a bit of one and a bit of the other, so we are asking whether the country should have just one system or the other," he said.

Mr Riddell said the railway unions were a good example of the present diverse situation. Three of these unions gave evidence before the Commission of Inquiry on Incomes, Prices and Conditions of Service yesterday morning.

For a variety of historical reasons, there are four unions representing railway employees and a fifth representing officers.

Mr Riddell said representatives of the National Union of Railway Workers had accepted the principle of reducing the number of unions.

But Mr W. Duncan, chairman of the Amalgamated Engineering Union, said a vertically structured single union for all railway employees would have "distinct disadvantages".

The Railways Associated Workers' Union, whose membership is 9 500 of the 11 000 lower grade workers on the railways, actively supports the idea of a single union.

Mr Anderson Mhungu, RAWU secretary, told the commission that having a multiple union structure had been thought necessary "to keep the African down".

Mr Mhungu said the idea of workers' committees was a "non-starter" in the railway industry.

Racial discrimination, both in the wages structure and in attitudes, was the main complaint of the workers' committee at National Foods Ltd, in its evidence yesterday.

SUFFICIENT MAIZE, WHEAT STOCKS REPORTED

Salisbury BUSINESS HERALD in English 13 Nov 80 p 2

[Text]

ZIMBABWE has enough maize and wheat to meet increasing local demand and there are no plans to import the grains in the foreseeable future, says the administrator of the Agricultural Marketing Authority, Mr A. R. Goodwin.

He said fears of shortages had been brought by early estimates which had shown deficits of the grains. "We have enough maize to take us up to the next season," he said.

In an interview, Mr Goodwin said maize exports to neighbouring African states had been halted and imports from South Africa, which had been made in anticipation of shortages, had also been stopped.

He stressed that inspite of the large influx of returning refugees and former guerrillas, there was enough maize and wheat to go round the country.

Mr Goodwin explained that the current estimate for the 1980 maze harvest was 806 000 tonnes and 800 000 had already been delivered to the Grain Marketing Board.

Original estimates had been put at 654 000 tonnes. "We have adequate maize up to April 1981," he said.

More than 165 000 tonnes of wheat were expected to be delivered to the G.M.B. during the 1980/81 intake. The grain is a winter crop of which 96 per cent is grown under irrigation.

Wheat was all grown for local consumption but there was hope that from the coming maize crop, there would be enough surplus for exports.

O. other important crops, Mr Goodwin said there was enough coffee of which between 80 and 90 percent was being exported every year. There was also enough soya beans and ground nuts.

Estimates for the 1980/81 intake were 92 000 tonnes soya beans and 11 300 tonnes ground nuts. Figures for coffee were not yet available.

AMA is a statutory board which buys crops from farmers for local consumption and exports.

CONFEDERATION OF INDUSTRIES TO PUSH EXPORTS

Salisbury BUSINESS HERALD in English 13 Nov 80 p 2

[Text]

THE Confederation of Zimbabwe Industries is to concentrate in 1981 on the promotion of exports.

The management committee of CZI decided this policy at its recent meeting.

It is hoped that, in co-operation with the relevant government ministries, missions will be planned to countries immediately bordering Zimbabwe, and then further afield as other markets are assessed.

Mr Tony Read, chief executive of CZI, said that in the planning that would take place, cognisance would be taken of information reported back by government missions abroad. Where possible, this information would be utilised accordingly.

Mr Read would work closely with Government in that delegations going abroad seeking new business would perhaps include officials from various ministries, such as finance, foreign affairs, commerce and industry.

The CZI is committed to the expansion of industry within Zimbabwe," said Mr Read. "And it could supply the whole of Central Africa and markets further afield if given the wherewithal to carry out a controlled expansion programme and a reliable work force."

Mr Read emphasised that peace — industrial, political and military — must be maintained and was essential to future plans.

Without it contacts and contracts could be jeopardised or even lost.

He appealed to employees to be satisfied with what was being done for them at the present time, to be responsible in their outlook and to work now for the good of Zimbabwe as a whole.

"Improvements will come," he said, "albeit slowly, but certainly surely with expansion of our trade outside of Zimbabwe."

TOBACCO PRODUCTION DISAPPOINTS GROWERS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 13 Nov 80 p 9

[Text]

THE past flue-cured tobacco season had been disappointing and frustrating for growers, Mr Bert Palmer, president of the Zimbabwe Tobacco Growers' Association, said yesterday.

In a statement, he said that in spite of the drought and the abnormally low-grade tobacco that came up for offer, some excellent leaf was grown that should have sold at premium prices.

Mr Palmer was commenting on the state of the prices of flue-cured tobacco on the two Salisbury auction floors which close for the season today.

Mr Palmer said top prices were never realised until the latter part of the season.

"In consequence, nearly 50 percent of the crop was sold at 12c a kg under cost of production during the first 17 weeks of sale."

This represented a loss of about $7,5 million to growers.

The president said growers had done an extremely good job and felt badly let down by the performance on the floors.

"The fluctuating prices, conflicting and inconsistent advice from trade sources and the day-to-day variations in competition in the auction line led growers to wonder whether the present marketing system is adequate," he said.

The association was determined that such conditions would not be allowed to continue.

Growers had made a firm commitment to the country and the industry, and this attitude must also be adopted by those marketing tobacco.

"Growers cannot and will not continue to sell tobacco under the conditions that prevailed this year.

"The association will investigate changes in the marketing of their crop and, if necessary, will instigate changes to ensure stability and viable returns," Mr Palmer said.

Not only were growers discouraged by early tobacco prices, but at one stage it seemed likely that they might move to close both auction floors down.

However, prices improved later due mainly to the drought in the United States and the stabilising of the local market by limiting next year's crop.

This, coupled with extremely high prices in the United States, caused international buyers to take a fresh look at Zimbabwe's crop, Mr Palmer added.

ECONOMY HURT BY RAILWAY BOTTLENECKS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 13 Nov 80 p 1

[Article by David Linsell]

[Text]

AN apparent lack of co-operation between port, terminal and rail authorities in South Africa is causing headaches for Zimbabwe's economy.

Both imports and exports are suffering and at the moment no sign of relief appears to be on the way.

Importers in particular are suffering since they cannot quote firm arrival dates, with the result that shortages have and continue to occur.

Over 55 000 tonnes of goods are stuck in the system.

Industry sources revealed this week that although no directive has been issued by the South African Government or the various authorities involved, an unofficial go-slow is being operated over the handling of goods destined for Zimbabwe.

For instance, one company claimed this week that one shipment had just been left in sidings for 30 days and totally ignored by South African railways staff.

The sense of frustration has been heightened by what has been described as "the indiscriminate slapping of embargoes" on goods destined for countries to the north of the Limpopo.

In Zimbabwe's case shipments have been limited to petroleum products, perishable goods and fertilisers.

It is also understood that SAR will only permit the shipment of goods to this country on rolling stock owned by National Railways of Zimbabwe.

This effects not only containers, but also bulk and break-bulk cargoes.

While it is true to say that several thousand SAR trucks are in circulation in Zimbabwe, a large number of NRZ wagons are also being used by the South Africans.

But of more crucial importance is the shortage of fertilisers.

RFC Ltd, the largest supplier of fertilisers, is currently awaiting completion of delivery of 25 000 tonnes of urea — 15 000 tonnes via South Africa and 10 000 tonnes via the Mozambique capital port of Maputo.

SAR have delivered two-thirds of its bulk shipment in dribs and drabs, but a spokesman said that RFC was likely to start receiving its bagged supply from Maputo by early next week.

This should help to allay the worries of farmers who have been caught by the early start to the crop planting season.

The urea shipments are the result of a substantial increase in demands from all agricultural sectors for fertiliser, prompted in the main by the United Nations assistance programme for peasant farmers which is being handled through DEVAG.

Consequently, fertiliser companies such as RFC and Windmill have been unable to produce sufficient supplies of ammonium nitrate.

A Commercial Farmers Union spokesman said yesterday that they were aware of the current situation and monitoring events closely.

"Fertiliser has been ordered and is on its way. The position is therefore not serious at this stage, but some farmers may have to go short initially as a queue basis will be used to serve farmers," said the spokesman.

Commenting on the complaints, National Railways of Zimbabwe said delays were genuine and caused by heavy demands placed upon the railway system. Embargoes were slapped on with the full consultation of the railways authorities concerned.

SHORTAGE

An NRZ official admitted that last week 56 000 tonnes of imports were held up in South Africa, but by Tuesday this week the backlog had been reduced to 42 000 tonnes — over double the usual amount of deliveries awaited.

Truck shortages, said the official, were a major reason for delays.

We are experiencing wagon shortages on our lines caused by increased wagon turnaround time in South Africa and a reduction in the number of SAR wagons on these lines.

"In addtion, our wagons are turning around slowly in Mozambique, which is also aggravating this situation as is also our own problem of locomotive and driver shortage," said the official.

On the problem of fertiliser supplies he said: "There is an urgent need for urea and with specially nominated traffic the SAR are supplying their own wagons as required.

"As justifications are provided so we ask SAR to assist and because these have been valid they have complied with our requests up until the present time."

Ministry of Transport officials were not available for comment yesterday.

FEEDING OF DISPLACED PERSONS COSTING MILLIONS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 12 Nov 80 p 3

[Text]

THE Social Services Department was using about 140 trucks to carry food to areas where people have been resettled, a spokesman of the department said yesterday.

The department was feeding more than 800 000 people, and this figure was rising.

"We have been dealing with three different groups of people who have been affected by the war," said the spokesman.

"We have refugees who have returned from the neighbouring countries, people from the former protected villages and those who fled their homes in the rural areas for the towns."

There were about 120 000 refugees who had returned from Mozambique and 35 000 from Zambia.

The spokesman said that of the 400 000 displaced people who had fled from the rural areas into the towns during the war, a quarter had been resettled.

"The feeding exercise is costing about $3,7 million a month, but we intend to carry on with this exercise until next harvest when these people will be in a position to look after themselves," he said.

RESETTLED

There had been about 750 000 people in the protected villages, most of whom had been resettled. The resettlement of refugees, returnees and displaced people was now in its final stage, he said.

The spokesman also disclosed that the department had set up about 19 offices throughout the country for tracing relatives of refugees.

"This task has already started and last week, I visited Camp Haven to start the process of tracing relatives of the children at the centre," he said.

BRIEFS

POSSIBLE CABINET CHANGES--The Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, is said by Western diplomatic sources to be considering a Cabinet reshuffle early next year. The reshuffle could see Ministers who have handled their portfolios effectively being given greater responsibilities. Others might be demoted or dropped from the Cabinet, the sources said. Although Government officials yesterday claimed no knowledge of the planned move, diplomats felt the reshuffle might be planned to take place just before or soon after the first anniversary of independence in April. There is also widespread speculation that one Minister may soon relinquish his post for health reasons despite a denial by a high-ranking civil servant in his ministry. The Cabinet held its regular weekly meeting yesterday, but the Minister of Home Affairs, Dr Joshua Nkoma, who is on sick leave in Bulawayo, did not attend. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 12 Nov 80 p 1]

CFU MERGER ROW DENIAL--The Commercial Farmers' Union yesterday denied it was holding back or hindering moves to merge with the Zimbabwe National Farmers' Union. A spokesman for the CFU was reacting to a ZBCTV interview on Monday night in which the ZNFU president, Mr Gary Magadzire, hinted that the Commercial Union was to blame for the lack of progress on merger talks. "The CFU has willingly taken part in discussions and negotiations on the formation of one union for many months now and has met all requests from the Government for written memoranda on the subject," said the spokesman. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 12 Nov 80 p 3]

PLANS TO UNITE BUSINESS BODIES--Three business organisations in Zimbabwe have set up an interim committee to investigate the mechanics of merging by early next year. A special joint executive meeting attended by leaders of the organisations--the African Traders' Confederation, the Zimbabwe Chamber of Commerce and the Zimbabwe Businessmen's Association--was held at a Salibury hotel on Monday. It appointed a 15-member interim committee comprising five members from each organisation with a leading businessman, Dr Isaac Samuriwo, as its chairman. Dr Samuriwo said yesterday the sub-committee was charged with working out a draft constitution and the mechanics of amalgamation. A date to elect leaders of a new, unified body has yet to be announced, but Dr Samuriwo said it was expected the body "should come into being by early next year". The leaders of the three organisations are: Mr V. Mushaninga for ATC, Mr Ben Mucheche for ZCC, and Mr Jailos Munyoro, for ZIBA. After the merger, the organisations are expected to negotiate with the Associated Chambers of Commerce of Zimbabwe for the formation of one commercial body in the country. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 12 Nov 80 p 3]

ARGUS GROUP, ZIMBABWE NEWSPAPERS--The South African Argus newspaper group, which has a shareholding in Zimbabwe Newspapers, is to have talks with the Zimbabwe company. This follows the announcement by the Minister of Finance, Senator Nkala, that the Government is seeking a controlling interest in Zimbabwe Newspapers. The managing director of the Argus Company, Mr H. W. Miller, said in Johannesburg: "We will be having discussions with the Zimbabwe company and we will issue a statement as soon as we are able to do so."

ANGOLA-ZAIRE REFUGEE TALKS

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 4 Nov 80 p 8

[Text] Zairian Secretary of State for Social Affairs Kashemwa Layini Nyota Sunday night returned to his country at the end of a working visit lasting about one week to the People's Republic of Angola.

In statements given to ANGOP [ANGOLAN PRESS AGENCY], moments before his departure, Kashemwa Nyota underscored the fact that the result of his visit was positive, considering the materialization of the joint communique signed on 11 September in Kinshasa between the Angolan and Zairian delegations. The communique, he recalled, outlined the legal framework for negotiations to be carried on by both countries in an effort to implement the repatriation of Angolan and Zairian refugees.

This operation, he emphasized, is being carried out through an information drive designed to explain to the refugees of both countries the meaning behind the visit of the two delegations to places where refugees are being concentrated prior to the implementation of an accord within one or two months, as that leader pointed out. After having stressed the importance of implementing the content of the communique, to guarantee better conditions of social reintegration for the refugees, Kashemwa Nyota reported that the Office of the High Commissioner of the United Nations for Refugees is getting ready to assist in this operation and has expressed interest in the negotiations undertaken by these two countries.

PRUDENCE PREVAILS IN GUINEA-BISSAU-CAPE VERDE UNIFICATION

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 17 Oct 80 p 21

[Article: "A Prudent Step Toward Unification"]

[Text] Bissau--"Unidade Guine-Cabo-Verde" the celebration streamers proclaim this slogan of union on the squares of Bissau and Praia.

The two republics of Guinea-Bissau and Cape Verde, independent of each other, indeed insist at every opportunity--as they have done for the last 5 years--that they wish to create an organic unity between themselves.

Guinea-Bissau forms a triangle of 36.125 km^2, with 800,000 inhabitants situated between Senegal, Guinea and the Atlantic. Cape Verde is an archipelago of 10 islands, inhabited by 300,000 mestizos, distant by 500 km from the West African coast. Both countries are former Portuguese colonies.

In 1975, when Cape Verde proclaimed its independence 1 year after the end of the Guinea-Bissau war, many foreigners asked themselves why the two countries wished to unite.

Western diplomats expressed the fear that Guinea-Bissau, where guerillas had been aided by the Soviets during the war, would push Cape Verde into the socialist camp, which appeared alarming to them since the Portuguese had built two military bases on Cape Verde, a harbor at Mindelo (Sao Vicente island) in the North-West of the archipelago and an airport at Sal (North-East island of the archipelago).

As to representatives from socialist countries, they feared on the contrary to see Cape Verde pulling Guinea-Bissau towards the West since 450,000 Cape Verde emigrants live in the Western world (300,000 in the United States).

In fact, at the time, neither the Soviets nor the United States were really interested in the bases of Mindelo and Sal, but they were afraid to see them fall into the hands of their rival. Since then, according to reliable sources, it does seem that the two super powers made very discreet inquiries to gain "facilities" on these bases, but without results.

This rivalry between the blocs is an essential reason for the wish to unite in Bissau and Praia. "We are very small countries" explained Mr Pedro Pires, prime minister of Cape Verde in an interview with AFP. "As such we are vulnerable. Our combined energies would not be too much to preserve our independence."

Two approaches presented themselves, in Guinea-Bissau as well as in Cape Verde as to the ways to achieve unity. Some wanted a very quick unification. Others thought it should be done in stages. "All unions hastily proclaimed in the world have failed," they say. It is the latter approach which prevailed. The two countries therefore lived a separate existence. Each has its head of state, its National Assembly, its seat at the U.N.

On the other hand, Guinea-Bissau and Cape Verde exhibit the particularity of being directed by a single party, the "African Party of Independence of Guinea-Bissau and the Cape Verde island" (PAIGC).

Certain foreign embassies of the two countries are in common. The army also is in common because it remained, as in the times of the Guinea-Bissau war, not the army of the states, but the army of "PAIGC." Finally, the two countries coordinated their civil legislatures and founded a joint navigation business "Naguicave."

However, these achievements do not appear sufficient for the strongest union partisans. They fear to see the two countries imperceptibly drift apart by doing in divergent economic directions.

The risk exists, recognize the leaders of "PAIGC" and to forestall it the two countries coordinate their first national economic plans which will be launched in 1982. Also, the first Cape Verde constitution adopted in August by the Assembly of that country and the new Guinea-Bissau constitution which soon will be approved have been harmonized. They provide for the reciprocity of political rights for the citizens of both states.

MOZAMBIQUE, ALGERIA SIGN COOPERATION MEMORANDUM

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 23 Oct 80 p 1

[Text] Yesterday, on terminating a visit which an Algerian ministerial delegation made to our country, a cooperation memorandum was signed between Mozambique and Algeria. Prakash Ratilal, vice minister-manager of the Bank of Mozambique, signed for Mozambique and Mohamed Khouri, Algerian ambassador in Mozambique, signed for that country.

Speaking on the occasion, Prakash Ratilal alluded to the importance of signing the document which he looked upon as an instrument destined to strengthen cooperation between the two countries. The vice minister-manager of the Bank of Mozambique considered unequivocal the work elaborated by the two delegations during the discussions and said that executing the signed memoranda will be conducive to the advancement of socialism in the two countries.

On addressing the meeting, Mohamed Kouni, in turn, said that the execution of the signed memoranda will make possible a more rapid expansion of present relations between the two countries in various fields.

Talks Will Make It Possible to Strengthen Cooperation Prospects

Shortly before the departure of the Algerian delegation which left Maputo for Algeria late yesterday evening, Allaoua Smail, a delegation member, granted an interview to Mozambican information media.

During the interviews, Allaoua Smail, head of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs Office for South Africa, discussed the results finally obtained from the talks. "The conferences conducted with the Mozambican delegation," said the Algerian delegation member, "made it possible to broaden cooperation prospects which are opening up between Mozambique and Algiers."

Touching on the contacts made with several of our country's economic sectors, Allaoua Smail said that "they have helped us to acquire a wider acquaintance with and a deeper insight into the RPM situation in both the economic and social fields.

LUSOPHONE BANKING COOPERATION AGREEMENT—On closing a high level meeting held in Luanda last 21 to 23 October, the banks of Angola, Cape Verde, Guinea-Bissau, Mozambique and Sao Tome and Principe signed an agreement protocol. Delegates from these banks participated in this meeting. During the discussion, they analyzed the degree of development of the existing cooperation and, as reported by ANGOP [Angolan News Agency], took note of the results already attained from guidelines previously drawn up in banking and financial fields. According to ANGOP, the meeting made it possible to strengthen the bonds of cooperation, to improve the coordination of established activities and programs and to decide to establish the practice of regular meetings among the various bank authorities, as well as an exchange of data with the view to finding new ways of procedure in the struggle against underdevelopment. From last 19 to 21 October, ANGOP adds, the five banking delegations had already met in the Angolan capital. All the sessions had as their objective to study the means of crystalizing the resolutions made at the summit meeting in Maputo last March. INSUFFICIENT PRICES, QUOTA--Yaounde, 15 Nov (AFP)--The results obtained within the framework of the International Coffee Agreement are far from being satisfactory to producing countries. This was stressed by the Cameroonian minister of economy and planning, Mr Youssoufa Daouda, before the managing committee of the African and Malagasy Coffee Organization (OAMCAF) currently meeting in Douala, the economic capital of Cameroon. According to the minister, the guaranteed minimum prices are at a level that does not even cover the cost of production. Besides, the quota allocated to the OAMCAF within that agreement is abnormally insufficient compared to its production performance. Mr Daouda called on members of the organization to work together for the time being for the utilization of the insufficient quota allocated to them in the agreement. The president of the organization, Mr Henri Rahirijeana, emphasized that the organization refuses to accept quotas under whatever conditions, especially when they are ambiguous and unrealistic. The OAMCAF is ready to cooperate to let the system work, while at the same time looking for ways to improve its position, he added. It will open two main avenues, one for the renegotiation of the agreement and the other for the study of demand and offer of robusta coffee, he said. The OAMCAF comprises eight countries: Cameroon, the Ivory Coast, Congo, Central African Republic, Togo, Gabon, Benin and Madagascar. [Text] [AB160900 Paris AFP in French 1202 GMT 15 Nov 80]

ANGOLAN MESSAGE TO MOZAMBIQUE--Alexandre Rodrigues, member, Political Bureau, MPLA-Labor Party, and minister or interior of the People's Republic of Angola, returned to his country yesterday morning; he had been in Maputo to deliver a message from Angolan president Jose Eduardo dos Santos to his Mozambican counterpart Samora Moises Machel. Alexandre Rodrigues was seen off at Mavalane International Airport by Jacinto Veloso, member, Permanent Political Committee, Central Committee,FRELIMO Party, and security minister. In making his statements to the press shortly before emplaning, the Angolan minister said that, while in Mozambique, he also contacted government authorities for the purpose of exchanging experiences. "My journey to Mozambique was intended to deliver a personal message from our president, President Samora Machel. Since we are front line countries, we are concerned with the situation in southern Africa and particularly independence for Namibia," said Alexandre Rodrigues. PROTEST TO BELGIUM ON WEAPONS

[Excerpts] Luanda, 4 October--Angola expressed its concern to the government of the Kingdom of Belgium in view of international press reports according to which the South African racist regime has perfected the 155-mm cannon which reportedly was supplied to it by a Belgian company, thus turning the weapon into a device capable of firing nuclear missiles [projectiles].

This concern was expressed on Monday in Brussels by Angolan ambassador to Belgium Franca Van-Dunen during an audience granted on his request by the Belgian minister of foreign affairs, Charles Ferdinand Nothomb. On that occasion, the Angolan diplomat recalled that the Pretoria regime--in spite of the UN and OAU resolutions--is continuing almost daily to perpetrate barbarous acts of aggression within the internationally recognized borders of the People's Republic of Angola, causing death and injuries as well as considerable property damage.

On the other hand, Franca Van-Dunen indicated that, according to a report dated 3 July, disseminated by the embassy of the RPA [People's Republic of Angola] in Brussels, Angola intends to review relations with countries that are accomplices in the crimes of the South African racists. In this connection he stated that, if the sale of weapons should be confirmed, this would be one more flagrant violation of the rulings of international authorities since they had imposed a total embargo on this type of trade which constitutes a threat to peace and security in the region of southern Africa.

He added that such arms sales are liable to harm not only relations between Angola and Belgium but also Belgian interests in the RPA. The Angolan diplomat--who asked minister Nothomb to transmit the content of the message of the Angolan government to his government--reaffirmed that the RPA gives and will give its support to SWAPO until Namibia is independent.

WEST'S PRETORIA TIES ATTACKED

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 4 Nov 80 p 8

[Text] London, 3 October--President Jose Eduardo dos Santos of Angola, urged the West to contribute toward a peaceful transition to independence for Namibia, a territory administered by South Africa.

Speaking in Luanda on Saturday, the Angolan leader underscored the fact that, while Angola seeks a diplomatic solution to the Namibia issue, it will simultaneously continue to support the guerilla struggle of SWAPO. According to an ANGOP [ANGOLAN PRESS AGENCY] dispatch, the Angolan chief of state said that South Africa's stubbornness in negotiating an internationally acceptable peace accord is due to the Western powers which continue their ties with the authorities in Pretoria.

In connection with this, a meeting was held yesterday in the Angolan capital between the president of SWAPO, Sam Nujoma, and the chief of state of Angola, Jose Eduardo dos Santos. The meeting, which produced a joint communique, restated the support given to that nationalist organization in the fight against the government of Pretoria which illegally occupies Namibia. The document, signed by the two leaders, condemns South Africa and states that Pretoria does not wish to comply with Resolution 435 of the United Nations regarding the territory in question.

U.S. CORRUPTION IN GOVERNMENT SCORED

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 2 Oct 80 p 12

[Article by H. Matos: "Cases of Bribery in the White House"]

[Excerpts] The United States is one of the countries of the world where the most influential political personalities are constantly involved in financial scandals.

The era of these irregularities was inaugurated in 1923 with the famous "Teapot Dome" case.

Next, in terms of magnitude, came the well-known "Watergate" case. The FBI (Federal Police), through an espionage setup at the headquarters of the Democractic Party in the "Watergate" building, managed to get evidence of the link between former President Richard Milhous Nixon and "the plumbers" (a group made up of CIA agents and counterrevolutionaries of Cuban origin). This was another case of fund embezzlement for purposes of destabilization and the United States Congress tried to cover it up. But the newspaper WASHINGTON POST revived the entire procedure with a disclosure of various details on corruption. Thus, Nixon and Vice President Spiro Agnew were forced to resign from their offices.

Recently they had the "ABSCAM" scandal there when about seven members of the House of Representatives, several Senators, Representatives, and one attorney from Philadelphia were bribed.

The punishment meted out to the criminals, in the first trial held in New York, is considered light in relation to the magnitude of the crime.

This can be understood since the "Ethics Committee" of the Senate and of the House of Representatives made certain "moves" in order to divert the attention of international public opinion accusing the FBI (the accuser in this case) was using incorrect methods and having supplied the press with countless details on these bribery cases.

The United States hold the greatest record in terms of corruption in government, involving outside individuals. The credibility of American leaders has dropped considerably among the American people. According to a survey conducted by the newspaper NEW YORK TIMES, few people have have any confidence in the activities of the government team.

AGRICULTURE MINISTER VISITS U.K., COOPERATION VIEWED

Technical, Economic Cooperation Possibilities

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 2 Oct 80 pp 1, 10

[Excerpts] London (from our special correspondent Gustavo Costa)--The official visit--ending today--which the secretary of the Central Committee of the MPLA-Labor Party for Political-Ideological Education, Information, and Propaganda as well as Minister of Agriculture made to Great Britain in response to an invitation from that country's government, opened the doors for a possible implementation of a new phase of cooperation between that country and the People's Republic of Angol in the agriculture and livestock field.

This conclusion is easily arrived at by virtue of the great interest and importance assigned to the stay of the Angolan leader in the United Kingdom by various official and private authorities.

It must be recalled that this is the first Angolan government official to pay an official visit to Great Britain in response to that country's government. The references made to that visit by British authorities are based on the desire for closer cooperation between both countries.

This was further underscored by the audience granted yesterday by the British Deputy Foreign Secretary, Lord Privy Seal [as published], a personality who holds special functions and is assigned to the Queen, one of these functions being custody of her secrets, to Angolan Agriculture Minister Manuel Pacavira. During the meeting, which was attended by the permanent representative of Angola to the OIC [International Coffee Organization], Joao Weba, questions of bilateral interest were taken up in an effort to provide dynamic impetus for cooperation between the two countries.

In this connection we must also point out the declarations released yesterday afternoon by Angola's Agriculture Minister and by the Minister of State for Agriculture, Fishing, and Food, Count [Earl] Lord Ferrs, in the course of a luncheon given to the Angolan delegation in Lancaster House. On that occasion, the personalities proved to be very much in favor of a new-type cooperation which they now seek to implement. Manuel Pacavira reflected this new basis of understanding leading to a higher level of relations under the principles which guide Angola's foreign policy.

The preparation of premises leading to probable cooperation in the economic and technical areas naturally were the most outstanding aspects taken up during the conversations held by the Angolan delegation with the British authorities. In this connection we must point out the meetings held between the Minister of Agriculture and various agencies connected with agricultural and livestock activities. Continuing these contacts, the Angolan Agriculture Minister this morning had a meeting with the board of directors of the Bokker Consultant Firm whose activities are concentrated on sugar refining and other specialties. In the afternoon he attended an enlarged meeting with a big group of businessmen and representatives of various companies and associations in the field of agriculture and animal husbandry, some of whom are already operating in the country, while others expressed their desire to do so now.

In addition to the above-mentioned economic cooperation, it is important to note the significance which the Angolan side assigned to the need for this kind of cooperation to be extended to the organizational and management field.

We must likewise stress the meeting of the Agriculture Minister with representatives of companies involved in the big project of Cunene, Cahombo, and Northern Lunda as well as others whose approval and development will represent a tremendous contribution to the task of national reconstruction.

The studies to be developed between the Angolan authorities and the representatives of those companies, with a view to possible reactivation of the above-mentioned projects, are being viewed by the Angolan side with the greatest possible practicability in order to make them more viable and to implement them immediately. It must also be emphasized that, in all contacts established, the Angolan side placed special emphasis on compliance with the principles which guide the country's economic policy with a view to preserving national sovereignty and independence.

The top official responsible for Angolan information yesterday also visited the installations of BBC in London, the well-known broadcasting and television station, exchanging views with top officials on station operations.

Pacavira Interview

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 3 Oct 80 pp 1, 10

[Press Conference of Pedro Pacavira in London: "Angola Will Not Become a Factor of Instability in Southern Africa"]

> London, 2 October (from our special correspondent Gustavo Costa)--The principle of "pursuit operations" is expressed in explosive attempts at complete destabilization of southern Africa and has been implemented by the fascist regime of Pretoria; this is one of the most serious cases of persistent aggression on the international scene anywhere in the world. This statement was made this afternoon by the secretary of the Central Committee of the MPLA-Labor Party for Political-Ideological Education, Information, and Propaganda, and Angolan Minister of Agriculture, Pedro Pacavira, during a press conference in this city.

Manuel Pacavira on this occasion took the mystery out of certain distortions which the world press keeps printing about the situation in Angola; at the same time he especially exposed the broadening of the influence of South Africa in Western circles, with special interests, including Great Britain.

In the course of the press conference, which was attended by about 40 journalists from the best-known British information organs and various news agencies accredited in London, the Angolan top information official stressed the start of relations of cooperation between Angola and some Western countries while safeguarding the principles deriving from the country's international economic policy based fundamentally on reciprocal advantage, mutual respect, and independence.

Turning to the ridiculous figure of Savimbi and his companions, he said that they "remind us of the rubber balloons which children get; when those balloons are filled with hot air, they fly high, but when they lose air or when they get a hole in them, they fall down and become insignificant." Savimbi, he told his audience, is a rubber balloon or perhaps a trial balloon sent up by South Africa but he deserves no further consideration.

"South Africa," he continued, "is presently wasting billions on its armed forces and is apparently getting ready to move toward a strategy of intimidation. The tragic irony is that, in the end, apartheid only managed to isolate its own apologists in a mentality of isolation which keeps them on the sidelines away not only from their African neighbors but from the rest of the world."

Manuel Pacavira also revealed that the People's Republic of Angola will never allow itself to be intimidated. In this context, however, the Angolan leader did not fail to manifest the concern of the People's Republic of Angola in the face of the silence of certain African countries regarding the aggressions of which it is a victim.

Question-and-Answer Session

During the second part of the press conference, asked to comment on relations between Angola and Great Britain, he said that the cooperation to be established in the future will fundamentally cover the technical and commercial fields; he noted that the first Angolan Ambassador to the United Kingdom is to be appointed soon. Regarding the meeting he had with Lord Gilmore, a personality connected with the Queen, the Agriculture Minister, in his reply to a particular question, revealed that Great Britain may be making an effort to solve the problem of Namibia in view of the impressions he gathered during that audience.

In response to a question on the current status of relations between Angola and Portugal, Manuel Pacavira expressed his government's shock about the scandalous involvement of certain members of the current Portuguese government team in agreements of subversion and collusion with treacherous Angolan puppet forces. These groups--he noted with irony--seem to be dreaming of the rebirth of the old Portuguese colonial empire in Angola.

"This," he added "naturally cannot help stabilize relations with Portugal." At the end of the press conference, several journalists--one of whom was a South African, while others were British--expressed their "concern" with the situation of the mercenaries of various nationalities who were taken prisoner in Angola during the war of imperialist aggression against the country. In a rather humorous vein, the secretary of the Party's Central Committee for Political-Ideological Education, Information, and Propagada pledged himself at the disposal of those journalists, inviting them, in the name of the Angolan government, to try to arrange their probable trip to Angola in order to see for themselves what the Angolan revolution has actually done in its own defense and regarding standards that govern human rights.

OFFICIAL ADDRESSES CAUSES FOR SHORTAGE OF GOODS

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 18 Oct 80 pp 2, 10

[Editorial: "To Make A 'Minirevolution' in Certain Organizations]

Excerpts] Mendes Carvalho, alternate member of the party Central Committee, spoke last weekend in Kazenga at a rally introducing the deputies of the Luanda Provincial Popular Assembly. During his address, Carvalho brought up serious and pertinent questions which should be the object of intensive analysis by the provincial popular assembly. Although general in nature, the questions are truly serious.

We feel these questions deserve immediate answers, since they are of real concern and have given rise to some grumbling among the people. The issues can be solved satisfactorily only if attention is given to all the factors that, directly or indirectly, gave rise to the situation the country is experiencing now. If it can be said that the decline in production and productivity is the major reason for the exacerbation of that situation. To orient the reader, it might perhaps be pertinent to repeat the questions posed by the Central Committee alternate member during the Kazenga rally.

After pointing out various problems connected with the question of popular government, Mendes de Carvalho asked the people gathered there that Sunday morning, 12 October, the following questions.

"There is no fish. Why is there no fish? There is no meat. Why is there no meat? There is no ambulance to transport the sick. Why is there no ambulance? There is no beer. Why is there no beer? And so it goes. Basically, all the people are asking themselves: Why are all things unavailable? And none of us can say why there is no meat, beer, ambulances and so on."

The speaker did not expect the crowd to answer the questions. His purpose was to alert the deputies of the Luanda People's assembly, who will have the responsibility of examining in detail the basic problems behind these frustrating shortages.

If anyone were to ask the respective ministers for their replies to these questions, they would all give the same answer: Difficulties deriving from the situation the country is experiencing now. It is a vague answer, but it is the one we usually hear. In effect, it is this response which has given rise to the phenomena which are considered secondary, but which, directly or indirectly, have greatly aggravated the situation, to the benefit of an insignificant few, thanks to their position or social standing, while the majority are fighting the lines, trying to buy one thing or another. Among the phenomena generally considered secondary (because it is to the interest of a few people that they be considered secondary) are the following:

Exaggerated [appropriation of products for] personal consumption; the existence of several special stores; and "social subornation" (for which read favoritism to friends).

Actually, if it were rationally distributed and marketed, the little that we produce and the large amount that we import would not present any major problems for the population, since the "speculation" phenomenon would be eliminated.

Unbridled Personal Consumption and Favoritism

It seems to us that one of the biggest problems is the inability of certain firms that produce various consumer goods to limit the amount their employees may appropriate for their own use. Although it has received very little attention on the part of government organs, it is a dangerous problem, a cause of the unbridled speculation occurring in Luanda.

A minirevolution in the management of our companies and in the domestic market distribution channels would lay bare the truth.

Special Stores

It is really up to the Ministry of Domestic Trade, which is solely responsible for the existence of a wide variety of special stores in Luanda, to justify the concerns that determined the establishment of these stores.

We think we are making a revolution, and we understand this to mean a dynamic process that develops progressively from lesser to greater degree. This would lead one to understand that the situation in the first 3 years of our independence was not the same as the situation we are living in today. Things change, according to the new demands inherent to a revolution.

To compare yesterday's situation with that of today is, to a certain extent, to misunderstand the dynamism of a historical process. We observe that in the capital of the People's Republic of Angola there are several special stores catering to members of different strata, distinguished according to their function, situation or social position. Thus, in Luanda, we find: Shoe store for...Tailor for... Grocery store for...Butcher shop for...etc. A normal butcher shop serving the general public generally has 2 to 3 kg of meat for sale. This is just one example, but let us combine this example with the phenomenon of favoritism, which we prefer to call "social subornation."

Yesterday, 17 October, we went around to the Luanda slaughterhouse, and for a few minutes we watched the movement we had heard about for so long. There were all kinds of cars: Fiats, Mercedes Benz, Datsuns, Scanias, etc. Each individual introduced himself as the cousin of comrade so-and-so, nephew of the national director or such-and-such, and so on. Some of them presented cards, others presented official requisitions, or unofficial requisitions, and some simply said: "So-and-so sent me."

You ask why there is no meat? Again, we need a minirevolution to investigate these phenomena.

No Fish in Luanda

The TPA (Popular Television of Luanda) recently conducted a public opinion survey and study in Luanda, to ascertain the reason for the fish shortage in the capital. It seems to us that it was pointless, because it reached no conclusions. We do not think the isolated fisherman is equipped to provide a satisfactory explanation for the fish shortage, and the profiteering vendor would certainly not be disposed to tell the truth.

The situation can be summed up in one phrase, which is now widespread in the city: "Make a killing." We will explain. We went to the Sao Paulo market and asked a vendor the price of a pile of mackerel he had for sale. He asked us in turn: "Want to die?" In other words, were we prepared to pay more than the normal price for that pile of fish. In short, the vendors, the fishermen and some officials in the Ministry of Fishing want to be rich. A minirevolution, from the fishing boats to the markets, including agencies involved in the marketing of fish in the city, would give up the answer to the fish shortage.

These phenomena which some officials call secondary (because it suits them), added to the basic problem of the decline in production and productivity, seem to be at the bottom of the present situation. Actually, with rational distribution, the little that we produce and the great amount we import would be enough to feed all our people. We need to conduct a minirevolution in certain agencies.

FAPLA POLITICAL CADRES MAKE RECOMMENDATIONS

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 17 Sep 80 p 2

[Excerpts] Ondjiva (From our correspondent). The Fourth Methodological Seminar of Political Commissars of the Fifth-Military Region was held recently in the capital of this province; the meeting featured a party activity review covering the first teaching semester of the year 1980-1981 and an evaluation of the positive results obtained, concerning the study and practical application of these subjects in all units, as well as the delivery of documents on methodological guidance aimed at the better standardization of work criteria during the next phase.

Other aspects debated during the meeting included prior indications as to the forms and methods of agitation and propaganda to be developed by the Political Commissars, as well as registration for political lecture sessions in the military units.

The final conclusions indicated that the participants noted the standardization of reports and the need for true and correct reports as to the real situation pertaining in the major and minor military units as well as the difficulties in facilitating their correction in an organized manner. It was also said that a commission should be established for the purchase of political work support material.

The Political Commissars also recommended to the brigades stationed in the Fifth Region that they set up a team to serve as links between them and the political directorate, considering the locality in which the particular unit is stationed; this calls for the creation of minimum conditions for their welfare, in addition to matters relating to health. In this connection it was recommended to the Region's medical services that they conduct frequent medical inspections.

We might also mention that the closing session was chaired by comrade Jeronimo Sinedima, alternate member, Central Committee, and coordinator of the party committee of Cunene.

CUBAN COMMUNIST PARTY MESSAGE ON NETO ANNIVERSARY

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 17 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] The Embassy of the Republic of Cuba in the People's Republic of Angola addressed a message to the Central Committee of the MPLA-Labor Party from the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Cuba on the first anniversary of the death of Comrade President Agostinho Neto.

In view of the important content of the message from the Communist Party of Cuba, we reproduce its entire contents below:

"On the first anniversary of the death of the beloved and unforgettable Comrade President Agostinho Neto, we send to the Angolan people and to the MPLA-Labor Party, in the name of the people and the Communist Party of Cuba, our sincerest and warmest feelings of brotherhood and revolutionary solidarity.

"As a result of the death of comrade Neto, your people lost its national hero and leader and the Cuban people lost a sincere and brotherly friend. As a result of his death, the African revolutionary movement also found itself deprived of one of the most clear-sighted and valorous fighters for the independence and liberty of that continent.

"The teachings and the wishes of comrade Agostinho Neto are today being perpetuated among the Angolan people in its work, in its gains and advances along the road charted by him during his lifetime and as a result of the work of your unforgettable president. He is present in each victory, in each gain of the people who continues to fight energetically and firmly to build a more fair and dignified society which comrade Agostinho Neto saw in outline and for which he fought.

"Dear Angolan comrades, we ask you to receive, at this moment of mandatory memory and revolutionary affirmation, the expression of our firm and unrestricted solidarity."

OFFICIALS STRESS IMPORTANCE OF RURAL ASSISTANCE

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 25 Sep 80 p 2

[Excerpts] The Second Meeting of Provincial Commissioners of Angola, which was held for 2 days at the Ministry of Agriculture, ended its activities on Tuesday in a ceremony presided over by Evaristo Domingos Kimba, member, Party Political Bureau, and Minister of Provincial Coordination.

The officials at the end of the meeting urged the appropriate agencies to take measures to meet the needs of the population in the fields of agriculture, housing, transportation, water, and electricity.

Discussing the life of the people in the rural areas, the meeting decided to assign great importance to the distribution of seeds and fertilizer to peasants and to providing incentives for the sale of daily necessities. It was also decided to pay more attention to local, on-the-spot construction efforts in rural areas and to control such local self-help activities in the cities.

"The revitalization of some industries in the provinces of Cunene, Cabinda, Kuando-Kubango, and Moxico" was another one of the decisions adopted by this Second Meeting of Provincial Commissioners in analyzing their activities over the past three quarters of this year and outlining tasks to be accomplished in 1981.

As for the supply of water and electric energy to the population, it was agreed that the effort should be stepped up here through the training of cadres for equipment maintenance.

Considering the importance of support for the rural areas, Evaristo Kimba, minister of provincial coordination and member, Political Bureau, MPLA-Labor Party, said that "Support for the rural areas in terms of hoes, machetes, tractors, fertilizer, and the sale of their products will be the materialization of the worker-peasant alliance so that the revolution may continue its triumphant march."

ESTABLISHMENT OF CENSUS DEPARTMENT REPORT

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 23 Sep 80 pp 1, 11

[Text] The Central Census Office, an important instrument in the country's population census, has just been established, according to a recent report from the Planning Ministry, signed by the Minister himself, Roberto de Almeida, member, Party Central Committee.

We remember that the Central Commission for the General Population Census, during its 24 July meeting of this year, thoroughly analyzed the problems connected with the establishment of this central office and decided, next year, to carry out a pilot census in some areas in the province of Malanje. It was established on that occasion that there would be a pilot census program likewise to be extended in 1982 to the province of Luanda.

It was emphasized however that the implementation of these pilot programs in the provinces of Malanje and Luanda are primarily aimed at giving the Central Census Commission a specific and overall view regarding the matter, which would later on enable it to extend the census process nationwide, a task scheduled for 1985 [as published].

The choice of Luanda and Malanje as the centers of the first trial runs on the population census was above all based on two factors which have directly to do with their importance in the context of agricultural and lifestock development, in the case of Malanje, and the heavy population density, in the case of Luanda, as well as its progress in terms of industrial development.

In order successfully to carry out the first population census in the People's Republic of Angola, it will be necessary to mobilize about 25,000 census takers, mostly made up of students and teachers. Their success will also depend upon the attitudes of the working masses in supplying sufficient information to serve as basis for the determination and analysis of the makeup of the classes in the People's Republic of Angola and the preparation of a national development plan; these are conditions that are indispensable for the construction of socialism.

It is furthermore recalled that the Census Commission consists of the Ministers of Planning (Chairman) of Defense, of Interior, of Education, of Provincial Coordination, of Transportation and Communications, of Finance, and of Justice, as well as the Secretary of State for Housing.

The report from the Planning Minister revealed the name of the individuals who make up the Central Census Office. Luis Filipe Nery de Sousa Colaco, National Statistics Director, will be its national coordinator. The other members are Maria Candida Santos Lopes, Director, Planning Office, Ministry of Education; Alvaro da Paixao Franco, Director, Institute of Geodesy and Cartography, Ministry of Defense; Adriano Pereira dos Santos Junior, National Director, Social Services, Ministry of Provincial Coordination; Agostinho Raimundo de Sousa e Santos, National Director, Human Resources, Ministry of Construction; Daniel Simoes Ladeira Garcia, Head, Department of Archives of Proceedings and Real Estate Registers, Ministry of Interior; and Passos Carneiro, Head, National Department of Civilian and Criminal Identification, Ministry of Justice.

LUANDA PORT 1981 TECHNICAL-ECONOMIC PLAN

Launda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 18 Oct 80 p 3

[Excerpts] The workers of the commercial port of Luanda met yesterday afternoon in the dining room of their enterprise to review the 1981 technical-economic plan. After a broad discussion by the meeting, the plan was approved with some amendments. The plan calls for handling 881,200 tons of cargo, repairs on railroad lines, roads, and parks, equipment and warehouses, procurement of other materials that will influence the accomplishment of these goals, improvement of the social conditions of the workers, construction of a school for cadre training, expansion of piers (upper part) and workshops, as well as other means which will facilitate a certain modernization and efficiency of work done in this unit which is considered the country's backbone due to its significance and importance in the national economic balance.

The meeting was also attended by Galvao Branco, Assistant Secretary-General of UNTA [National Union of Workers of Angola]; Faustino Muteka, Minister of Transportation and Communications; as well as other personalities connected with the transportation sector and the labor union in this sector.

The meeting was opened by Carlos Magalhaes, director of the commercial port of Luanda. Details and statistics were disclosed on the 1981 technical-economic plan which calls for the consumption of raw materials and secondary materials as well as the wage plan, given in thousands of Kwanzas, manpower, cooperation, investments, repairs, roads, and office equipment which, at the end of the fiscal year being reported upon, if activities developed as anticipated, will guarantee a profit of 237,120.00 Kwanzas for the general government budget.

Proposals for corrections in the plan were also submitted to the workers for their consideration, under the heading of procurement of spare parts for machinery, generators to eliminate the electric power supply failures which have forced vessels to stay in the port beyond the deadlines anticipated, the laxity of certain government agencies in removing commodities unloaded and shipping them out. The discussion which was open and frank also noted the concern of the workers with the improvement of social conditions, as in the case of suitable work uniforms and supplies of consumer goods and industrial articles--one of the main causes of absenteeism.

Other issues presented and pointed up as being priority matters for the accomplishment of the 1981 technical-economic plan included an increase in the political awareness of the workers, so that they might increasingly better understand the importance of this port facility in the national reconstruction process, in connection with economic growth, and as a point of loading and unloading articles that benefit the people of the country.

Working Class Awakening to Country Leadership

In briefly explaining the objectives of the meeting, Galvao Branco drew a comparison between the current system of political orientation created by the party and the government and the system implemented prior to independence by the colonial regime.

The Angolan labor union leader emphasized the fact that the workers today have the right and the duty actively to participate in the discussion of problems relating to the life of the country, the plans which will permit its development, and, consequently, the solution of problems which beset the worker masses. "Now things are in line with our option," he said in conclusion.

The Assistant Secretary-General of UNTA also expressed considerations relating to the role of man in the production process, as a decisive force in the development of production, not as a machine unaware of everything that happens around him, particularly regarding output.

After another period of discussion--during which other workers spoke up, likewise presenting proposals for the amendment of the 1981 technical-economic plan in the commercial port of Luanda--the Minister of Transportation and Communications took the floor.

Faustino Muteka began by saying that the plan was drafted on the basis of the figures from earlier years and, on the other hand, with a view to some deficiencies in equipment, spare parts, as well as cargo-handling materials to guarantee the correct handling of cargo, not only export and import, but also other items necessary for the defense of the human life of the workers.

Other points taken up by Faustino Muteka related to the fact that the enterprises of the Ministry of Transportation and Communications let others handle their recording functions which prevents precise calculations on the number of goods to be exported through the port; this does not enable the authorities to come up with a real plan featuring correct indicators, although it is necessary to work on the basis of a specific plan.

"The development of a country's economy necessitates the working capacity of its people, the exploitation of mineral and energy resources, the production of essential foods for the people, because that is what really gives us the money with which the government, through party guidelines, must purchase everything we do not produce ourselves," the Minister of Transportation and Communications emphasized in explaining the investment methods and their approval on a higher level in the government.

The solution of supply problems encountered by the port and railroad workers as well as public transportation workers was also discussed.

NEW RADIO PROGRAM BEAMED TO PEASANTS, RURAL WORKERS

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 17 Oct 80 p 1

[Article by S. Fialho: "Listening to and Disclosing the Problems of Rural Areas"]

[Text] Through a document signed by Agriculture Minister Manuel Pedro Pacavira, the Ministry of Agriculture recently created a commission responsible for drafting and developing an information program in support of the rural areas (Radio-Rural) in accordance with a protocol signed in Lome, with the FAO, the United Nations Food and Agricultural Organization.

The "Radio-Rural" program as a matter of fact will be an instrument of information to be used by the agencies of the MPLA-Labor Party and the government of the People's Republic of Angola, especially created to listen to the concerns of peasants and farm workers in the country. It will therefore be a nationwide program and will cover the rural areas and the cities [passages missing in original] with a view to developing the best and fairest solutions to the specific and vast problems of the former.

Right now, the commission is preparing for the official implementation of its inaugural radio broadcast (this month) over the antennas of National Radio of Angola, in the Portuguese language as well as in Kikongo and Kimbundo.

Later on, the program will be broadcast, on an experimental basis, on Thursdays and Fridays, from 1830 to 1900, in Kikongo and Kimbudo, respectively, with a review on Saturdays, from 0700 until 0730 in the Portuguese language.

It should be noted that the commission, coordinated by Luisa Ingles, under the control and guidance of DEPPI, of the MPLA-Labor Party, through its division of agitation and propaganda, is being advised by an expert from the FAO by the name of Atayde Guedgbe Leon, from Benin, and consists of various other individuals assigned to the Ministry of Agriculture.

We will come back to this matter with more information in greater detail at the proper time.

BRIEFS

SMUGGLERS SENTENCED--The revolutionary court of the province of Luanda yesterday handed down a sentence in the trial of seven individuals who fraudulently tried to return baggage to Portugal. The criminals involved consist of five Portuguese and two Angolans who, with photocopies of the shipping documents, made out in the names of other persons, some of whom were in Portugal, tried to ship personal baggage to that country. Since this is considered a crime against the national economy and since it is punished under the provisions of the law in force in the People's Republic of Angola, the people's revolutionary court of Luanda, in the name of the Angolan people, sentenced Felisberto Jose de Lima, Portuguese citizen, to 2 years at hard labor; Joao Aparicio Nunes and Joaquim Peixoto, both Portuguese, were sentenced to 18 months; Manuel Pires da Mota and Belmira Ambrozio de Sousa, the first of these being Portuguese and the latter being Angolan, were sentenced to 16 months in prison. The criminals Antonio Andre, a citizen of Angola, and Manuel da Costa Ribeiro were cleared by the people's revolutionary court since there was no evidence against them. SPANISH BANKING DELEGATION--A delegation from the Foreign Bank of Spain, consisting of four members and headed by its assistant general manager, Dr Casuso Dosada, has been in Luanda since Wednesday evening to establish contact with officials of the BNA (National Bank of Angola). The visit by the Spanish delegation is a part of the contacts established between the two banks in an effort to achieve stronger and closer bilateral relations. The Spanish delegation was welcomed at the "4 February" International Airport by the governor of the National Bank of Angola, Victor de Carvalho, and the Spanish Ambassador to Angola, Emilio Cassinello. CUBAN-ASSISTED CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS--The city of Luanda will get more than 100 new buildings, adding up to 2,000 apartments, under the cooperation agreement in the field of construction signed between Angola and the Republic of Cuba. Under the terms of this agreement 85 buildings are also going to be erected, equivalent to 1,700 apartments, in the provinces of Huambo, Benguela, Bie, Moxico, and southern Kwanza. These new housing units will be intended for cooperation personnel and will help reduce some of the problems encountered by provincial commissioners in putting up certain officials. A contract was also signed between Angola and Cuba for the foundation of the mosaic factory at Huila and a stone-crushing plant at Bie; in an effort to train cadres, the recently signed agreement calls for training courses to be given in Cuba to eight basic laboratory technicians for a period of 3 months. The fact that the agreement covers only certain provinces does not in any way mean that the others will not get any new facilities since the Construction Ministry is planning to build new housing units in all provinces of the country, but through domestic enterprises. DELEGATION TO PEACE MEETING--The Angolan delegation attending the World Parliament of Peace for Peoples is to be headed provisionally by Anjo Eduardo, of the Ministry of Foreign Relations; the delegation will also be joined by Coelho da Cruz, president of the Angolan Association of Friendship with Peoples, which has been in that country for several days. Angola's participation in this parliament is all the more justified since the RPA [People's Republic of Angola] has been fighting for the maintenance of the peace not only in southern Africa but also for the independence of Namibia, a matter which is fundamental here. Comrade Jose Eduardo dos Santos, chairman of the party and president of the republic, as well as the late lamented president Agostinho Neto, in their speeches placed particular emphasis on the need for making sure that all peoples will live in freedom and will choose their own destinies, something which is possible only when there is real independence. But the desire for peace, always manifested by the leaders of our vanguard party, the MPLA-Labor Party, has been opposed by the warlike and militarist attitudes of Pretoria, subsidized by the imperialist countries, especially the United States of America. The issue of peace, a real peace, a secure and lasting peace, is a matter of concern not only to our people but to all peoples of the world and it is one of the points most frequently focused upon in regard to the pertinent issues of our times; this is because it is necessary to protect mankind against the deflagration of a new conflict, this time a nuclear one, on a worldwide scale. JOINT COMMISSION WITH USSR--A delegation from the Soviet Union, headed by B. A. USSR DELEGATION LEAVES--The work of the Mixed Angolan-Soviet Commission, which began on 19 September, ended the day before yesterday in the office of the Secretariat of State for Cooperation in Luanda. Soviet Vice Minister of Merchant Marine Boris Yunitsin, who headed the delegation from the [illegible passage in original], which participated in the work of the Mixed Commission, left Angola on Monday, heading back to Moscow. Questioned by ANGOP [ANGOLAN PRESS AGENCY] moments before his departure, Boris Yunitsin termed the conversations held with Angolan officials regarding the review of implementation of decisions approved during the second meeting of the Mixed Angolan-Soviet Commission positive; the meeting covered the field of transportation and was held in the capital of the USSR in August of last year. The Soviet Vice Minister expressed his optimism regarding the development of cooperation between the two countries in the area of the merchant marine before noting that cooperation in that field contributed to closer bonds of friendship between the peoples of Angola and the Soviet Union. During its stay in Angola, the delegation went to the province of Benguela, where it visited for 48 hours. In that province, the delegation especially went to the commercial port of Lobito where it was briefed on its organization and operation. KEREKOU DELIVERS SPEECH ON SOLUTION TO CHAD PROBLEM

Cotonou EHUZU in French 17 Oct 80 pp 1, 6, 8

[Text] Our great comrade, President Mathieu Kerekou, left Cotonou late yesterday morning for Lome for the purpose of participating in the work being conducted by the ad hoc committee of the Organization of African Unity in its quest for a state of peace in Chad.

The head of state was greeted on his departure by the members of the Central Committee of the People's Revolutionary Party of Benin, the members of the Permanent Committee of the ANR and those of the National Executive Council as well as by the diplomatic corps and a large crowd of male and female revolutionary militants.

Shortly before his departure, President Mathieu Kerekou issued an important statement to the press dealing with the Chad problem.

In fact, after having pointed to the dramatic situation faced by Chad, our great comrade, President Mathieu Kerekou, took the opportunity of reminding us of the position of our country, the People's Republic of Benin, with respect to the objective settlement of the Chad problem by the Organization of African Unity.

"The delegation of our party and of our revolutionary government will leave Cotonou on Thursday, 16 October 1980, bound for Lome for the purpose of attending the meeting of the ad hoc committee of the Organization of African Unity dealing with Chad. As you know, fellow journalists, male and female militants of the Benin revolution, the situation that has prevailed in Chad since 1975 remains a cause for concern. This is especially true since 21 May 1980 when bitter fratricidal fighting became intensified at N'Djamena, capital of this sister nation and friend, where the National Transitional Union Government, which was installed in accordance with the provisions of the agreement signed at Lagos on 21 August 1979 by the 11 rival political factions was confronted by the armed rebellion of one of the leaders of the factions which had signed this agreement at Lagos, created a deplorable situation. This situation prevented the legal authority of Chad, namely, the National Transitional Union Government, headed by our brother Goukouni Oueddei, from pursuing the mission of national reconciliation, particularly achieving demilitarization of N'Djamena, the capital, and the installation of the neutral African force for maintaining peace in Chad.

It should be remembered that the troops of this neutral African force for maintaining peace at N'Djamena was supposed to consist of contingents furnished by the Congo Peoples' Republic, the Guinea Revolutionary Peoples' Republic, and our own country, the Benin Peoples' Republic. However, this neutral African force could effectively fulfill its mission at N'Djamena only after the cease fire recommended by the Lagos accord had been made effective. However, all of these decisions that were made at the Lagos meeting and which were agreed to by the representatives of 11 political factions for the purpose of bringing peace to Chad, except for the constitution of the National Transitional Union Government, were not implemented because of the bitter and, up to now, relentless opposition of a leader of one of the political factions, who is also defense minister of the National Transitional Union Government.

The Council of Ministers, the conference of heads of state and the administration of the Organization of African Unity, meeting in June and July 1980 at Freetown, Sierra Leone, conducted a thorough analysis of the new situation which had thus been created in Chad and particularly at N'Djamena since 21 March 1980. They once again reaffirmed the validity of the Lagos agreement and asked the ad hoc committee that was created at Lagos during the economic summit meeting held by the Organization of African Unity in April 1980, to pursue its mission of reconciliation with Chad.

The ad hoc committee working under the effective control of the acting president of the Organization of African Unity, His Excellence Siaka Stevens, consists, as you know, of the heads of state of the Togolese Republic, the Guinea Revolutionary People's Republic, the Congo People's Republic and the Benin People's Republic.

Therefore, this means that the scrupulous observance of the Lagos accord, signed on 21 August 1979 by 11 Chad political factions, remains, as far as the ad hoc committee is concerned, the only legal basis for any solution that could bring peace to Chad. We insist on this interpretation, since it is on this basis that the delegation of the Benin People's Republic will go to Lome. This is why it is important that our militant working people know that the Lome meeting, to which the delegation of our party and our revolutionary government is invited, must seek the most appropriate ways and means to arrive at a cease fire among the belligerent political factions in order to accomplish effective implementation of all the provisions of the agreement signed at Lagos on 21 August 1979. To put it clearly, the Lome meeting planned for Thursday, 16 October 1980, is entirely in keeping, in our belief, with the patient search for an adequate framework of conciliation in order to bring the rebellious faction to recognize the authority of the legal government throughout the entire national territory.

At any rate, we must do everything in our power at Lome so that this fratricidal war, which is worrying all of us to death, should be resolved in a fair manner as soon as possible within the Organization of African States itself. We citizens of Benin refuse to allow the Chad conflict to become an international concern. We are dead set against the arrival of the United Nations blue helmets at N'Djamena. We feel this way because there is no doubt that, not only does this dramatic situation dangerously threaten the unity of our brothers, the people of Chad, and the integrity of their national territory, but also provides a definite opportunity which international imperialism is seeking so as to cynically pursue its policy of dividing and conquering. For all of these fundamental reasons, our country, the Benin People's Republic, is available without reservation and is ready to attempt any fair solution that could bring a cease fire condition as soon as possible to Chad, provided such cease fire is based on the Lagos agreement signed on 21 August 1979.

In any case, the issue is clear to all citizens of Benin, namely, that without the cease fire and demilitarization of N'Djamena as well as without the accord of the National Transitional Union Government, it would be impossible to send to Chad a neutral African force for maintaining the peace. This is why we must do everything in our power at Lome so that all the attempts at reconciliation that have been unsuccessfully made since the outbreak of this armed fratricidal conflict finally lead to results which are concrete, fair and satisfactory to all the people of Chad. Therefore, we solemnly reaffirm, in the name of all the hard-working people of Benin, of its vanguardist party, the Benin People's Revolutionary Party and of the National Executive Council, the complete availability of our country, the Benin People's Republic and our firm determination to work in the all-important interest of unity of our brothers and sisters of Chad and of the territorial integrity of Chad within the exclusive framework of our continental organization, namely, the Organization of African States.

It should be kept in mind, that, in the Togolese capital, the ad hoc committee of the Organization of African Unity on the Chad problem, as well as the entire organization, working together with the Chad leaders, will seek the appropriate solutions for the long awaited advent of peace in Chad. Regarding the Chad leanings, he who will reject the proposals of this ad hoc committee of the Organization of African Unity will, consequently, appear to the African people as the demon of Chad unity and the sworn enemy of our entire continent. The nation and the people of Chad require peace. In the interest of Africa, their leaders should know this.

PUBLIC SAFETY FORCES EXAMINE THEIR ACTIVITIES

Cotonou EHUZU in French 16 Oct 80 pp 3-4

[Text] On Saturday, 11 October and Sunday, 12 October 1980, a meeting was held by members of the Revolutionary Committees of the Public Safety Forces at the Cotonou Republican Strike Company for the purpose of examining their activities.

As in the case of the opening session, the closing ceremony of this meeting was chaired by Comrade Martin Dohou Azonhiho, deputy chief of staff of the Public Safety Forces.

Comrade Sindjaloum Bernard, meeting coordinator, who was the first to speak at the ceremony began by describing the conditions under which the work of this miniseminar was conducted.

Comrade Sindjaloum, after having pointed out the atmosphere of good fellowship that reigned throughout the meeting, indicated that sessions devoted to criticism and self-criticism led to the drafting of five resolutions and two motions which will henceforth guide the actions to be taken by the agents of the Public Safety Forces of our country. The following resolutions and motions were then read to the audience:

--A resolution dealing with the cleaning up of morals and the struggle against prostitution.

--A resolution concerning the struggle against subversive activities within the UNB.

--A resolution dealing with police ethics and relations between the agents of the Public Safety Forces and government authorities.

--A resolution regarding corruption.

--A motion involving the Ministry of Information and Propaganda and the Ministry of the Interior and Public Safety for the purpose of their cooperating in an effort to make the public aware of the damage caused by prostitution and of its consequences to our nation.

A motion concerning the lethargy displayed by the Public Safety Forces in exercising its activities.

After the reading of these resolutions and motions, Comrade Martin Dohou Azonhiho, deputy chief of staff of the Public Safety Forces, took the floor to evaluate the results achieved during this meeting.

In his presentation, Comrade Martin Dohou Azonhiho described the resolutions adopted at this meeting as being of a highly positive nature due to the excellent quality of the work performed. He stated that he was convinced that complete and proper application of these resolutions would contribute to imparting of new strength to the revolution in the various barracks and cause it to progress irreversibly and irresistibly among the masses in our towns and villages.

Comrade Martin Dohou Azonhiho also placed special emphasis on the former reactionary practices which have always been characteristic of the actions taken by the Public Safety Forces in the barracks and stated that the resolutions recommended would certainly lead to termination of such practices. Comrade Azonhiho went on to say "The action taken by your assembly will not have any meaning unless the resolutions adopted and recommended by you are implemented."

Accordingly, Comrade Azonhiho assured the Public Safety Forces of the complete availability of the higher courts, authorized by the general staff of the Public Safety Forces for their deep concern in evaluating these resolutions objectively and translating them into action.

The deputy chief of staff of the Public Security Forces congratulated the members of the seminar for the courage, the militancy and the continuous availability which they displayed during these 2 days of the meeting with a view to continuing the dynamic state of the revolutionary committees of the Public Safety Forces.

JUDICIAL AGREEMENT WITH GDR--This morning, in the Cape Verde capital, Cape Verde signed a judicial agreement with the GDR. The signing of the agreement took place during the 4-day visit to Cape Verde of the vice president of the executive council and GDR minister of justice, Hans Joachim Hensiger. The GDR envoy told ANOP [Portuguese News Agency] that the agreement is essentially based on the judicial situation of each country's citizens in the other's territory. The GDR minister, who was greeted by President Aristides Pereira, and visited the Fire Islands, Santiago and Sal, then left for Guine-Bissau where he will make a short stop. Cooperation between Cape Verde and the GDR has occurred in the fields of cadre training, science and technology, culture, education, justice and information, and includes the supplying of heavy offset machinery. German teachers in the science field will arrive in Cape Verde this month to occupy the university chairs in cadre training for secondary and higher education. They will contribute their services beginning in November 1979 in Praia and confer the bachelor's degree. [Text] [Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 22 Oct 80 p 8] 8870

EEC REPRESENTATIVE OUTLINES AID TO DJIBOUTI

Djibouti LA NATION DJIBOUTI in French 9 Oct 80 p 6

[Article by Donato Chiarini: "The Republic of Djibouti and the European Community"]

> [Text] The gift of tanker trucks by the EEC to the victims of the drought gives us the opportunity to look somewhat closely at the aid given Djibouti by the European Development Fund. It would hardly be possible to find a more authoritative view than that of Donato Chiarini, the current representative of the EEC in Djibouti. Following is his report recently published in LE COURRIER, the bimonthly published by the EEC.

Within the framework of the EEC's aid to overseas territories, the former TFAI (French Territory of the Afars and Issas) had already benefited from the financing of various projects following the creation of the European Development Fund. Nevertheless, this aid, received through the intermediary of the French administration, was restricted to basic infrastructures and could have been considered as simple budgetary aid to the territory. After the country gained its independence and the Republic of Djibouti was born, in June 1977, relations between it and the European Community had to be reconsidered or, rather, rediscovered. In fact, one of the first decisions made by the Djibouti government was to file an official request for the participation in the Lome 1 Convention. Attached to this request was an invitation addressed to the commission asking it to send on an urgent basis an initial exploratory mission to Djibouti. The purpose of the mission, described as preprogramming, was to review with the national leadership the overall most urgent problems facing the young state and to identify the priority areas which could benefit from an initial and immediate aid.

An initial project for the delivery of drilling equipment was adopted, thus meeting the prime concern of the chief of state, His Excellency El Hadji Hassan Gouled Aptidon of accelerating the hydraulic research program aimed at fighting water shortages and thus alleviating the living conditions of the rural population. In addition to this timely intervention, however, the new government immediately realized that the essential problem was drafting a document in depth, a sort of pre-plan, which would allow, on the basis of a short but complete inventory of the realities of the country, the drawing up of a short-term action program. Considering the number and dimensions of the needs it would have been difficult, if not impossible, to act efficiently without such an instrument, bearing in mind the available human and financial resources. Aware of the situation, the commission was pleased by the Djibouti request and the drafting of a "short and medium-term development plan" was assigned to SEDES (Economic and Social Development Studies Company). Following its publication, this document has made it possible to channel foreign aid as well as, naturally, the resources of the national development budget.

The main feature of the aid granted under Title 4 of the European Development Fund is that of a "catalyzer." In an economy dominated by the tertiary sector, the safeguard and strengthening of the infrastructures which constitute the very foundations of the birth of the city of Djibouti (port, railroad to Addis Ababa) are the features which determine the country's economic future.

The formulation of a master plan for the port, encompassing, on the one hand, all available sectorial studies and which, on the basis of sound economic hypotheses, defines, on the other hand, the future installations to be built in order for Djibouti to preserve all its advantages in the face of the growing competition of other ports in the area (Assab, Aden, Hadeidah, Berbera, Djeddah), is a typical example of the role which the aid of the community could play in preparing the grounds for investments financed by other countries. Several Arab financing sources have already displayed an interest in participating in the development of infrastructures and the building of the equipment stipulated in this study. In addition to productive investments, the national authorities have put high in their list of priorities aid in the social area. In a country in which over one-half of the population lives in the capital city in sometimes unhealthy conditions, this choice remains entirely valid. Nevertheless, in this case as well, any effective intervention should be based on a profound study of needs and realities. Therefore, two parallel studies have been undertaken. The purpose of the first will be to draw up a civic plan taking into consideration expected population changes between now and the year 2000. The second deals with the formulation of a health care plan. The value of this study, the obvious national interest excluded, is explained by the role filled by Djibouti as a regional center attracting the populations of neighboring countries living close to its borders. The specific participation of other financing sources has been already more or less obtained for both studies.

Let us finally mention a training program which, even though modest, confirms the concern shown for this area by the government and which is an indispensable addition to other community involvements (port, rural water supplies, vocational training, etc.).

EEC DONATION TO DROUGHT VICTIMS

Djibouti LA NATION DJIBOUTI in French 9 Oct 80 p 6

[Report: "EEC Gift of Five Tanker Trucks for Drought Victims"]

[Text] Last Thursday five tanker trucks and 20 portable containers were officially delivered to assist the victims of the drought. Presenting the gift, Donato Chiarini, the EEC representative, emphasized the attention which the European countries pay to the problems of developing countries (see Chiarini's article) not only within the framework of cooperation agreements (Lome II) but also when exceptionally adverse weather conditions put the people in dramatic situations to which "one cannot remain indifferent."

Ali Mallow, executive secretary of the National Agency for Aid to Refugees and victims (ONARS), who was presented with the keys of the trucks as the representative of the Republic of Djibouti, asked the EEC representative to express to the European countries the gratitude of the populations which will benefit from "this aid which comes when it is needed more than ever."

"I can assure you," Ali Mallow added, "that hundreds of human lives will be thus saved and millions of people will have their suffering alleviated thanks to these containers and tankers whose familiar outline in our arid lands fills the hearts of the nomads with happiness and hope.

"Thirst is unforgiving and in my country it is a constant threat to most of the 130,000 rural people affected by the drought, to the point that in some districts the nomads have been reduced to a ration of one liter of water daily for the children and to half a liter daily per adult.

"Mr Representative, I would not stray far from the truth by stating that more than anywhere else in the world Djibouti is aware of the fact that water is the source of life.

"That is why the 'battle' for water is the highest priority in our government's development program."

LIBYAN CRISIS OCCURS DURING DETERIORATION IN POLITICAL CLIMATE

Paris LE MONDE in French 1 Nov 80 p 7

[Article by Pierre Biarnes: "Banjul Severs Relations With Libya, Which Is Accused of Subversive Activities"]

> [Text] On Thursday 30 October the Gambia announced the severing, effective immediately, of its diplomatic relations with Libya, "following repeated incidents provoked by the Libyan Jamarihya and its embassy in Banjul." The Gambia is accusing Tripoli of having forcibly recruited some 200 Gambian youths to take military training in Libya, and asserts that the Libyan diplomatic legation in Banjul was "in direct contact with subversive elements whose only goal is to create confusion and disorder."

(By our West African correspondent)

DAKAR--According to the Banjul authorities, the Gambian nationals were recruited by the Senegalese Ahmed Niasse ("the ayatollah of Kaolack"), who has already been in the news in his own country in recent months for similar affairs (early in the summer Dakar, moreover, for identical reasons, had severed its own diplomatic relations with Tripoli). Gambian leaders, who had agreed to the installation in their capital of an important Libyan Embassy, (nearly 80 "diplomats") were also increasingly disappointed by the lack of good will applied by Col Qadhdhafi's government to honoring financial commitments already several years old.

This crisis occurs at a time when the political climate in this little former crown colony, which since independence has remained a model parliamentary democracy, is tending toward deterioration despite a fairly good economic situation.

Early this week Commander Emmanuel Mahoney, deputy commander of the "Field Forces,"--the Gambian paramilitary forces responsible for maintaining order--was assassinated by two gunshots fired by a private when, according to the official verson--which was so innocuous as to appear suspect--, he was surprised by his superior in the act of smoking marijuana and threatened with sanctions.

For several months vengeful inscriptions have been increasing on Banjul's walls. They were the work of young militants from a clandestine political movement close to Liberia's MOJA [Movement for Justice in Africa] (whose name it assumed, by the way), which had been the spearhead of the opposition to President Tolbert in the months preceding his assassination. These young people are objecting, not without reasons, to their leaders sinking more and more into corruption and slovenliness. Lastly, President Jawara fell victim in May to a small cerebral hemorrhage. He recovered rapidly, but he gives the impression that he is less in control of affairs than he was before.

GOVERNMENT ANNOUNCES MEASURES TO CONTROL SMUGGLING

AB180847 Accra Domestic Service in English 0600 GMT 18 Nov 80

[Text] The government has introduced new measures to curb the high incidence of smuggling in the country. A statement issued from the office of the president yesterday said after repeated appeals, the government is convinced that those who engage in smuggling are not only determined to keep the country short of goods but are also bent on wrecking the state. Accordingly, the government has ordered the immediate implementation of the following measures:

No unauthorized commercial cargo vehicle, including articulated trucks will, until further notice, be allowed to cross any of the borders of Ghana into any neighboring country.

Passenger and private vehicles will be allowed to cross such borders, but only after a thorough search of the vehicles and their luggage. Travellers are warned that any illegal or excess currencies and goods found on them or on the vehicles in commercial quantities will be confiscated and forfeited to the state.

The GNTC [Ghana National Trading Corporation] store at Aflao, which has been supplied with large quantities of goods has been closed down with immediate effect.

No vehicles of any description or size leaving Ghana will be allowed through the border checkpoints between the hours of 1800 and 0600.

Concerning valid and transit trade, the government has decided that loading and unloading of all vehicles shall be made under strict supervision of teams of policemen and military personnel. Before loading and after unloading, such vehicles will be thoroughly searched by the police and military teams. The most senior police and military representatives will certify that only permitted export goods backed by valid documents have actually been loaded. For this purpose, exporters are advised to apply in person to the nearest police, military or border guard posts. Exporters are advised to note that permitted export goods will be allowed only on the following days: to Togo every Tuesday, to the Ivory Coast every Thursday and to Upper Volta every Friday.

All loaded vehicles will be escorted by (?trade), military and border guard personnel from the points of loading to the exit points of Ghana's borders.

The statement said with effect from this week, joint teams of the police, the army, the navy and the border guards will undertake exercises along the borders to help check smuggling. Maximum effort is therefore expected from the public, especially border residents to help expose foot roads used by smugglers in the night.

With respect to the incoming goods, mainly those in commercial quantities imported into the country under special or import license and put in transit from outside Ghana, the following measures have been instituted:

Goods imported into Ghana will be subjected to the normal customs procedures of (?checks) and duty (?commissions). ASSEMBLY APPROVES MUNICIPAL ELECTION REFORMS

Abidjan FRATERNITE-MATIN in French 16 Oct 80 p 3

> [Text] "Some of us will not be reelected. Moreover, we already know that many people deliberately retire and do not run again. Therefore, I call on all of them, I appeal to their understanding in wishing that, elected or not, we will all come together as gentlemen this 19 December to close the second ordinary session of the year." With these remarks the president of the National Assembly, Mr Philippe Yace, put an end to the plenary session that he had convened to vote on the three documents that had been drafted for several days. The documents are laws having to do with the municipal electoral system, municipal organization and the status of the city of Abidjan. The bills, introduced by the Minister of Interior, were all adopted by the deputies. Thus, these three different documents adopted yesterday morning take their place in the path toward the modernization of the institutions which govern life in our country. Concerning the test related to the municipal electoral system in the Ivory Coast, the modification was essential in so far as municipal life in our country was being governed by French laws of 1884 and 1955.

The bill under question establishes the rules for municipal elections. While being inspired by French texts, the bill takes into account political contingencies which are specifically Ivorian.

It has six (6) titles:

The method chosen is a one-round election by the majority voting for a list. Nevertheless, in the case where several lists would lead with the same number of votes, a second round is held only for the lists that obtain a majority. In this case, the candidates are elected by the relative majority.

The number of municipal councilmen varies from 25 for the less populated communities to a maximum of 50 for communities having more than 100,000 inhabitants. The term of office for councilmen is 5 years, to bring it into agreement with the term of the president of the republic and the deputies. In this spirit it is possible to shorten or lengthen the mandate of municipal councilmen to make it coincide with the period of general elections.

No councilman can belong to several councils at the same time. Moreover, the number of councilmen that do not reside in the community cannot exceed one half of the council members.

Concerning the conditions for eligibility, not many electors are affected by measures of incompatibility. Only police officers and administration supervisors are not eligible.

Candidates must be registered on a list showing as many names as there are municipal council seats available.

For the electoral process, the system of division into electoral sections has not been kept because it is not adaptable to the principle of majority voting in one round with a unique list for all the people.

Finally, any elector or eligible person in the community has the right to protest any registration in the list of candidates within 8 days before the voting day. These persons can also plead the invalidity of the electoral process.

Three Categories

Arguments have been quite lively on certain points. One parliamentarian was concerned about the clarity of the text of Article 8. Can someone be eligible in a district without being registered as an elector there? The government commissioner dispelled the fears of the commission members: Indeed, to be eligible it is enough to be registered as an elector somewhere. This measure obeys the chief-of state's wish not to exclude from the municipal councils young officials originating from a community and holding certain positions.

To become a deputy, may someone be on several lists in the same district? The text does not seem to forbid this practice.

The government commissioner (the Minister of Interior) answered this question by citing Article 1 which specifies a vote by majority list in one round without preferential vote or vote-splitting.

Finally, it is even permitted for a candidate to challenge the president of an electoral college.

The second bill adopted yesterday by the deputies has to do with municipal organization. In fact, before 1978, there were three categories of districts in the Ivory Coast, a classification inherited from the colonization: mixed districts, districts of average exercise, districts of full exercise.

The bill in question tends to make municipal organization more uniform within the country and to mark in this way its independence from the documents handed over by the colonizer. This reform also obeys the wish of the chief-of-state to trust the administration of local affairs to a greater number of capable citizens.

The bill introduces some innovations which deserve to be stressed here even before going on to the actual analysis of the text.

--The number of municipal councilmen ranges from 25 for districts of 10,000 inhabitants or less to 50 for districts of 100,000 inhabitants, with a maximum of 50. In the old system, the minimum was 11 and the maximum was set at 39.

Two commissions, of which the old system admitted only the possibility, are compulsory here: one is charged with economic, financial and state matters, the other, with social and cultural affairs.

--The bill introduces the principle of collegiality into the heart of the district's governing body by making out of the municipality formed by the mayor and his assistants a task force with its own powers and marking down the importance of the mayor and the assistants taken individually.

--Up to now, with the exception of state officials assigned to the municipalities, there was no statute governing the agents of local administrations who, by virtue of this, were subjected to the provisions of the labor code.

The reform proposed institutes a statute for district personnel analogous to that for public officials and in that way guarantees a career to that personnel. One of the advantages of this new situation is that it protects the highest-ranking municipal officials from all sorts of pressures by making them permanent agents of the district.

--Concerning the mayors' compensation and methods of payment, from now on they will be established by decree and no longer by the deliberation of municipal councils.

--Finally, the bill provides formulas for inter-district cooperation and understanding. It creates a council for district development, a consulting and coordinating organization intended to give its advice on legislation and regulation of territorial groups.

Special Status

The document defines the district and has eight titles. It is not necessary to review them all. It is advisable nevertheless to point out that Chapter II of Title I organizes the trusteeship of the districts, which can intervene only in some actions that are limited to those enumerated in the bill.

Finally, the authority of trusteeship is entitled to dismiss a member of the municipal council under certain conditions. A parliamentarian saw this intervention of the authority of trusteeship as an abuse of power. But Article 43 of the bill specifies that the decision of the authority of trusteeship does not intervene until the council has invited the defaulting member to supply all helpful explanations. Indeed the decision of the authority of trusteeship is taken only at the request of the municipal council.

Finally, the last bill unanimously adopted yesterday by the deputies is one relating to the special status of the city of Abidjan. A small village of fishermen at the beginning of the century, our capital is today a great metropolis of more than 1.5 million inhabitants. For this reason its needs cannot be met by the usual district organization.

This situation led the authorities to seek an appropriate administrative system. Thus, it was thought of giving the Abidjan people a special status.

The main characteristic of this status is the creation within this large urban center of 10 districts on a par with the large quarters.

Anyway, the city of Abidjan and the districts that form it are governed by the law that regulates the municipal electoral system as far as the municipal elections are concerned.

The council of the city of Abidjan is formed by the mayor of the city of Abidjan and the mayors of the districts of the city, by 50 councilmen elected by the municipal councils of the city of Abidjan from among their own members at the rate of 5 per council.

As for the mayor of the city of Abidjan, he is elected among the 10 mayors of the city, according to Article 15 of the bill which stipulates: No one can be a candidate to the position of mayor of the city of Abidjan unless he is mayor of one of the ten districts of the city.

Besides the functions vested on the mayors by the provisions of the law concerning municipal organization, the mayor ot the city of Abidjan has certain prerogatives springing from his capacity as the authority of the city. These prerogatives are defined in Article 22 of the bill.

Finally the financial organization of the city of Abidjan and its districts will be the subject of a law.

A parliamentarian asked about the particular situation of Marcory, a large part of which belongs to the department of Lorrain. The government commissioner calmed the commission with his answer: when the municipalities are established, we will expropriate some streets of the Marcory sector that belong to that company. In this way there will not be any problem with the maintenance of streets in the sector.

The seventh Congress of the PDCI [Democratic Party of the Ivory Coast] confirmed it. There is a wind of change blowing over our country. And the modification of documents regulating the election of deputies to the National Assembly, the organization of the Party and finally the municipalities are the best illustrations. The 20 years of our country have indeed made us a mature nation. This maturity, has once more been confirmed by the parliamentarians, many of which will be absent from the coming legislature because they were beaten in the November elections, by attending the plenary session en masse yesterday morning. We understand why President Yace has invited them to participate in the closing act which will put an end to the fifth legislature of our country's parliamentary life. It will certainly be an occasion for former and new deputies to fraternize. For the victory belongs only to the Ivory Coast.

KENYA 2 YEARS AFTER DEATH OF KENYATTA

Paris LE MONDE in French 16 Oct 80 p 6

[Article by Jean-Pierre Langellier: "Two Years After the Death of Kenyatta--President Moi Strives To Maintain Political Stability and Strengthen National Unity"]

[Text] A political book is creating a furore in Kenya. Written by two Nairobi journalists, "Kenyatta's Succession" retraces in detail the intrigues which, in anticipation of the death of the "Mzee" (the Elder) that occurred in August 1978, were aimed unsuccessfully at putting his heir apparent, Mr Daniel Arap Moi who is president today, out of the running. The schemers raged at the prospect of seeing the highest office elude the Kikuyu tribe, representing about 20 percent of the population which has been all powerful in running the country since independence. While Mr Moi was celebrating the second anniversary of his arrival in State House on Tuesday 14 October, the sometimes complacent reminder of these unsuccessful machinations--reflections of a bitter power struggle--accentuates by contrast the performance of their presumed victim.

The successor to Jomo Kenyatta, it is true, has known how to steer the transition gently, consolidate his regime skillfully, introduce gradually a new style of government and put in place a team more ethnically balanced, without being regarded as a parricide. Having become familiar with the workings of the system in the course of a long wait in the shadow of the throne--he was vice president for 10 years--and being anxious to humor the "old guard," Mr Moi was careful to present himself in the early stages as the faithful heir to "the father of the nation." His slogan "Nyayo!" means approximately: "Let us follow in his footsteps!" Today change is as pronounced as continuity.

Public life has become relaxed. There are no more political prisoners. Detention under remand of dissidents, a common occurrence a short while ago, is a thing of the past. Parliament is the place for lively debates, even though, its members belong to a de facto single party, the Kenya African National Union (KANU). The press, despite calls to order, knows how to assert itself incisively. This wind of freedom has invigorated the institutions. Political stability, the pride of the regime, is strengthened by it. Kenyatta, as he grew older, had gradually lost touch with the country. His successor, a populist president, enjoys mingling with the crowd and being in touch with the "wananchi" ("citizens" in Swahili). Liking from time to time to speak out loud and clear, doubtless in order to correct the impression of natural good-heartedness which emanates from him he admonishes the politicians and threatens to crush his opponents, reproaches some of them for their lack of loyalty or wages war against corruption.

Struggle Against Tribalism

An ardent Christian, he nonetheless prefers to use biblical references sparingly. His rallying cry is taken up in each meeting: "Country, love, unity!" For Mr Moi, the strengthening of national unity seems a constant concern. This was seen again recently when Parliament, adopting a resolution passed by the party leaders last July, asked all the tribal organizations to commit hara-kiri. This measure is primarily aimed at the rich and influential GEMA [Gikuyu-Emba-Meru Association], which was created in 1971 and had become, by the end of Kenyatta's reign, the spearhead of Kikuyu supremacy, as well as an "actual party within the party."

This affair has been filling the local news media for weeks, because no one is unaware that in 1976 several GEMA leaders had masterminded the cabal against the future president. The KANU initiative, which was officially inspired by a single concern for abolishing the pressure groups, those "springboards for the chauvinistic politicians," thus appears less innocent. Dismantling the tribal associations admittedly is not enough to eradicate tribalism from the country's mental habits, but the average Kenyan views rather favorably a policy aimed at reducing the predominance of an ethnic group which for too long has identified its own interests with those of the State.

The difference in approach between Jomo Kenyatta and his successor is appreciable on this point. The former saw the strengthening of the tribes as the indispensable step toward national unity. The latter hopes to tone down the ethnic divisions, which he regards as obstacles to the modernization of Kenya. The president, who is a member of a small tribe in the Rift Valley--the Tugen, a branch of the Kalenjin family--is careful, however, to deal tactfully with the two large ethnic groups, the Kikuyu and the Luo. Many of Kenyatta's former associates are in the present government, although often relegated to more humble positions. In a country where most of the politicians are also businessmen the economic power of the Kikuyu, a factor in the stability of the regime, is intact.

Affirming his desire to forget the past, President Moi extended the olive branch to the most prestigious of the Luo leaders, Mr Oginga Odinga. Having been appointed president of the Cotton Board, a parastatal agency, in 1979, Kenyatta's old adversary rallied to his successor. Two weeks ago, Mr Odinga praised "the president's determination to combat tribalism and corruption." Kenyatta's former rival, who had not been authorized to present his candidacy at the time of the general elections last autumn, might be able to return to Parliament on the occasion of a by-election. His rehabilitation would then be complete. This reconciliation is mutually beneficial. The western provinces, for a long time forsaken, are going to receive increased aid from the State. As for President Moi, he no longer has to fear the turbulence of the Luo region.

However, muted struggles for influence are tormenting the Kikuyu ethnic group. Many observers reduce these struggles a bit simply to rivalry between the two key men in the government who symbolize permanence: the vice president and minister of finance, Mr Mwai Kibaki, and the minister of the interior, Mr Charles Njonjo. A prototype of the senior civil servant with distinctly British manners--pocket watch, rose in the buttonhole--Mr Njonjo "entered politics" six months ago, after having been a feared and respected lord chancellor for sixteen years. Confidant of Keyatta and then of his successor, who is largely indebted to him for his accession to the highest office, Njonjo allegedly has designs on the vice presidency. No doubt he is less powerful and less feared than at the time when his authority derived in large part from the secrecy surrounding him. In any case the rivalry between Messrs Kibaki and Njonjo, even if it is as intense as some claim, has up to now had no decisive consequences. With the president the two men form a triumvirate which still holds most of the power.

"Moi is like a giraffe," Mr Odinga said of him one day. "He sees problems coming from far off." Is that why his primary concern is for the economy? After 10 years of prosperity supported by the coffee boom, the economy is showing serious signs of weakness. The initial goals of the five-year development plan (1979-1983) have been greatly revised downward. Essentially an agricultural country, Kenya has no mineral resources. Its dependence on foreign energy sources is almost total. The hike in oil costs is a keen blow.

The slowdown in agricultural growth is due to multiple causes: drought, a pricing policy lacking in incentives for the producer, mismanagement of inventories, corruption. This year, for the first time since independence, long lines formed in front of the stores. Readily consumed products--rice, milk, butter, flour--were generally in short supply for several weeks. The government was forced to buy from South Africa--without admitting so officially--several hundred thousand tons of maize, the Kenyan's food staple. In order to give new impetus to production, the government increased appreciably most of the prices paid to farmers.

The fact remains that, in 1980, Kenya's food balance has been upset. Everything leads one to believe that it cannot be restored. The possibilities for increasing arable land are limited. Improvement in yields and development of extensive stock farming will only delay the moment when Kenya's food balance is clearly in the red. For this country must meet a formidable demographic challenge: its annual growth rate is close to four percent. This is one of the highest percentages on the planet. Each year 250,000 young people enter the labor market. Only one out of five finds a job in the formal sector of the economy.

Kenya will be increasingly dependent on foreign aid. Its balance of payments, which is in the red, needs backing up. The EEC, for example, has just allocated emergency food assistance to Kenya. It is going to implement a program for rehabilitating the 30,000 herdsmen seriously affected by the persistent drought in the Lake Turkana region, in the northern part of the country. Two deputies announced last month that malnutrition and cholera had killed several hundred children. The government denied the information, while recognizing the seriousness of the situation.

The leaders think that the vulnerability of the economy accentuates the need for preserving political stability. Now this depends, to a large extent, on maintaining the regional balance. President Moi takes more interest in diplomacy than his predecessor, but he has inherited from him an outspoken hostility toward Soviet interventions in Africa; hence his unfailing support for American strategy in the Indian Ocean.

This year Kenya granted "facilities" to the American army in Nairobi, Mombasa and Nanyuki. It was delighted that the Somali base at Berbera was put at the disposal of the United States, even though it would have preferred that Washington not deliver, in return, any military equipment to a government which has not abandoned all its territorial claims on northeastern Kenya. The Americans, by increasing their economic aid this year, seem to have become aware of the importance of the Kenyan stake. A country resolutely pro-Western and more democratic than all those around it, a bastion of free enterprise surrounded by socialist regimes, Kenya deserves, in the eyes of the Americans and the Europeans, to be supported and defended. In their view, this "Western showcase" is worth protecting.

LOCAL ORE USE--Monrovia, 23 Nov (AFP)--Liberia, which for years has supplied iron ore to be made into steel abroad, is to get an iron and steel works in the country. The government of Master Sergeant Samuel Doe and the newly created West African Iron and Steel Corporation [WAISCOR] signed an $800 million agreement here yesterday under which the company will make iron and steel in Liberia for export to Europe and other African countries. WAISCOR is a venture of American companies, including A. F. Industries and United Engineers and Contractors International. The deal gives WAISCOR the exclusive rights to produce iron and steel in Liberia, as well as rights to iron ore from any new mines developed in the future. For now, the company is to purchase ore from the foreign-controlled companies already mining in the country. Iron ore is one of Liberia's most important exports, with rubber and wood. In 1977, exports of iron ore and concentrates were worth $274.7 million. [Text] [AB231318 Paris AFP in English 0946 GMT 23 Nov 80]

RAPID DEPLOYMENT FORCE CONCEPT ATTACKED

Beira NOTICIAS DA BEIRA in Portuguese 3 Sep 80 p 8

[Editorial: "'Rapid Deployment Force'--An Instrument of American Imperialist Rule"]

[Text] A U.S. president has flatly stated on repeated occasions that the United States "could see itself obliged," under exceptional circumstances, to assume the role of international policeman. This cynical statement unmasks with complete shamelessness the American concept of military internationalism, which has now become manifest in the so-called "rapid deployment force" created by the Carter administration.

The plans for creating and using the "rapid deployment force" have ripened on the same soil that in its time nurtured the roots of neocolonialism. Those plans have the objective of guranteeing U.S. domination over the "Third World" by military force in case the political and economic levers do not function with the necessary efficacy.

The idea of creating a military unit especially for armed intervention in the internal affairs of the developing countries is not in itself new. The people who make U.S. foreign policy had already begun to plan it at the end of the 1950's. Later, the Pentagon completed it with the strategic concept known as "a war and a half." According to this concept, the Armed Forces of the United States should be prepared to wage a "big" war in Western Europe and a "little" war (half a war) in the areas which are not part of the regions claimed as belonging to the aggressive bloc of the North Atlantic. Already then the United States had begun to create mobile ground forces of "fire brigades" to be transported by air to the "American zones" or, in other words, to the countries whose peoples refuse to submit to the dictates of Washington. Those American units were used for the first time in Vietnam during the Indochinese adventure of the United States.

The idea in the most reactionary circles of the United States of the need to extend the U.S. military presence in the world and constitute a special military contingent for its use, above all in the developing countries, was the basis for the creation of the "rapid deployment force." At the same time, and in spite of the fact that Latin America, like Africa, the Far East and Southeast Asia has been considered as a possible region for using the force, it was not even hinted in Washington that this "super fire brigade" was intended above all for use in the Middle East and in the Persian Gulf where it would defend the "vital interests" of the United States.

Let us recall that U.S. threats of military force were the order of the day as long ago as 1974. The pretext for such intervention was the oil embargo established by the Arab states as a reply to Israel's occupation of vast areas of Egyptian territory during the war of October 1973 and the total support given to the Zionist aggressor by the United States. J. Schlesinger, at that time secretary of defense, declared that the petroleum-producing countries were running the risk of inviting a military attack if they "caused damage to the industrial world."

In the same year of 1974, in the weekly U.S. NEWS AND WORLD REPORT, a large corporation inquired rather symptomatically: "Will the United States seize Middle East oil?" In that article the regions of the Middle East and of the Persian Gulf whose occupation by American troops seemed possible were enumerated in detail. In the opinion of the weekly, three divisions would be enough to guarantee the export of oil from Saudi Arabia.

Shortly afterward, J. Schlesinger declared that the entire Persian Gulf was a possible target for U.S. military intervention. The public information media of the United States suggested the most varied itineraries for adventures of this kind, all of them emphasizing the insufficiency of the three divisions. The practical result of that campaign was the decision to create the special "rapid deployment force," which was made in 1977, or considerably before the events in Iran and Afghanistan. The magazine ENQUIRER points out that the objective of that force is to effect a rapid blow on the center of crises in the "Third World" and, more than anywhere else, in the Persian Gulf. The events in Iran, where the pro-American regime of the shah fell as the result of a popular movement, gave the White House a pretext for the rapid execution of those dangerous plans.

As early as the beginning of 1979, considerably before, we repeat, the incident of the American hostages and of the dispatch to Afghanistan, in response to a request by the government of that country, of a Soviet military contingent, the weekly U.S. NEWS AND WORLD REPORT wrote that "The persons who draw up U.S. military strategy declare that the most important objective of that strategy is to reinforce the U.S. military presence in that region, above all the reinforcement of combat forces, specially trained and equipped for immediate intervention in case of necessity."

UNASSAILABLE FRIENDSHIP WITH ITALY

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 6 Nov 80 p 3

[Article by A.C.: "Nothing Can Destroy Us"]

[Text] It is not every day that one has the privilege to talk to a person who exemplifies humility, respect, and, fundamentally, solidarity in an exceptional form. This happened on Tuesday, 28 October. There were four of us journalists and we were quite impressed.

When we look at the list of countries that are members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, also called NATO, we are somewhat impressed to find out that Italy is on that list. It is a member of a military aggression pact. Although this is not a domestic problem and although we recall the possible commitment of Italian enterprises in wars of aggression and in the exploitation of man by man, this is not really the reason why we are writing this. The reason is entirely different. This is like the two sides of one and the same coin.

A ship loaded with solidarity goods from the Italian people was in Mozambique recently, representing the people from the northern slopes of the Alps all the way to Sicily, bringing its brotherly embrace to our people who are united and organized from Rovuma all the way to Maputo. Information has now reached us regarding the establishment of the Italy-Mozambique association. The news was brought to us by a doctor who worked in the maternity ward of the Central Hospital of Maputo. Who does not remember or who did not hear Dr Corti speak? We listened to him for about an hour and we were impressed. In the light of what we had already heard about the Italian people, we thought that he was a worthy representative.

As he said at the end of the interview: "The peoples must know each other like individuals. Nobody will forget them after that. Bonds must remain strong. And nobody can destroy them." We began by not forgetting him. That was one step and in the light of what we already know about the Italian people, nothing will destroy that. Colonialism did not manage to do that and imperialism will not manage to do it either, regardless of the regimes which Italy may have had or may have in the future.

PARTY STRUCTURING TASK IS ONGOING CONCERN

Beira NOTICIAS DA BEIRA in Portuguese 30 Oct 80 pp 1, 3

[Text] A new phase in the FRELIMO Party organization campaign on a nationwide level began on 21 October. At this time, hundreds of brigades are being formed throughout Mozambican territory and they will carry out this process which is aimed at swelling the ranks of the vanguard force of the working classes. Jose Oscar Monteiro, Central Committee secretary for organization, FRELIMO Party, in an interview given to VOZ DA FRELIMO, broadcast at night over RM [Radio Mozambique], presented various considerations on the new phase in party organization now underway.

Talking about the current phase, he said that there will not be a party organization drive properly speaking as there had been in 1978 when it was important "to launch the process, to gather experience, which meant that it was necessary to concentrate a large volume of energy." Oscar Monteiro noted that the task of organizing the party and constantly winning new members "is a permanent activity, one of the ways of developing the conscience of the citizens and enabling the party effectively to play its vanguard role."

Oscar Monteiro said that the organization process will continue in terms of the bylaws in two ways. One of them will be the organizational effort in those places where party cells have not yet been established. The other one will be to continue the admission of members in those places where the party is already organized.

"It is the task of the cells, within the terms of the charter, to analyze the applications of new members and to decide on them. The cell is a living organism which is constantly nourished by new forces and new ideas. During this period of time, those individuals who have not submitted their applications and who are now trying to do so, are in effect facing the cell with the task of examining their qualifications and propose their admission," said the Central Committee secretary for organization.

Mistakes Made Will Serve as Lessons

"I must say that we have made mistakes in our work. The only person who does not make any mistakes is the person who stays at home and does nothing. This is why we did not immediately have a system that would not reveal some errors. But we must know how to utilize the lessons of the past and act in such a manner that we will not repeat those mistakes in the future," said Oscar Monteiro, adding:

"The brigade system had undeniable merits. It enabled us to provide dynamic impetus for the process, to draw out new forces and new energies for party work. Many times, those brigades were directed by leaders with much political experience and much in the way of qualifications. But the main difficulty which came up many times likewise was that the brigade members were unable to become familiar with the complete picture because they did not permanently work in the locality where the party was being organized.

"It is difficult, even during five meetings, which case to be the rule, to obtain a complete, exact, and rigorous knowledge regarding the persons involved. In some cases, individuals were admitted who should not have become party members. There were also cases where some persons were not admitted even though they should have become party members and were qualified for such membership.

"We do not consider the work of the brigades to be a definitive effort, a final judgment on all questions regarding the political situation in a certain place of employment and regarding persons who work there. It is necessary to go on and that is one of the tasks of the cell."

Oscar Monteiro then declared that the work of the brigades entailed the inconvenience of "winding up with cells that were not constantly being supervised and checked on, something which is necessary not only over a period of a few months but for a very long time." He recalled that the Central Committee, during its seventh session, indicated that the organizational effort will be directed by brigades essentially made up of party workers so that they may devote their attention to the functioning of the cells that have been created. "That is no mean task. It is one of the fundamental tasks of the party," Oscar Monteiro emphasized.

The Central Committee secretary for organization then said that "the party lives through its cells, it is nurtured by the reality which the cells--the basis of society--transmit to it." Concerning the criterion in applicant selection, he made it clear that "there is going to have to be a double concern here," the first one being to "guarantee that the individuals most devoted to the cause of the revolution will be selected, as we said in our charter."

This selection will prevent enemy infiltration in party structures so that the enemy's agents will not be able to get into the party "in order to fight against our structures from the inside." At the same time however there must be an awareness that nobody is born a party member, that one is not born a revolutionary, paraphrasing President Samora Machel.

"This quality is acquired in the process of the class struggle which shapes and develops class consciousness, which shapes and develops the revolutionary man. We must therefore admit into the party those who reveal these qualities. We must avoid sectarianism by excluding those who reveal some inadequacies and who have not attained a sufficiently advanced level of awareness. We must realize that our work is the thing that wins new members for the party," Oscar Monteiro remarked.

MULTINATIONAL COMPANY CHAIRMAN'S VISIT

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 4 Nov 80 p 3

[Excerpts] "The thing that impressed me most in Mozambique was the concern of the country's officials with the resolution of the problems of underdevelopment," commented Marcel Henri Marty, president and general manager of the consortium CGEE/ALSTHOM, who left Maputo yesterday afternoon after a short stay in Mozambique.

Marcel Henri Marty is president of a multinational corporation which consists of various French, Italian, and West German companies. He went to the People's Republic of Mozambique in response to an invitation from Minister-Governor of the Bank of Mozambique Sergio Vieira.

The purpose of the trip was to present an offer from that consortium in response to the public bidding invitation issued on 12 July by Electric Power Company of Mozambique regarding the construction of the northern phase of the Cabora Bassa dam. Many of the enterprises today constituting CGEE/ALSTHOM participated in the construction of the dam's first phase.

In talking to the reporter from the newspaper NOTICIAS the day before yesterday, upon his arrival in Maputo, coming from the provinces of Tete and Zambezia, Marcel Marty expressed great satisfaction with having visited that grandiose hydroelectric complex for the first time.

An energy transportation system was used in this complex for the first time from the Songo substation, using direct current.

What is CGEE/ALSTHOM?

The European consortium, of which Marcel Henri Marty is president, represents various enterprises in France, Italy, and the FRG. In building the first phase of the hydroelectric complex at Cabora Bassa, many of these companies participated while being grouped within ZAMCO "Zambezia Consortium."

Among these various companies we might mention, in the electromechanical sector, Siemens, BBC, and AEG [General Electric Company] of the FRG, and ALSTHOM-SCHNEIDER, of France.

At this time, CGEE/ALSTHOM/Cogelex and SAE are participating in the installation of the high-tension lines which will carry energy from Cabora Bassa to wherever the development of the People's Republic of Mozambique so requires.

USSR DELEGATION ARRIVES FOR FRIENDSHIP WEEK

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 1 Nov 80 p 1

[Excerpts] Friendship week between the peoples of the People's Republic of Mozambique and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, organized by the AMASP [Mozambican Association of Friendship and Solidarity With Peoples] and the USSARC, begins today in Maputo in the context of the ceremonies commemorating the 63rd anniversary of the October Revolution scheduled for 7 October in that European country.

Early yesterday afternoon, the chairman of the Motion Picture Committee of the Soviet Socialist Republic of the Ukraine, Yuriy Olenenko, accompanied by the "Podolyantsa" cultural dance group, arrived in this city early yesterday afternoon to participate in the activities marking Mozambique-Soviet friendship week; starting tomorrow, the group will present to the Mozambican people a repertoire of dances and music from that socialist country.

On his arrival at Mavalane International Airport, Yuriy Olenenko, who was accompanied by Hero of Socialist Labor and Deputy of the Supreme Soviet Anatoliy Perkin, was welcomed by Secretary-General of the AMASP Abuel Sansao Mutemba, the USSR ambassador to Mozambique, and other members of the AMASP.

In a statement released to the press in connection with his trip to Mozambique, the chairman of the Motion Picture Committee of the Socialist Republic of the Ukraine [USSARC] expressed his satisfaction with this journey--his first one to Mozambique--emphasizing that "during the liberation struggle of the Mozambican people we carefully kept track of your victories and now, during the construction of socialism, we keep close tabs on your efforts in building socialism."

In conclusion, Yuriy Olenenko declared that the Soviet people attentively watches the changes taking place in Mozambique regarding the construction of socialism, stressing that "during this phase, our people very much wants to strengthen relations of friendship and cooperation. And we bring that message to the Mozambican people."

WOMEN'S ORGANIZATION ON NONPROLIFERATION

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 1 Nov 80 p 1

> [Excerpts] An international conference of women against the proliferation of nuclear arms and war was promoted in Maputo by the Organization of Mozambique Women late yesterday afternoon at the Glass Company. The meeting was attended by scores of women, including representatives from the OMM [Organization of Mozambique Women], women from the socialist countries, from the women's section of the ANC of South Africa, and wives of members of the diplomatic corps accredited in Mozambique.

On that occasion, messages were read from the production councils, from the women's section of the African National Congress of South Africa, and from women of the socialist countries, who vigorously condemned the warlike actions of imperialism throughout the world. The messages recalled the bitter lessons of World War I and World War II as well as the danger resulting from the employment of atomic weapons. To prevent these attempts at a return to the "cold war," the women present at that meeting--which was characterized by active participation--urged that immediate measures be taken. It is not enough to say "no to war," they emphasized, stressing the need for using the forces of solidarity to attain those objectives.

Salome Moiane pointed up the need for having women fight for equality, development, and peace--the slogan launched by the United Nations for the decade of women. In fighting for these ideas, Mozambican women, joining their voices to those of millions of women throughout the world, during this international conference of women in support of disarmament, protested against the escalation of the arms race which threatens security, international peace, and the life of all humanity.

OFFICIAL STRESSES NEED FOR IMPROVEMENT IN PRESS FIELD

Beira NOTICIAS DA BEIRA in Portuguese 6 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] Important guidelines for the Information ministry were outlined in Sofala yesterday by Jose Luis Cabaco, member of the FRELIMO Party Central Committee and minister of information, who was in the city of Beira for 2 days working within the framework of the political and organizational offensive undertaken in the organs and agencies under the MINFO [Ministry of Information]. Within this framework, in a meeting held yesterday morning in the offices of the newspaper NOTICIAS DA BEIRA, at which officials, workers and representatives of the organs and organisms connected with this sector in the Province of Sofala were present, Minister Jose Luis Cabaco stressed the imperative need for workers in information to clearly and creatively assume the objectives of the political and organizational offensive which is being carried on in the country.

The minister of information, who returned to the capital of the country yesterday, told journalists that his trip was inspired by the need to closely experience the problems affecting the various organisms of the ministry that he heads and together with their leaders and workers in general to seek solutions to those problems. "I was positively impressed by the work being done here in spite of the lack of means which impedes the work," the Mozambican minister of information emphasized as he assessed his visit.

During his stay in this city, the minister of information had as the principal point of his agenda a study of the problems affecting NOTICIAS DA BEIRA. Within this framework mechanisms were studied for reorganizing the enterprise and improving its finances [part of page missing], an integral and rational improvement of the existing media including the integration of other sectors in such a way as to make this enterprise profitable.

As he took up the negative aspects that were observed during his visit, the holder of our country's Information portfolio pointed out some organizational shortcomings and a few disciplinary problems. "This means that the profound spirit of the offensive has not been completely assumed in the organs of information. It is necessary to go forward with the work in order to eradicate the persons guilty of those negative aspects," Minister Cabaco added.

Beira NOTICIAS in Portuguese 28 Oct 80 p 3

[Text] In the name of the Red Cross of the Federated Socialist Republic of Yugoslavia, the ambassador-extraordinary and plenipotentiary of that European socialist country in Mozambique, Zeljko Jeglic, handed over various hospital equipment items to the representative of the Mozambican Red Cross Organizing Committee.

Speaking during the delivery ceremony held on board the Yugoslav solidarity ship "Uskok" which recently arrived in Maputo, Zeljko Jeglic stressed the friendly relations forged between the two countries and peoples since the time of the armed liberation struggle of the Mozambican people, emphasizing that these relations are growing stronger with each passing day through cooperation.

During the ceremony involved in the delivery of five cases of equipment and material for ambulances, stomatology, and another four cases of miscellaneous hospital equipment and medications, the Yugoslav ambassador noted his country's concern with establishing closer relationships of cooperation with all the nonalined countries, especially Mozambique. "I would like to take this opportunity to confirm my country's good will in stepping up strong cooperation in all areas, such as economics, science, technology, health, and others."

Manuel Romano Julien, representative of the Red Cross Organizing Committee of Mozambique, thanked the ambassador for the offer, also noting the relationships of friendship and cooperation which always existed between the peoples of Mozambique and Yugoslavia for many years.

The member of the Red Cross Organizing Committee of Mozambique also stressed the efforts made by the governments of both countries in the continuation of ever more effective cooperation, expressing the wish for good collaboration between the Red Cross of the Federated Socialist Republic of Yugoslavia and the future similar organization in Mozambique.

The ceremony, which began in the afternoon, was also attended by the representative of the International Association of the Red Cross in Mozambique, Yves Lagier, and the captain of the solidarity vessel from Yugoslavia, Alhosa Juras. PLANNING FOR 1981 IMPORTS UNDERWAY

[Text] The first meeting concerned with the planning of activities dealing with the consumer goods importing plan for 1981--held under the auspices of the Supply Coordinating Council--ended yesterday afternoon with the approval of a document which spells out tasks to be accomplished and deadlines to be met by the various agencies involved in the process of importing and distributing food products for the population.

In discussing the conclusions worked out at the end of the debate on the work to be done and the mechanisms to be employed in order to guarantee the execution of this plan, Jacinto Veloso, chairman of the Supply Coordinating Council, said that the meeting attained its objectives although there are still some aspects that have to be reviewed.

The party directorate and government member also stressed the need for holding formal meetings, if possible monthly, in order to exchange information and ideas on the implementation of the tasks now spelled out and on meeting the deadlines established for each agency.

The immediate task to be accomplished by the foreign trade enterprises was to start the process of importing 50 percent of the requirements estimated for the next year as part of a combined effort with the Supply Coordinating Council.

The reorganization of ship unloading and cargo handling systems in the ports, the strengthening of some units with economic functions which are involved in the consumer goods distribution process--especially slaughterhouses--and the formation of an enterprise which can, on an international level, perform inspection and quality and quantity control functions regarding imported products--these were some of the other tasks assigned.

The meeting was attended by representatives from the ministries of domestic trade, of foreign trade, of ports and surface transportation, of finances, and the Bank of Mozambique, in addition to enterprises and other units constituting the food product importing and distribution system.

SUCCESS, METHODS OF CASHEW HARVESTING CAMPAIGN DETAILED

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 4 Nov 80 pp 1, 3

[Text] Supply Coordinating Council stresses importance of cashews in country's economy and presents guidelines. In order to step up the use of cashews--a product which is one of the biggest foreign-exchange earners for the country--the Supply Coordinating Council yesterday adopted Resolution No 1/80, spelling out measures for the correct implementation of the cashew sales campaign to be started shortly. The same resolution also urges the entire Mozambican people to contribute to the success of that drive. Here is the complete text of that resolution.

1. The cashew sales drive will be launched shortly.

The cashew harvest and sales drives are already a tradition and constitute particularly important aspects in the life of the people.

For thousands upon thousands of citizens, the harvest and sale of cashews signifies the procurement of products and articles which they need in their daily lives.

Cashew sales therefore are closely tied to supplies for the people. The sale of cashews decisively helps us get the foreign exchange necessary from abroad which in turn will enable us continuously to increase the output as the only sure way to solve the supply problems which the country faces.

The clothing and food necessary for the life of the people are not yet being produced in sufficient quantities at home. It is necessary to import them and cashews constitute one of the biggest supports for our imports of supply products and equipment necessary in agriculture, construction, and industry.

The larger the volume of cashews sold, the greater will be our capacity to carry out the projects which our development requires.

It is therefore absolutely necessary to defend and improve our cashew-growing efforts and to develop all those activities which are aimed at increasing the quantities sold.

2. The success of the sales drive fundamentally is based on its preparation, its organization, and supervision over its execution.

Some important measures have already been taken for the 1980-1981 drive:

We published the cashew sales notice, containing new prices to be used by those involved on the various levels. The purchasing price was raised from 3.50 MT [meticals; 1 MT = 1.5 drachma] to 5.0 MT (five meticals);

Some wagons and trucks have already been distributed to warehousing operators, dealers, and consumer cooperatives in order to increase their cashew purchasing and shipping capacity.

However, the success of the cashew harvest and sales drive essentially depends on good and correct organization on the local level.

3. Realizing the national importance of this cashew harvesting and sales drive at this time and its close connection with the supply problem, the Supply Coordinating Council decided:

1. On the central level, the campaign will be promoted and coordinated by the Secretariat of State for Cashews which, for this purpose, will work in close conjunction with the following agencies:

CCA (Supply Coordinating Council),

MCI (Ministry of Domestic Trade),

MPTS (Ministry of Ports and Surface Transportation),

BM (Bank of Mozambique),

ODM (Democratic Mass Organizations).

It will submit monthly written reports on the development of the drive and on the difficulties and problems encountered.

2. On the provincial level, responsibility for the success of the campaign rests upon the provincial governments which, through the provincial directorates, must take care of the organization and management of the cashew harvesting and sales drive. For this purpose they must:

(a) Speed up the organization of agencies involved in the drive and spell out specific tasks for each of them;

(b) Start and develop a broad popular mobilization effort to get the people actively to participate in the campaign;

(c) Mobilize and support the government enterprises, cooperatives, and merchants who are most active in cashew purchasing and shipment;

(d) Make sure that the drivers of all transportation equipment correctly use the vehicles intended for the campaign so as to get the best possible yield;

(e) Make sure that the people's assemblies and district executive councils, the ODM, the dynamic impetus groups, and other agencies discuss and plan specific tasks relating to cashew harvesting and sales;

(f) Launch a socialist competition campaign in support of cashew harvesting and sales with a view to rewarding the various persons involved who distinguish themselves most.

The provincial governments therefore will have to make every effort in order to make sure that:

Not a single cashew will be missed during the harvesting;

Not a single cashew will fail to be sold;

Not a single cashew will fail to be transported.

Harvesting, selling, and transporting cashews means effectively fighting to overcome hunger, poverty, nakedness, and ignorance.

Harvesting, selling, and transporting all cashews means decisively contributing to the triumph of the victory over underdevelopment during the decade we are now starting [as published].

The struggle continues.

BRIEFS

SWEDISH FORESTRY COOPERATION--Yesterday morning in Maputo a cooperation agreement was signed in the Forestry Industry section between the People's Republic of Mozambique and the Kingdom of Sweden. The national director of international cooperation, Janet Mondlane, signed the agreement for Mozambique and the Swedish ambassador recognized in our country, Finn Bergstrand, signed for Sweden. Sweden will grant 80 million Swedish kronas, about 600,000 contos, for the construction of a forestry industrial complex near Chimoio, in the Manica province. The project will be founded on forestry-planted lands existing in the area and will include the erection of a sawmill with a yearly output capacity of 26,000 cubic meters of sawn wood and a panel plant with a yearly capacity of 20,000 cubic meters. The project also includes the supplying of substructures necessary for operating the project, which it is calculated will provide employment for 900 workers. In this agreement, the Manica Forestry Industry (IFLOMA) is responsible for carrying out the project and will receive technical help from the Swedish state enterprise, Swedofrest, while under construction and during the initial operational phases. Production is expected to begin in 1982/83. [Text] [Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 22 Oct 80 p 1] 8870

BEIRA FOOD SHORTAGES NOTED--The second session of the City Assembly on making a deeper and more precise analysis of the Beira food supply problem, based on a report which the supply committee had presented, noted the following: That there are several food product plants which are about to freeze their production activities for lack of raw materials. The oil plant, owing to the lack of containers for filtering the refined oil, have reduced their output. Many cooperatives and private dealers are not fulfilling their quotas in the stores and are thereby jeopardizing public consumption. The city's lack of meat was one of the problems they seriously discussed at this meeting. Last August, the INDOPESCA Company installed several cold-storage vaults in Marromeu in order to freeze and protect buffalo meat from spoilage, for its later transportation to Beira where meat is sold on an experimental basis in only four of the city's butcher shops, and consequently benefits only a minority of people. The sale of bread only in bakeries is giving rise to crowds and long lines of people whose needs are frequently not met. The Beira poultry raiser is not complying with the norms established by the Provincial Bureau of Domestic Trade. [Excerpt] [Beira NOTICIAS DA BEIRA in Portuguese 16 Oct 80 p 3] 8870

SOVIET-FLOATING DOCK CONTRACT--In Maputo over the weekend, Mozambique and the USSR signed a contract to enable our country to acquire a floating dock, for fishing vessels of up to 4,500 tons. The contract, which is in the context of economic cooperation, also provides for the training by Soviet experts of Mozambican cadres and for technical assistance in the training. Sources close to the Ministry of Industry and Power told Radio Mozambique that a representative of the National Directorate for International Cooperation had signed the contract for Mozambique and the deputy counsellor of the Soviet Embassy in Maputo had signed for his country. NEW BREAD DISTRIBUTION SYSTEM--A new system for supplying bread to the city of Pemba went into effect the day before yesterday, according to a communique divulged to the provincial station of RM [Radio Mozambique] by the Provincial Directorate of Internal Commerce in Cabo Delgado. The new system recommends that family groups buy their bread with a ration card to be bought for 2.50 meticais in the offices of the governing groups of the city. According to the communique of the Provincial Directorate of Internal Commerce, this new system is fundamentally aimed at eliminating the speculative sales of bread which up to now have been observed on the part of unscrupulous elements interested only in illicit gain. For greater effectiveness of this new system of bread supply in the city of Pemba, 11 distribution centers have been established in different parts of the city to alleviate the congestion caused by the crowding of the population into the 3 bakeries which now exist. STATE BUDGET APPROVED--Meeting yesterday under the direction of the President of the People's Republic of Mozambique Samora Moises Machel, the cabinet analyzed and approved the general government budget for the year 1981. In an enlarged session, the cabinet on Tuesday will approve the draft of the Central State Plan for that same year. During yesterday's meeting of that central government body, several of its members underscored the importance and great advance represented by the fact that both the general government budget and the central government plan for the next year were completed 2 months ahead, that is, before the start of 1981. During the Tuesday meeting, many speakers emphasized the progress implied in this regarding the plans drafted for earlier years. On the other hand it must also be emphasized that the 1981 plan and budget are now compatible--something which is an indispensable condition for their respective implementation. We recall that the Central Government Plan for 1981 is concentrated essentially on two areas: strategic production for exports and supplies for the people. OFFICIAL TO CUBA--Havana, 5 October--A delegation from the FRELIMO Party, headed by Central Committee member and party organizational secretary Jose Oscar Monteiro, arrived today in this city. The delegation is visiting Cuba in response to an invitation from the Central Committee of the Cuban Communist Party. On its arrival, the Mozambican delegation was received by Jesus Montane, member, Central Committee, Cuban Communist Party. It is expected that the two parties will, during the visit, proceed to an exchange of information on their work. [Text] [Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 6 Nov 80 p 1] 5058

WIDESPREAD UNEMPLOYMENT REPORTED

Saint Denis TEMOIGNAGES in French 6 Oct 80 p 3

[Text] In August 1979, 24,851 employment requests were not met, since then: one year later, in August 1980, there were 32,677, that is to say, 7,826 more, an increase of 31.5 percent.

According to the UDF [French Democratic Union] deputy and chairman of the General Council, Pierre Lagourgue, there were 40,000 to which he personally believes he should add 7- to 8,000 to the official figures to be closer to the truth.

These rather large figures, which we are taking from a survey by Daniel Vaxelaire in the last issue of TELE 7 JOURS, which summarized the data furnished in INSEE [National Institute of Statistics and Applied Economics] and the figures quoted by Lagourgue show, if there be any need for it, the heavy burden unemployment has placed on Reunion, a burden which, moreover, continues to increase year by year and even month by month. To be convinced of this, it would suffice to point out that these same figures attributed to a country such as France would mean that from August 1979 to August 1980, the number of unmet jobs requests there would have gone from 2.5 million to almost 3.5 million! And that, as compared with the total population, for if we compare it with the working population, the figures would be even greater. In a situation such as this, it is hard to see how Giscard-Barre or, for that matter, any other UDF deputy can have the courage to tell the French men and women that their politics is the best there is. But what they would not dare say over there, they do here; to prove this, one has only to listen to Paul Dijour, Michel Debre and all the others.

These official figures consittute, in fact, so many indictments against the politics which those in power and their satellites here engage in, a party policy which turns its back on the country's basic concerns such as those relating to Reunion men and women: they are more especially incriminatory as the three "agreements" on the right to work drawn up and made operative here in 1978, in 1979 and now in 1980 and yet, on the other hand, they never stop talking about employment policy, of industrialization encouraging the creation of jobs, etc., etc.

This suspenseful situation, these incriminatory figures, in fact, are but the reflection of a political stance for, as Daniel Vaxelaire very rightly expressed it, "it is impossible to separate the employment problem in Reunion from the more comprehensive question bearing on party policy which predominates the island and consequently on that which constitutes its statutes' basic principles." And it is very interesting, indeed, to note the reactions of "representatives of the employer world, of trade unionists, of political figures," whom D. Vaxelaire has brought together on this unemployments problem in Reunion.

According to Serge Payet, a COLLIER representative, an employer organization, and also a UDF leader, as this association of ideas is a perfectly natural phenomenon, in his opinion, it is certainly not the overall policy, the policy of turning a former colony into a department that should raise any questions. Very much to the contrary, for "if today we can discuss employment problems with youth, it is because they have some hope of survival, that is to say, they are in good health and enjoy a certain security, whereas 30 years ago, this was not the case."

"The argument," to justify the departmentalization policy, as we see it, is a weighty one; no matter if it leads to poverty and unemployment for tens of thousands of people, if there were never any departmentalization, these tens of thousands of people would not now be alive!

We understand more clearly that in his "solution," he contemplates rapidly replacing the working population, the product of the colonial period, by giving it reasonable means of getting started (unemployment compensation in addition to a guarantee of income by making it possible for anyone 60 years old to enter into retirement with 70 percent of his salary).

When all is said and done, whereas some to meet the employment problem face to face, were thinking of drying up on the fountainhead, on the one hand, by reducing the birth rate, and on the other by sending the excess population off to France by emigration of exile, the employer representative is considering the possibility of a third solution: to discharge the "old" personnel and the not so old to make room for youth.

For Pierre Lagourgue, the UDF deputy, to handle the crowds of youth appearing on the job market, "the public authorities have to take it on themselves either to create jobs on the spot, or to make it possible for these young people to leave home without any more trouble than the Auvergnats and Bretons had in the mother country. For the chairman of the General Council, it was the break in political continuity which led to this calamitous situation: to create jobs, but this was precisely what the UDF and the RPR authorities have been planning to do for years and years and it is what the policy which Pierre Lagourgue has introduced is not doing; "to leave the country," but this is emigration-exile, which today is getting out of hand and is heading for failure.

Obviously, on the right, whether it be the UDF or the RPR, they are no way near to getting out of the rut and to providing a genuine solution to this critical problem--unemployment--which is vital for tens of thousands of our fellow men.

For, as Bruny Payet, CGTR [General Confederation of Workers of Reunion] secretary general, emphasizes, when replying within the framework of this survey, "for the time being, there is a labor slowdown on behalf of economy of operation. We would like to establish business undertakings, but it is impossible. Choices must be made in terms of Reunion's needs and not those of the mother country (. . .) The decision center should be in Reunion and not in Paris. We must change the political statute and achieve independence in order to open the way to the country's actual development for its own sake." This is what is known as "a return to a productive and responsible economics" which would be furthered by an overall assistance from France and from Europe which "they indeed owe us since for long years they have lived at the colonies' expense." Moreover, he said, "these measures are headed in the direction of the new worldwide economic order."

RODRIGUES COULD BECOME ANOTHER MAYOTTE

Saint Denis TEMOIGNAGES in French 9 Oct 80 p 1

[Editorial]

[Text] In its 7 October issue, TEMOIGNAGES recalled the threats which hang over the Mauritanian Island of Rodrigues where some would like to establish a South African dependency. Basically that should not be surprising coming from accomplices and servants of imperialism who already have to their credit the secession of the Comoro Islands of Mayotte. Besides, as far back as 1975-76 threats such as these had been made regarding Rodrigues by the man whom we again meet at the very root of the matter, Gaetano Duval, the leader of the PMSD [Mauritanian Social Democratic Party], at the very time when the MMM [Mauritanian Militant Movement] seemed to be prepared to assume power during the legislative elections in December 1976.

Once again it takes only the anticipation of a possible MMM victory at the 1981 elections for the same intrigues to enter into play. But what in our opinion seems especially serious is that Reunion is still more or less directly involved in these schemes. Everyone remembers the welcome which Jean-Paul Virapoulle gave to Gaetano Duval at the very time when the latter was involved in the same intrigues as he is today. Four years later, they seem to be going through the same routine. Now, in fact, can anyone fail to feel uneasy about the eagerness surrounding the arrival of a Rodrigues theatrical troupe as part of the coming Tampon trade fair? Credulous people could be deceived by the pretense of culture whereas others know perfectly well what they are up to. Besides, it will not be at all easy to convince us of the utter blamelessness of the French administration in this matter.

That, as a matter of fact, can only once more disturb the Communists and all the Progressivists in our country. It is the part which once again they are getting ready to have it play in accordance with the line of departure of the intrigues which led to the Mayotte secession; it is also the starting point of the plots hwich led to the bloody overthrow of the Ali Soilih democratic government in the Comoro Islands, the base of several plots against the Democratic Republic of Madagascar and the Seychelles Progressivist government. In regard to these highly objectionable attempts against the people's sovereign rights, it is clearly the duty of every progressivist force in the area to denounce their prime mover and their collaborators. From this standpoint, the French Government surpasses all others in double talk: on the one hand, it means to reassure by speaking of peace; on the other hand, its past activities bear witness against it, just as does the large-scale presence of French international troops based in Reunion.

Our Party, as far as it is concerned, will not be unfaithful to the principles of international unity. It can be relied upon to rouse progressivist opinion in our country as well as in neighboring countries or even farther away, insofar as it can. We can also depend on its unwavering denouncement of those responsible for all the attacks on the people's rights whether it be Gaetano Duval or racist South Africa, in whose company the French Government apparently takes such delight.

EXPLOITABLE PEAT DEPOSITS DISCOVERED

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 27 Oct 80 p 4

[Article by Cherif Elvalide Seye: "The Discovery of Peat Deposits in Senegal"]

[Text] Deny Biram Ndao, 50 km from Dakar. All around this peaceful village the land is very brown, and somewhat spongy, too. A smell of burning comes from the soil. The palm trees still standing, moreover, are scorched to a crisp. Under this countryside, which is not very attractive despite the proximity of a lake, nevertheless lies a wealth that is still unexploited. It is peat, in what seems to be a significant quantity.

Combustible

Peat, or brown power, is a coal-like substance usable as fuel in three forms. For domestic heating. After it is extracted it is enough to cut it up, and it is usable directly, as charcoal is used. It can also be used as energy fuel for ovens (of a brickworks), for example, and for processing industries and breweries. Finally, peat can be used in electric power stations. In Ireland, for example, two stations of 180 megawatts each are operating with peat (Senegal's electric power is 170 megawatts).

In Germany, peat is also used as a substitute for charcoal in small electric power stations and as fertilizer. Even in Africa, in Burundi, peat occupies an important place in supplying energy. Ovens, brickworks, cement plants and a 160-megawatt electric power station are operating with peat.

Optimism

For Senegal, whose oil bill has risen from 5,000,000,000 to 50,000,000,000, or some 40 percent of its export revenues, the discovery of peat deposits in the Niayes area and the Fleuve region is a very good prospect. In addition to the Fleuve and Louga regions and the Niayes area, which harbor important possibilities for exploitable deposits, Sine Saloum and Casamance reveal a geologic context favorable to the presence of peat.

At Deny Biram Ndao in the Niayes, a second phase of studying the deposits has just begun. In fact, preliminary studies have just come to an end on an optimistic note.

The signs that have been analyzed are revealed to be very interesting, as much for the quality of the peat as for conditions for exploitation. The peat is not damp, as is the case most of the time, and moreover it is found at a slight depth of 40 to 60 centimeters when it does not show on the surface. The second phase is to make it possible by detailed studies to determine the calorific power of the deposits and their density, to evaluate the available reserves. In fact, a minimum of 1,500,000 tons is required to be able to go on to industrial exploitation. In Senegal, in the Niayes area alone, over 60 hectares have already been discovered, the same number toward Ndiawdoun and some 30 hectares toward Kebemer. If the second phase confirms the conclusions from the first, it will then be a matter of determining how to use the deposits. An early use seems to have been found for the Rao deposit. A brickworks is provided for, several meters from the deposit. It has almost been established that this brickworks will operate on peat.

The Chance

The interest in these deposits is manifold. Especially in the diversification of our energy resources. Moreover this point is one of the three sections of the new energy policy. Peat, which is capable of replacing charcoal, is also likely to limit the desertification that resulted from the cutting of timber. Finally, for energy saving, peat appears to be an inexpensive energy source.

These are all reasons why the decision was taken to conduct the project as rapidly as possible. And it may not be long before Senegal enters the era of peat exploitation. The minister of Industrial Development, who visited the Deny Biram Ndao deposits for a long time on Thursday with the director of mines, provided a good illustration of the resolution taken not to let the chance go by that peat represents for the country.

EDITORIAL ATTACKS LESOTHO'S AMBIVALENT POLICY TOWARD SOUTH AFRICA

Johannesburg DIE TRANSVALER in Afrikaans 29 Sep 80 p 8

[Editorial: "The Lesotho Game"]

[Text] Lesotho is facing a crisis of credibility.

On the home front, its prime minister, Dr Leabua Jonathan, has had an apparent successful bridging meeting with his South African peer, P. W. Botha. However, at the UN General Assembly, his minister of foreign affairs, Charles Molapo, has been singing a tune which, according to Pik Botha, is in sharp contrast with the spirit of the bridging meeting.

Such actions are synonymous with a reckless insensitivity to the complicated problems of southern Africa, where not only black-white relations are at stake, but also those between independent black countries such as Lesotho and its neighbor, Transkei, and therefore black-black relations.

Malpop's views, moreover, cannot stand the test of credibility.

He says that South Africa wants to use the planned constellation of states to gain international recognition for the former homelands which are now independent. Yet President Kaiser Matanzima of Transkei has pointed out that Lesotho itself is the product of a policy of separate freedoms for separate states. The only difference was that the BSL countries got their independence from Britain and countries such as the Transkei got theirs from South Africa, but now the latter must pay for "the mortal sin."

As for Malopo's reproach that South Africa is the main cause for the economic and political instability in Southern Africa, this is a strange thing coming from a country which is dependent on the republic for nothing less than its very existence.

It may, therefore, be assumed with certainty that Dr Jonathan's further reaction on these events can drastically influence South Africa's future relations with Lesotho.

TUCSA PRESIDENT EXPLAINS IMPORTANCE OF TRADE UNION, FAVORS LIBERALISM

Johannesburg DIE TRANSVALER in Afrikaans 30 Sep 80 p 8

[Interview with TUCSA President Steve Scheepers by Koos Botha]

[Text] Last week the Trade Union Council of South Africa (TUCSA) held its 26th annual conference in Durban where Steve Scheepers (68) was conferred the permanent title of honorary president of TUCSA. In the past, TUCSA has been denounced as being left-liberal; but today, as an organization which represents more than 280,000 workers in practically all the industries of the private sector (with the exception of agriculture) it stands out as a strong pillar of support in labor relations. Scheepers, who has known trade unionism for nearly 50 years, was until 1979 also a member of the prime minister's Economic Advisory Council and served there for 12 years. Koos Botha interviewed him on trade unionism in South Africa.

Question: This past TUCSA conference was relatively a quiet one compared with the conferences of the past. To what do you attribute this?

Answer: In the past the most important points of difficulty to which TUCSA gave its full attention were to a great extent the result of the Wiehahn and Riekert commissions. At the time we established TUCSA, job reservation was one of the main reasons for our doing so. We have been accused of favoring the left, but this has never been so.

Points of Friction

We have done no more than presenting the workers' case; of course this has touched upon matters of economy, but because economy and politics are to a great extent interwined, there have been points of friction between our points of view and politics. Today we could still clash with the government on many areas over matters which affect the just rights of the workers.

The worker must be able to present his point of view. This is necessary for good labor relations and the unions are the most effective channel through which he can present his point of view.

Thus the recognition of black trade unions has also been one of our demands.

As a country keeps on getting industrialized the workers' interests also keep on increasing and trade unionism develops further. This is an evolutionary process.

Question: Are you entirely satisfied with the new labor state of affairs?

Answer: Putting proposals into effect through legislation should not be accomplished at too slow a pace.

People become impatient over foot dragging and this does no good to South Africa's picture overseas.

Question: TUCSA has grown a great deal and it seems that there is a great deal of unity in its ranks, but what about the South African Confederation of Labor which has lately lost a large number of members?

Answer: The confederation is opposed to changes, but I think that trade union leaders within the confederation will be bringing about change themselves. With its exclusive white membership, the organization will be lagging behind.

By recognizing trade union rights for black workers, a mighty organization of black workers can become a reality.

It is in the interest of white workers as well as black workers to have responsible and effective leaders help organize black workers. It is necessary to stop irresponsible leaders from stringing along the black workers. A radical block of workers could disturb industrial peace.

Question: Is there a sufficient number of effective labor leaders?

Answer: The availability of people who know labor laws, who can handle trade union matters and also people is presenting a great problem. Universities will have to help in filling the gaps. There are too many labor leaders without matriculation, but technicians can help in this.

Knowledge of People

Employers themselves must see to it that they have competent people for managing industrial relations. Management and employees cannot do without each other. Moreover, personnel officials must have something else besides academic qualifications.

It is extremely important that employers see to it that their personnel officials possess a deeper knowledge of people. They must be able to counsel workers on all kinds of matters which they should know as workers. Through management's help the worker must realize that he is being accepted as a part of the enterprise. This makes for a durable labor peace. In cases where workers air grievances and present demands through the union, there must be negotiation rather than confrontation.

Contentment among workers promotes loyalty and increases productivity. Employers must realize that the many incompetent personnel officials who are still around are proving to be a burden on them. Absence from work is one of the ways in which the worker shows his dissatisfaction. In an industry, the turnover of workers represents a hidden loss, because it takes years to train another worker to do the same job.

Question: Is there a danger that the unions in South Africa could develop to a level where, as is the case in Britain, they can even blackmail the government?

Answer: That is also the case in Holland and in the Scandinavian countries, but I do not think that such a situation will arise here. A trade union is an economic organization which must not get involved in politics. Trade unions must have the right to strike, but they must use this right very discreetly and never misuse it.

Question: Recently there have been strikes, especially among black workers, and there is talk of irresponsible leaders. Does this entail the possibility of large-scale labor unrest?

Answer: People who have been completely unknown in trade unionism have suddenly shown up as trade union leaders organizing black workers. As I have stated, they need responsible and competent leaders.

A Last Weapon

I think that the present feeling is due to the changes. For the first time, the black workers are getting trade union rights and to a great extent the strikes represent an exercising of wings. However this should not last more than 3 or 4 years. It is very important that the government, other authorities and employers abstain from reacting to this. As time goes on new trade union leaders and the workers themselves will realize that the right to strike should not be used right from the start. It is an expensive affair for the worker as well and a strike should be used as a last resort.

Question: What advice would you give to trade unions which do not apply for registration?

Answer: Registration means higher respectability, legal recognition and enforceable conditions; however I am opposed to mandatory registration. As time goes on leaders who now refuse to register will realize the advantages of registration.

ASU PLANNING INTERRACIAL DISCUSSION OF PROBLEMS

Johannesburg DIE TRANSVALER in Afrikaans 28 Sep 80 p 4

[Article by Wessel van Wyk: "ASU Plans To Speak Right Out"]

[Text] The Afrikaans Student Union (ASU) has decided to talk with moderate and radical blacks on the topic of differences and to do so "without mincing words."

Formal contact will be made with leaders of the national states and people of other color will be invited to attend Kuesta, the ASU's annual art show which will be taking place in Stellenbosch this coming year.

For the past 3 days, the top management of the ASU has been meeting in Pretoria for the so-called Irene deliberations for the purpose of examining in depth its role in politics in consultation with managerial and development consultants and for laying down guidelines for the coming term.

In a statement which was issued yesterday in the name of the top management, it was announced that provisions are being made for the accommodations of a wide spectrum of political thinking within the ASU. The movement will be studying national and other vital questions and creating the opportunity to give attention to these.

Leadership

Contacts with the various groups will also be arranged through conferences and in so doing the ASU will be acting as a leader in the political opinionforming of students.

The top management has put great emphasis on formal and informal contacts with other cultural groups in order to stimulate mutual understanding and respect.

In the contacts with radical and moderate groups and community leaders, common interests will be presented as a point of departure; however, in points of difference there will be "no mincing of words."

A report will be drafted at the end of each contact-event for the purpose of getting the broad spectrum of students involved in this.

People of other color and all other interested persons will also be welcome to attend the ASU's Kuesta art show which will be taking place next year in Stellenbosch.

Culture

Among the other objectives, which the ASU has set for the next term, are an extensive introduction activity campaign among students and formal contacts with the leaders of the national states.

The top management has made no formal statement with respect to POLSTU, the recently formed student movement, but Johan Dames, a member of its top management, said that POLSTU has been granted the right to attend informal discussions.

SOUTH AFRICA SHOULD REJECT FOREICN HELP IN ITS POLICY READAPTATION

Johannesburg DIE TRANSVALER in Afrikaans 26 Sep 80 p 12

["Perspective" column by Otto Krause: "No, to the 'Princes' from Abroad"]

[Text] It was with the slogan "South Africa First", that the Nationalist Party was launched during the early teens of this century and it proved to be a mighty slogan. The priority which the Nationalist Party gave to the interest of the country factor turned it into a long-term winning party.

General Hertzog's "South Africa first" proposition in those early years had to do with the relations between Afrikaners and English speakers. That national point of view then was that they could learn to coexist only if they would put the country's interest before everything else.

The charge which was directed against the jingo English of that time was that they were serving the foreign interests of the British Empire. They would have to stop doing so and this sort of foreign interest would have to have even less interference with South African matters.

Underlying the ideas of South Africa First was the imperative necessity of coexistence on an equal basis, namely, that no population group would be put on a better footing than the other.

It was this factor that created opposition against the English speakers who at that time were not only serving a foreign power, but also using this foreign influence to manage themselves into a dominant position.

Moreover, it remains a striking aspect of South Africa's intricate multinational framework that a group that wishes to play a dominant role here amongst us all too often is inclined to call upon a foreign power to help it achieve this or to establish it in that position.

This was the case with the local English during the stormy period at the end of the last century and thereafter. There are strong indications of this now among the radical blacks of our country. But very unfortunately the help of foreign-inspired trends of thinking has also affected our Afrikaners--our Afrikaners who, with the very growth of our Nationalist Party, so detested such ideas.

Perhaps this is due to the fact that circumstances of coexistence in South Africa simply cannot tolerate for long a system of preference of one group above others, so that groups which want to place themselves in a dominant position in the end are forced to seek their welfare outside of South Africa.

Yet it is clear that our Afrikaners, who have always been so opposed to foreign influences, have started to look more and more for support from abroad as they began to feel that their position of preference was being threatened.

As we have continued to sin against the imperative requirement of coexistence on an equal basis, we have increasingly forsaken our doctrine of South Africa First--just like the English of old.

This phenomenon among our people had been noted with increasing frequency ever since the sixties. It was then that we began to feel threatened for the first time... after the Sharpeville incident and the subsequent condemnation and pressure from abroad.

Actually it was because of this that a sort of psychological situation arose among us against this pressure and it was this very thing which led us to pin our hopes on those abroad who opposed people who declared themselves as anti-South Afrikaners. Thus, for example, during American elections we have prayed for victories by Goldwater, Nixon and Ford and now once again we are hoping for a Reagan victory.

Information

Yet the pressure on South Africa (or rather on our position within South Africa) has increased and as prayers have not helped we have switched over to actual measures. We thought that we could influence the West's opinion to be in our favor and thus in the seventies we invested millions of rands in the great information campaign. Later this operation blew up, but the fact that it did is one thing. However, the fact that we undertook it (and on such a large scale) simply attests to our fearful state of mind.

Actually all this hope for salvation from abroad and all our efforts to influence the world's opinion about us stands out as a monument of our refusal to adapt ourselves to the imperative need for equality in coexistence.

Fortunately under the government of P. W. Botha we have made great strides toward a more refined understanding of things. The old longing and pinning of our hopes upon foreign friends is still there however. Moreover, the temptation to sin against our doctrine of South Africa First can surface again as the Western world swings back to conservatism...as the present trends strongly indicate.

French Plan

An example of this sort of temptation could be seen in the proposal for "resolving the South African difficulty" by the French Gaulist leader Jacques Chirac, the former French prime minister, mayor of Paris and a potential candidate for the presidency.

This proposal would include the abandonment of apartheid, the establishment of a system of confederation in South Africa and a French "guarantee" to us with respect to threats from abroad. Through this guise, France would also promote our return to the world community.

At first glance, such a plan for support from abroad appears to have a certain amount of attraction. South Africa is, in any case, about to abandon "apartheid"...the prime minister has expressed himself in favor of a confederal arrangement, therefore, why should we not go along with such a foreign initiative?

But here again such a mingling from abroad would represent a sin against the doctrine of South Africa First. A guarantee from a Western (and white) nation--for what it may be worth--would simply arouse suspicion among the blacks of South Africa against the entire plan; it would, moreover, sow discord in the sense that outside help which would play to the advantage of one side or the other would be sought. In addition, this would indicate an inability on our part to resolve our own problems.

If we are going to stick by the principle of South Africa First this means that, as in the old days with the English, South Africa's people must be able to build a satisfactory interracial arrangement. Moreover, the wisdom of those days taught us that such an arrangement must be one in which everybody is treated equally and in which no one group can dominate over another.

With respect to ourselves and the blacks, such a plan is exactly a confederation in which there is no discrimination. However, let's just make this our own South African confederation.

CENSUS REPORT SHOWS VERY SMALL GROWTH IN WHITE POPULATION

Johannesburg DIE TRANSVALER in Afrikaans 1 Oct 80 p 7

[Article by Andre Potgieter: "Qwaqwa's Numbers Grow Fastest"]

[Text] Bloemfontein--Of all the black national states in the republic, Qwaqwa, which borders on the Free State, is the one which evidences the highest population growth since the previous census, states Dr Tjart du Plessis, the secretary of statistics.

According to the current analysis of Census-1980, which was completed earlier this year, the population of Qwaqwa increased 59 percent to 232,000 since the previous population status in 1970.

Of all the black states the most recent national state, Kangwane, evidenced the least growth, the state's population growing only 33 percent over the past years.

With regard to growth among the coloreds, the Free State also had the highest growth trend of all provinces as is apparent from the first analysis from the Department of Statistics. The growth among the coloreds was 44 percent in the Free State and this is nearly twice as much as the Cape's figure of 23 percent, even though the Cape is the traditional home of the coloreds.

During past years, the coloreds' population numbers in Natal increased 29 percent and 40 percent in Transvaal.

It also appears that there has been a great "population shift from Cape Province to other provinces and that Asians are also "moving outward" to other provinces.

On the other hand, the Free State's white population had especially slow growth in the course of the last decade, amounting to only 4 percent. This is being ascribed to the fact that the Free State's white inhabitants are "older" than those of other provinces.

The census people have also drawn the conclusion that there has been a great population shoft from the provinces and also the Cape to Natal and Transvaal.

The Cape's whites have increased only 0.9 percent per year over the past 10 years. A regional sampling also brought to light that the republic's population since 1970 increased 27 percent to 23.7 million, according to Dr Du Plessis.

REMAINING HOMELANDS RELUCTANT TO GO FOR INDEPENDENCE

Johannesburg DIE TRANSVALER in Afrikaans 1 Oct 80 p 2

[Article by Bert Ferreira: "The New Ciskey: This Is How Other States Feel"]

[Text] The big question last night was how Ciskei's decision to accept independence is going to affect the leaders of the remaining six dependent national states in South Africa.

So far they have been mainly opposed to independence patterned after that of Transkei, Bophutatswana and Venda. Above all, they have firmly resolved not to give up their South African citizenship under any circumstances.

Dr Cedric Phatudi, the chief minister of Lebowa, took a strong position against independence just 2 weeks ago in Pietersburg. He stated that Lebowa is a part of South Africa and wants to remain a part of it.

In order to spur development in the region, he has, however, asked for participation in the customs union and also for the transfer of the South African Development Trust Lands which are intended for Lebowa, so that in so doing it will gain access to the mine investments that are derived from this.

Jointly

He also asked for the setting up of joint development regions in the industrial and business districts of Potgietersrus, Pietersburg, Tzaneen and Phalaborwa.

Following the msot recent deliberations which took place in August between the prime minister and the chief minister of the state, E. J. Mazuba of Kangwane stated that he could not manage independence. His region wants to remain a part of the republic and participate in the constitutional developments.

The chief minister of Gazankulu, Prof Hudson Ntsanwise, who is now abroad, stated at the time that his government had more important priorities than independence. Among thse priorities there are the economic development of hisnation and participation in the determination of the fate of South Africa through the Presidential Council or other alternative acceptable systems.

Chief Gatsha Buthelezi's opposition to independence has been expressed in most of his addresses. His ideal for South Africa is a unitary state.

The chief minister of Qwaqwa, Kenneth Mopedi, has in the past also leaned toward a unitary state and so far he has not been an advocate of independence.

Kandebele, the newest of the national states, has been viewed up until recently as a strong candidate for independence when the time is ripe for that. Recently, however, there have also been signs of hesitation.

SUCCESSES, FAILURES OF NYERERE'S POLITICAL, ECONOMIC POLICIES

Paris LE MONDE in French 21, 22, and 23 Oct 80

[21 Oct 80, pp 1, 5]

[Article by Jean-Pierre Langellier: "Socialism in Outline Form"]

[Text] Mr Julius Nyerere is seeking his fifth presidential mandate on Sunday 26 October as the candidate of the Revolutionary Party, Tanzania's only political party. Mr Aboud Joumbe, president of the Zanzibar Revolutionary Council, will be the sole vice-presidential candidate. Tanzania has thus opted for continuity at the head of state at a time when it is confronting serious economic problems, due mainly to drought, and diplomatic problems, especially in its relations with Kenya and Uganda. Dar-es-Salaam has had a contingent of 10,000 soldiers in Uganda since the fall of Marshal Idi Amin, and the border with Kenya has remained closed since February 1977 on the initiative of President Nyerere.

Dar-es-Salaam--Every Sunday shortly before 1400 hours, the streets of the Tanzanian capital become suddenly empty, as though threatened by an invisible danger. The shops and restaurants lock up after the last customer. In the marketplace, the fresh fish is priced to sell quickly. Everybody hotfoots it home before the fateful hour. As the weekend draws to a close, the city folds up and quietly slows to a walk. All vehicular traffic is forbidden till Monday morning.

Some vehicles are exempt from this "antiwaste" measure because of their public utility, e.g. taxis and buses, or because they have diplomatic immunity. Policemen in white emerge at the main intersections. Miscreants beware! The penalty is heavy: a stiff fine and confiscation of the automobile. This prohibition, along with other measures such as closing gas pumps 3 days out of 7, jerrycans forbidden, has proved to be moderately effective. Fuel consumption has fallen about 11 percent in a year.

In terms of bundles of foreign currency, these savings nonetheless justify these few points of authoritarianism, which inconvenience only a handful of privileged people. President Nyerere even straddled a bicycle one day before a group of duly assembled photographers. The gesture was meant to set an example, but it does not seem to have had much success, if any. Its symbolic quality remained. Every year Tanzania's petroleum bill (for crude and refined products) comes to about half of its export income. It is an overwhelming burden that has multiplied 10 times in 7 years. Thus, in these austere times, there is no such thing as small savings for the most frugal of African socialisms.

Socialism? In Dar-es-Salaam, that is something for the distant future, preferably. Ten years after the famous Arusha declaration (5 February 1967), which was the baptismal certificate of the Tanzanian experiment, Mr Nyerere was already looking askance at what had been accomplished. It was a lucid, courageous assessment marked by disenchantment. "We have not achieved our goal," he observed. "It is not even in sight. I thought socialism could be built in 30 years. I was wrong. It will take a lot longer.... As you can see, I am a very bad prophet."

Of course, the progress made alone legitimizes the "good choice" made at Arusha. But it has been given a relative evaluation in its historical perspective. It was understood that the advent of socialism would take several generations and would be incomplete for a long time, an ideal to be sketched out and filled in.

Yielding to his penchant for imagery, the "mwalimu" (schoolmaster) said more recently, "There is a time to sow and a time to reap. I fear that we are still at seed-time."

Is this the clear-eyed confession of a sober visionary or excessive modesty intended to disarm malicious critics? No doubt there is something of the ruse in this salutary recourse to political humility. By admitting that he has undertaken a very far-reaching labor, and by admitting of himself, before anyone else might, that building socialism--which is, nonetheless, the supreme justification of the way that has been taken--will spill over to a great extent into the next century, this clever strategist all the more easily pacifies foreign moneylenders--and they are numerous--interested or captivated by the Tanzanian experiment. His determined efforts win sympathy. The objective to be reached is put off so far in the future that it becomes mythologized and exempt from any present judgment. How do you evaluate utopia? For Mr Nyerere, self-criticism is assuredly a form of therapy that has many uses.

It remains that the "mwalimu" has distinguished more clearly than other African leaders between what is desirable and what is possible. It is appropriate to evaluate the regime's successes and present mistakes in the area of agriculture, not only because 9 out of 10 Tanzanians still work on the land, and almost always with hand tools, but especially--and rightly so--because the leaders themselves have made a privileged place for village unity in their political strategy and made rural development the foremost inspiration of their action and the yardstick of their experiment.

What Third-World experiment has been more written about than the Tanzanian "ujamaa"? Halfway between the Israeli kibbutz and the Chinese commune, but retaining most of all precolonial collective values, the doctrine of "ujamaa" (in Swahili, "family," in the broad sense of the word) was intended to create self-managed villages as the basic cells of an agrarian socialism unique in Africa. In Mr Nyerere's mind, the concept of "ujamaa" went hand in hand with another idea, "Kujitegemea" (self-reliance), which has often been translated as self-sufficiency. In its initial--and very ambitious--model, "ujamaa" is the offspring of both capitalism and doctrinaire socialism; it involves the common ownership of land and the collective use of social services.

The original project foundered. The Tanzanian leaders cherished a few illusions, as they seemed to believe in the almost spontaneous proliferation of "ujamaa" units. The virtue of example and the effect of persuasion, they thought, would sweep away obstacles and reticence. That was a serious mistake in judgment. When the voluntary village regrouping phase was over, collective production accounted for just 2 percent of cultivated land. It was an undeniable failure. The regime then had a spasm of authoritarianism. In 1971, the regrouping policy became mandatory. Overzealous officials sometimes enforced it by force of arms.

The "Development Villages"

The abuses of power committed against recalcitrants at the time--and officially admitted since then--have somewhat tarnished the regime's image. Last spring, the government announced cash indemnity payments to 13,000 farmers whose houses and fields had been destroyed in a forceful "ujamaa" operation. Faced with farmers' resistance and "mental blocks" that Mr Nyerere would later deplore, the regime reduced its ambitions. The "villagization" program, accelerated in 1973, put the damper on collectivization of land.

Where is rural self-management today? By appointing several thousand "village managers," with the necessary powers, the government has implicitly condemned it, at least in the short run. By definition, self-management cannot be imposed from without. What about agrarian socialism? While the existence of a community field is the rule, the duties it imposes are few. For the farmer, there is only one obligation: to devote 3 mornings a week to village production. By working in the community field, the farmer fulfills his quota in exchange for services (drinking water, education, and health care) that are provided for him by his belonging to the "development village." He still devotes most of his time and energy to the family plot.

According to the latest figures, published in June, 87 percent of Tanzanians live in nearly 8,300 "development villages," which official terminology still lists as "ujamaa." Actually, authentic "ujamaa" villages number hardly a dozen (even Butiama, the president's home village, does not rate this label). This is the report of agronomist Rene Dumont, who traveled the length and breadth of Tanzania for 3 months at the request of Mr Nyerere, 12 years after an initial survey was made.

In his report, Mr Dumont expresses his sympathy for Mr Nyerere's policy but criticizes severely the "villagization" program. The villages are too big, too far from each other (250 families would make an ideal population), and their siting is often poorly planned, ignoring ecological and agricultural facts (soil fertility and the possibility of irrigation); fields are not allowed to lie fallow; and women, who are burdened with many family duties, are the primary victims of these planning mistakes.

Other reproaches are more "political": lack of prior consultation of the people; insufficient consideration of the farmers' individualism; overly formal delegation of powers to the grassroots. "Socialism has been imposed from above, by the president on the masses," the agronomist notes. "The masses were not at all convinced it was necessary. The farmers by far prefer to work their own plots than the community field.... The villagers still have no real power. They are not represented at the highest party levels, which are dominated by city dwellers. In Tanzania, the real problem is that of farmer power." Therein lies, according to Rene Dumont, the origin of the present agricultural reverses.

"Demobilized" Farmers

While many Tanzanians--mainly city dwellers--are malnourished, none suffers from famine, which is a plight familiar to their east African brothers. Since independence, the regime has rightly given priority to insuring self-sufficiency in food for the farming masses. Despite atmospheric vagaries, this was maintained in good years and bad until 1979. But at the same time, export crops were neglected, a miscalculation frequent in the Third World. Thus, regular agricultural growth--sometimes exceeding 10 percent--mainly benefited the subsistence sector. Exchange-earning cash crops sometimes declined (coffee, sisal, cashews) and sometimes were stagnant (cotton, tobacco). Only tea increased noticeably.

This pattern of drift was due to many causes, which were often denounced--though too late--by the leaders themselves, causes that one constantly stumbles across in Tanzania, as elsewhere in Africa. First comes disdain for the producer, who is underpaid by the government organization in charge of purchasing crops. No villager produces, unless forced to, as long as he gets no profit for himself and his family. He is thus quickly "demobilized." No regime, however well-meaning, can flout this golden rule of farm workers.

There are other aggravating factors. Lack of depots limits stockpiling capacity. Through international financing, the government will set up a network of grain silos. However, a lack of foreign exchange is preventing it from importing sufficient fertilizer. Spare parts are lacking. On the sisal plantations, fewer than 2/3 of the tractors are in working order. On the tobacco plantations, only 1/10 of the Land Rovers are operational. An agronomical expert estimates that they could be replaced advantageously with motorcycles at 16 times less the cost.

Add to all that carelessness in farming, and the lack of technicians or technicians who have been hastily trained. There is only one agricultural agent for tobacco for every 350 farmers. According to official figures, only 10 percent of the arable land is being cultivated, and 3 percent is being irrigated. Oil plants are "turning over" at 25 percent capacity. An American report estimates that the decline in export crops represents an annual lack of $150 million that has to be made up. This is a drop in quantity and also in quality. Some 6 sacks of coffee in 10 are considered by buyers to be "fermented."

When the specter of hunger is abroad, one has to be less "orthodox." According to a recent study ordered from the FAO by the minister of agriculture, drought has cut the next corn harvest by 40 percent. Last spring, Tanzania sent an SOS to the Western countries (LE MONDE, 2 April 80). The United States sent corn; Japan, rice; Canada and Australia, wheat. This year, only sugar will be adequate. The weaknesses mentioned above also largely explain the decline in food production. To pay the grain bill, the government will have to draw upon its meager foreign exchange reserves. In an election year--it will take place on 26 October--it is unseemly to ask farmers to eat manioc. So into the garbage with principles! While addressing a village audience, President Nyerere recently said, "If I am told we have no food and that South Africa is the only country that can give us some, I'll go buy it." It is a way of admitting in all honesty that for good reason Tanzania would be ready to deal with the devil.

[Text] Basic Needs Hobble Idealism

Dar-es-Salaam--Productivity, yield profit. These words flourish in Tanzanian political discourse, but they do not sound exactly socialist. But what do ideological connotations matter when it comes to giving emergency treatment to a sick economy!

Shortly before being fired, the former finance minister, Mr Edwin Mtei, put it bluntly: "Worker productivity has fallen by half in 10 years. Tanzania is on an almost general 'go-slow.'" The expression "go-slow" is very convenient. It modestly covers all kinds of work slowdowns and stoppages. True, the word "strike" is still taboo. The president then contradicted his minister's judgment, arguing that the workers were not to blame. The lack of raw materials, electrical outages, and bad transportation system obviously could not be blamed on them.

And yet. How can production be increased in a socialist system grafted onto a poor society? This is an old Third-World debate and a tough problem that is being faced--boldly or not--by neighbors and allies Messrs Machel, Kaunda, or Mugabe. The "mwalimu" used to think that the essence of socialism consisted in the way in which wealth was distributed. Now he is mainly concerned with production. Almost 20 years after independence, Mr Nyerere the visionary is being hobbled by meeting basic needs.

"Material Stimuli"

Three shocks have severly shaken the Tanzanian economy: the petroleum crisis, the collapse of the east African community (1977), and the war against Amin Dada (1978-79). The coffee "boom" made it possible to soften the first shock for a while. The administrative restructuring caused by the second one ate up $25 million (its long-term effects are less easy to calculate). The Uganda expedition cost $500 million, $300 million of which was in foreign exchange (to buy military hardware).

A glance at the government budget confirms that times are hard. In the last 2 years, the budgetary deficit is 4 times estimate. It is at about $230 million. Paying for imports forces increased reliance on foreign aid. The finance minister, Mr Ahmad Jamal, admits that it will take 6 or 7 years for foreign trade to recover. Foreign exchange reserves are near zero.

To get back on course, the government is resorting to good old capitalist recipes. Thus it is with increases in indirect taxes: between 8 and 24 percent on gasoline, cigarettes, and beer.

Another procedure has been useful: reward anybody producing more than the norm. Whether it is called stimulus, prize or "bonus," the method is universal. Despite its egalitarian ideology, the Tanzanian regime has made it its own. Last May, the president announced a large increase in the minimum wage, sometimes reaching 40 percent, which had been "frozen" for 5 years. At the same time, a party brochure devoted to a "new policy of productivity" advocated the installation of a "bonus" system for the benefit of workers and national companies exceeding production objectives. Contrariwise, the "lazy ones" would get no prize or annual promotion. In this respect, official doctrine still wavers: the standing Labor Tribunal has rejected a plan to give tobacco planters a bonus for every kilo harvested.

Off of Dar-es-Salaam, boats wait an average of 2 weeks before entering the port, where the warehouses are full. Their twinkling lights provide one of the rare night spectacles. According to shipping company officials, it takes 4 times longer to unload here than in Mombasa (not counting the penalties due to waiting at sea). Besides the inadequacy of piers and warehouses, the status of the longshoremen is also to blame for this bad performance. After the breakup of the east African community, their wages were reduced by a third. Thus, they seek to make up the money by working overtime and getting night-shift bonuses, whence the calculated slowdown.

Similar productivity deficiencies are clearly evident in the infant industrial sector. Largely financed by foreign aid, the projects are legion. But, as the prime minister, Mr Edward Sokoine, has deplored, these projects are poorly carried out and even ill-conceived: mistakes in planning, poor siting, continual budget overruns, and increased dependence on imported machines and equipment, which are great consumers of foreign exchange. Setting up a true replacement industry remains an unattainable goal. One example out of ten: Tanzania has sulfur and phosphate reserves but imports these raw materials and transforms them in its fertilizer factories. Industry generally functions at half its capacity. A range of products of prime necessity are chronically unavailable except on the black market: flour, oil, soap, linen.

Along with the recovery of agriculture, the modernization of the transportation system is one of the two economic priorities of the regime. The central railway system--one narrow-gauge track--was built at the end of the 19th century by German colonizers and has never been renovated. The main lines are in pitiful condition. It cannot handle the traffic from the ports--Dar and Tanga. There is a severe shortage of railroad cars and heavy vehicles.

Poorly Run National Companies

Tanzania has not escaped bureaucratic sluggishness, which is an almost inevitable illness of socialized economies. Thus, people in Dar-es-Salaam are ready to talk about the necessary "degreasing" of the 300-odd "para-state" companies, which Rene Dumont criticized most sharply in his report. According to the French agronomist, the national companies are overstaffed, underequipped, badly administered, and spendthrift. Public administration doubled in size between 1970 and 1976. Administrative officialdom engulfs 16 percent of the national income. "In Tanzania," Rene Dumont notes, giving examples, "there are three bureaucracies: the administration, the party, and national companies. Very often the bureaucracy is in the hands of a privileged elite that conducts the affairs of state in the interest of the people in power." This might be considered a snap judgment, especially if one considers the ravages of nepotism in many African countries. However, President Nyerere will not deny it, for he has often fulminated against "incompetence, arrogance, and laziness among the leaders."

Despite that, the return to capitalism--need it be said--is less likely than ever. Medicine, one of the last refuges of private enterprise, was recently socialized. Hospitals and private clinics have fallen under the aegis of the government or certain organizations the government has selected (Red Cross, religious missions). The 200-odd private physicians--70 of whom work full time--will have to negotiate with their new employer a contract providing for a fixed salary. The minister of health says that private medical offices benefited only a rich clientele, which, he says, is a privilege incompatible with the principles of socialism. The reproach is well founded. But it is hard to see how this will help impoverished patients waiting in line in public hospitals that are overcrowded and short of medicines.

The Reduction of Inequality

The nationalization of the legal profession has been approved in principle. It will be applied when the state considers itself able to take over the technically complex tasks in this area. Last spring, a monopoly on the imports of basic products was given to 14 national companies. No ill intentions are needed to find "racial" motives behind these various socialist measures. The Asian community--Indians and Pakistanis--(about 80,000 people) still largely controls the commercial sector. Despite progress in Africanization, Asians are still broadly represented among doctors and lawyers. Pure coincidences? The minister of commerce himself recently urged "non-African Tanzanians to observe more closely the principles of socialism."

Beyond the abuses of authority, mistakes, and mistaken obstinacy an unforgettable work has been accomplished since 1961. Too poor, Tanzania was the most ignored of the British east African colonies. The development of infrastructures and the training of officials were doled out stingily. In 1980, however, the average Tanzanian is better nourished and cared for than his Ugandan cousin and as well off as his Kenyan brother. What other African regime has taken such trouble, other than in speeches, to ease the daily life of the farmers--9 out of 10 Tanzanians--and to satisfy their aspirations for a better life? Four villages in 10 have drinking water and a dispensary; 9 out of 10 have a primary school. Universal primary education was introduced in 1977, several years ahead of schedule. Nearly 70 percent of the adults can read and write, as opposed to fewer than 10 percent 20 years ago.

Stamping out inequality is not just a propaganda theme. According to the World Bank, the range of after-tax incomes (between the minimum wage and the best salary in public service) was 1:50 at the time of independence. In 1975, the range was only 1:8. The people who drive Mercedes elsewhere in Africa, the "wabenzi," have no place in Dar-es-Salaam. Tanzanian society is probably one of the most equitable there are.

Few Political Prisoners

The frugality of President Nyerere, his Franciscan simplicity, his scorn for ostentation and megalomania, and his legendary integrity have rubbed off on the ruling circle. Of course, not all his officials are incorrupt. Sometimes the "code of morality" adopted at Arusha is forgotten. A few names circulate among the foreign community, who can give exact cases--including even diamond smuggling--and can quote percentages, but the guilty are few. The degree of motivation and integrity of Tanzanian ministers and high-level public officials is widely recognized. More serious in the eyes of the farmer are the small, daily acts of corruption, the village kickback--which is nicely called "tea" and is more difficult to root out. However, no one can claim impunity. While the regime has the political courage to admit its weaknesses, as it did at a recent party meeting in Arusha where the administration's abuses of power were reviewed, the regime also knows how to punish its wayward members. Policemen guilty of extortion have been thrown in jail, and incompetent officials have been expelled from the party.

Next 26 October, the "mwalimu," at age 58, will again be the only candidate of the Chama Cha Mapinduzi (CCM--Rally for the Revolution) in the presidential election. Who would dare pose as his successor? However, force is not the mainspring of his political longevity. Tanzania is not like what is commonly called a police state. Political prisoners? A taboo subject. But everything leads one to believe that they are rare, except for the group of opponents recently arrested in Zanzibar (LE MONDE, 14 Aug 80). The elegant presidential palace, with its white, Moorish arcades, is one of the least guarded in Africa. Tribalism plays a very limited role. The exiles of the Tanzanian Action Front, who send out tracts every now and then, represent mainly themselves.

The army? Mr Nyerere has secretly distrusted it since the 1964 rebellion. Men in his confidence hold key posts. For the first time, he has become indebted to it, since its victory in Uganda. But the military is increasingly associated with the work of the party, which hardly seems to indicate a climate of mutual distrust. The enlistment of the 10,000 soldiers hastily recruited among the unemployed to serve in Uganda apparently came off without a hitch. Young people have some frustrations--caused mainly by a very selective educational system--but it is too regimented to contest party leadership. Nor is the party merely an empty shell or a cheerleader for revolutionary slogans. More than anywhere else in Africa, it is a party "in touch" with the country. Its power is widely delegated, whence the popular feeling that it is always possible to seek redress from authority. All these uncommon virtues largely explain the good will that the Tanzanian regime has long enjoyed among foreign countries.

[Text] Well-Used Foreign Aid

Dar-es-Salaam--"Nyererey is everybody's pet," said one diplomat. It is a legitimate observation. Here are the facts: in the 1980-81 fiscal year, Tanzania will receive $625 million from abroad. Some 3/5 of this aid is in the form out outright gifts. This finances 70 percent of the development budget. And this percentage has grown over the years. Some 30 governments and 9 international organizations have been laying these golden eggs. The Scandinavians and the World Bank have contributed 2/3 of it. Sweden alone sends 1/6 of the total foreign aid every year ($100 million). This is an impressive figure, even for a prosperous country. Tanzania is also the preferred partner of Norway. And not all the moneylenders are rolling in gold. Little Yugoslavia also sends its share commensurate with its means and in the name of solidarity between two pioneers of nonalignment. Yes, definitely, President Nyerere has many friends.

Is it any wonder? If Tanzania has become a privileged recipient of development aid, it is because it has been willing to help itself. It has the ideal "profile" of a good aid candidate, a country worthy of being helped, one on which funds would not be wasted. The personality of its president obviously has something to do with it. His moral authority and his unassailable integrity can overcome many a prejudice. For those who draw up aid programs, Tanzania is no "sieve."

That's not all. An American business magazine once expressed surprise that the "Tanzanian failure" was so fascinating to foreign countries. This harsh verdict can be contradicted: the Tanzanian experiment is a coherent political plan in the service of the greatest number, despite its weaknesses and temporary setbacks ("Going back often makes it possible to consolidate achievements," Mr Nyerere says). The leaders of Dar-es-Salaam are also able to identify their own mistakes--more rarely to correct them--and this is a virtue much appreciated by donors.

Opening to the Outside

Without forgetting, of course, that the "ujamaa" is the grand design of a convinced anti-Marxist, it is a kind of wager that community development can be achieved in rural areas without calling on the dogmas of "doctrinaire socialism." Soviet diplomats are not mistaken when they point out with a trace of condescension the "unscientific" nature of this "African" socialism. On the other hand, it seems that European social democrats believe they have found one of their own in Nyerere. This Catholic president, whose remarks are accompanied by moralizing, and who goes to mass every Sunday, is an attractive person.

His pragmatism and a certain spirit of tolerance have made Mr Nyerere follow since the time of independence, a policy of broad "opening" to the outside, one which is also suited to the precepts of non-alignment, which he professed. Dar-es-Salaam has some 50 diplomatic missions, which is an exceptionally high figure for Africa. The regular growth in foreign aid shows that this was a good way to begin. American Peace Corps volunteers were, in 1962, the first cooperatives to serve in Tanzania. They were accused of working for the CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] in 1969 and were expelled, but they were authorized to return last year.

The Preponderant Role of the West

It is often forgotten that at the beginning of the 1960's, Tanzania applied a "strategy for transforming the countryside"--depending mainly on the establishment of "model farms"--inspired by the World Bank. Mr Nyerere then gave up on this approach in favor of the "ujamaa." But the World Bank's interest in Tanzania has never lessened since then, nor has its influence with the leadership. Some principles of the "ujamaa" itself were borrowed from the recommendations of a large firm of American consultants. Nor has the regime ever restricted the activity of missionaries. Some 700 foreign Catholic priests still work in the country, most of them in the villages. While keeping their freedom of speech, they go along with "socialism with a human face" and are sometimes its best propagandists. Mr Nyerere has been clever enough to accept any help he can get. Thus, everybody is on his side.

Neither the 5-year presence of several thousand Chinese, who came to build the Tazara railway, nor the delivery of Soviet military materiel (mainly MiG-21's and missile batteries), nor Mr Nyerere's "holy struggle" for the liberation of southern Africa, which made him an "objective ally" of the anti-imperialist camp, has overshadowed the preponderant role of the West in Tanzania. All the ministers of the present government--except two--were educated there. From the West, Tanzania expects money and technology. It sent an SOS to the West last spring to head off serious grain shortages. Great Britain--by far--ahead of West Germany and Japan leads among its primary trading partners. Some 10,000 Europeans, 1,500 of whom are British, live in Tanzania.

The increase in aid granted by the EEC and the recent conclusion of two finance agreements with France are additional signs of economic "achorage" in the West. In contrast, financial aid from European socialist countries looks pitiful. Tanzania is hurting from inflation in petroleum prices and has few illusions about the virtues of Arab-African cooperation. The rich Moslem states--conservative ones--in the Gulf know little about this country, which they consider more or less "communist."

Some distrust sometimes prevails between Tanzania and its capitalist partners. Dar-es-Salaam suspects the West of pursuing a neocolonialist strategy in Africa. Only the Scandinavians seem to be free of this suspicion. True, they have a strong aid program. Sweden, for example--in the framework of tripartite cooperation--gives scholarships for Tanzanian students to go study in India. In 1978, Stockholm forgave all Tanzanian debts. Several European capitals followed suit.

The long and hard negotiations with the International Monetary Fund well illustrate these stormy relationships. In November 1979, Tanzania brusquely rejected the IMF's conditions for granting $200 million in stand-by credits: reducing the budget deficit by cutting public expenditures, lifting controls on most prices, improving the profitability of national corporations, substantial devaluation of the currency, a rise in bank interest rates, etc. This "take it or leave it" plan was not to Mr Nyerere's liking, and he replied sharply: "Those who think that Tanzania will change its 'ujamaa' policy, which is so important to us, because of present difficulties are wasting their time. We won't change."

And yet. Without again going into detail about the problem--and the polemics (LE MONDE, 15 Jul 80)--it must be said that Tanzania does have solid arguments against the effectiveness and political realism of some of the measures proposed by the IMF experts, but Tanzania does not have the means to forgo financial aid indispensable to redressing its balance of payments. It does no good to inveigh against the "international minister of finance," who intends to dictate his own laws and impose his own models. After this burst of national pride, it must seek a compromise at all costs. There is at least one reason, and it is a big one: several IMF demands implicitly affect the pursuit of some bilateral aid and the World Bank's granting a "structural adjustment loan," which the development of agriculture and transportation depends on.

A Stormy Independence

Tanzanian leaders are still very ticklish about national independence. One example: the minister of finance, Mr Jamal, says he refuses, in these times of austerity, to adopt a "facile policy that would lead to accepting loans from everybody on any condition." There is no question of groveling before an aid consortium that would impinge upon the country's sovereignty--as was the case in Zaire--or that would send international experts to rummage through the files and accounts of public corporations. Well and good, but this nationalist sensitivity--however legitimate it may be--would carry more conviction if foreign aid, which was originally conceived as a temporary crutch, had not gradually become one of the "motors" of the system and indispensable to its survival.

If non-alignment still exists, Tanzania is one of its last adherents. In great international crises, Mr Nyerere insists on keeping his freedom of judgment. This was evidenced again after the coup in Kabul. Tanzania was the only country of the "front line" to vote for the UN resolution demanding the withdrawal of "foreign troops" from Afghanistan (even Botswana preferred to abstain). However, Tanzania had a good reason to hesitate, for it might seem inconsistent for a state holding 10,000 soldiers in Uganda to denounce Soviet military aggression (even though the political contexts are different). The minister of foreign affairs had also prudently proposed abstaining, but the "mwalimu" decided otherwise.

"We reject the Soviet explanations," the minister of foreign affairs, Mr Benjamin Mkapa, now says, though he regrets that Mr Carter went too far in deciding to boycott the Olympic Games. Like many other athletes of the Third World, the Tanzanians were flown free to Moscow by Aeroflot. The whole business makes the politicians smile, for they have no illusions. Nor does Tanzania seem disposed to recognize the Phnom Penh regime, which is pro-Vietnam. These positions carry weight, for they are taken by President Nyerere, who has often been presented as the "conscience of Africa."

Deeply committed to the black nationalists of southern Africa--especially since the OAU liberation committee was set up in Dar-es-Salaam--Tanzania feels it has paid its dues to the anticolonialist cause. It has given its support to SWAPO, the armed action movement in Namibia, but it does not hide its preference for a negotiated solution, whence its support for the UN plan and the initiatives of the "contact group" for a cease-fire followed by internationally supervised elections.

The Uganda Mortgage

Too long a poor relation among the east African colonies, independent Tanzania has always looked southward. It is not certain, however, that Tanzania will be the main beneficiary of the economic regrouping that is taking shape among the countries of the region who wish to escape from the clutch of the South African colossus. Mozambique, an ally with ports and a key position, seems to be in a better position to gather the fruit of Zimbabwe's indpendence. Although the Tazara railway has persistent operating difficulties, Tanzania's southern neighbor might also receive a share of the traffic that presently takes the Tanzania-Zambia railway. Mr Mkapa does not conceal his concern about this.

In the immediate future, however, Tanzania's main worry comes from the north. President Nyerere reasonably hopes to see his old friend, Mr Milton Obote, in the elections theoretically set for 30 September, regain the power he lost in 1971. Will he immediately order his troops withdrawn from Uganda, thus putting an end to an adventure that has seriously cut into his prestige in Africa? Will he resist the old temptation to set up an "anti-Kenyan axis," which would presage new disputes? Tanzania will be a sure loser if it gets mixed up in regional rivalries. Rather, Mr Nyerere takes his strength from those "grand designs" where utopia gradually becomes reality. That is the image of what is happening in Dodoma, the old town lost in the back country in the center of the country, which will be the new capital in 10 to 15 years.

UNDP POTABLE WATER LOAN--Improving and extending the drinking water system of the town of Lome, giving to the company managing the system the means to cope with the costs of exploitation, maintenance and extension of the distribution network: such are the objectives of a project beginning in 1981, thanks to UNDP's assistance (United Nations Program for Development). The project jointly financed by UNDP costing 79,664,000 CFA francs and by the Togolese Government costing 13,310,000 francs was signed yesterday afternoon at the Ministry of Planning by Messrs Koudjolou Dogo, member of the Political Bureau, minister of Planning and Administrative Reform and Zaude Gabre-Madhin, resident representative of UNDP. This project stretching over 16 months will allow among other things to prepare a master plan for the supply of drinking water to Lome with successive phases for the conveyance, treatment and distribution of water before the year 2000 and to map out preliminary and implementative technical studies which could attract the interest of financial institutions. The preparation of this master plan is justified by the rapid expansion of Lome in area and population. [Excerpt] [Lome LA NOUVELLE MARCHE in French 11 Oct 80 p 1] 8696

ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION OF DISSIDENT—A member of the Togolese opposition was a victim of an assassination attempt on 21 October, according to an announcement released yesterday in Paris. Noti de Souza is one of the leaders of the MTD (Togolese Movement for Democracy), an organization that fights against the regime of President Eyadema. Souza emerged unharmed from the attempt but, according to the announcement, his driver was seriously hurt and is hospitalized in the capital of Ivory Coast. Contacted by telephone, Souza's family members confirmed the truth of the attempt on his life. In its announcement, the MTD denounced "this new odious attempt against a Togolese patriot" and called upon international public opinion to stand with the MTD so as to put an end to the government terrorism prevailing in Togo. POLICE 'AXING' ALLEGEDLY UPC INSPIRED

[Excerpt] IN a dramatic turn of events, the Ministry of Internal Affairs has announced the suspension initiated by its Police Department of the exercise to dismiss 3,500 members of the police force, whom it had labelled as "deadwoods".

They alleged that the composition of the Committee that conducted the exercise left much to be desired; according to them it was manned by Junior officers who were mostly drawn from the administration department of the Police force. They said that a sensitive exercise of that kind required experienced staff including specialists in the relevant professional departments of the forces. That is, lawyers, sociologists, doctors, administrators, Senior CID officers etc... These, according to the dismissed staff, would have considered cases on their individual merit. But as it were, they alleged the exercise was done on paper, lacking all the seriousness it deserved.

Members of the public on their part complain that some disbanded police men walked away with firearms posing a security risk. Many others went off with uniforms, official books, and have continued to work unofficially, "on behalf" of the police force.

It is possible that these complaints might have led to the calling of the axing exercise. However, this seemingly second thoughts on the part of the Ministry of Internal Affairs have rendered the whole exercise suspect. The Minister of Internal Affairs Sam Tewungwa, himself declined to make any comment on the issue. He said the matter was before the cabinet.

[words illegible] police force and some members of the general public as "unfair and "politically motivated to favour a certain party".

Despite the criticism, the Public Relations Department of the Police force had disclosed to the members of the press, that the exercise had been properly conducted, and that all the affected people had been duly screened. It denied any element of victimisation or political bias.

According to the Department's PRO. Mr. Masembe, those people who had been dismissed fell under three categories: 1. The "aged" 2. the "sick", including the "handicapped" 3. "inefficients", "drunkards", "illiterates" and redundants".

The aged were allegedly retired with their benefits and pensions. The sick and handicapped, discharged, while the third category were simply dismissed.

COURT: LULE STILL PRESIDENT--Kampala (AFP)--The Kampala court of appeal decreed on Tuesday 21 October, that the deposing of Professor Yusuf Lule, short-lived successor to Marshall Amin as head of state, had been unconstitutional. This decision means that Mr Lule remains the legal president of Uganda. But this judgment will undoubtedly remain a dead letter, given the political changes that have taken place since the departure of Mr Lule more than a year ago. Professor Lule had been removed from power 68 days after taking office, following a decision by the National Advisory Council--the interim Parliament--which had challenged several appointments decided on at that time by the chief of state, who is now living in exile in London. The five court of appeal judges considered that the president had the power to appoint ministers without ratification by the National Advisory Council. This opinion, they stated, was final, and no appeal was possible. Mr Lule had been replaced in June 1979 by Mr Binaisa, who was himself removed from power by the army. CHINESE MEDICAL TEAM, RICE FROM ITALY AGREEMENTS SIGNED

Kinshasa ELIMA in French 7-8 Sep 80 pp 1, 7

[Article: "A New Chinese Medical Team in Zaire"]

[Text] Japan donates vehicles to Executive Council. Three thousand tons of Italian rice expected in the country.

On Saturday, the Executive Council of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Cooperation, and the government of the People's Republic of China signed a protocol agreement whereby China will send Zaire a medical mission of some 30 members in hopes to strengthen the friendship and cooperation in health which exist between the two countries.

The secretary of state for international cooperation, citizen Lengema Dulia Yubasa Makanga, and the ambassador of China to Zaire, Mr Chou Poping, signed the protocol for the Executive Council and for the Chinese Government respectively.

The new members of the Chinese medical mission will work side by side with their Zairian counterparts at Kintambo, Mama Yemo and Gemena hospitals, etc.

Japanese Vehicles

In addition, we learn that a consignment of vehicles valued at a million yen, or $4.5 million, will shortly be provided to the Executive Council by the Japanese Government as part of a contribution to the execution of Zairian projects in the fields of agriculture and transport.

The agreement was signed concerning the supplying of vehicles Saturday in the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Cooperation between the secretary of state for international cooperation, citizen Lengema Dulia Yubasa Makanga, for the Executive Council, and the ambassador of Japan to Zaire, Mr Toshio Oshima, for the government of that country.

At the end of this working session, the two notables praised the excellence of the cooperative relations existing between Zaire and Japan, as well as the will propelling them to develop these relations.

Italian Rice

Lastly, let us point out that the Executive Council will receive from Italy a consignment of 300 tons of rice, a gift from the Italian Government.

The exchange of letters concerning this shipment was concluded Saturday in the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Cooperation by the secretary of state for international cooperation and the ambassador of Italy to Zaire, Mr Paolo Angellini Rota.

According to these letters the revenues obtained from the sale of this rice will be used to cover the costs of transport and distribution, while the counterpart fund will contribute to agricultural development.

RESUMPTION OF ASPHALT PRODUCTION IN MAVUMA STRESSED

Kinshasa ELIMA in French 20 Aug 80 pp 1, 7

[Article by Luzolo Siasia: "Lower Zaire Producer of Asphalt"]

[Text] The Mavuma is estimated at 2 billion tons.

The tour which the president-founder of the People's Revolutionary Movement, president of the republic, citizen Mobuto Sese Seko, has just completed through the country's regions brings out his major concerns.

In this precise framework, it will be recalled that the chief of state's discussions with his interlocutors were centered on socioeconomic concerns. On the economic level, in this instance, the case of an abandoned undertaking in the Lukula zone, in the Bas-Fleuve, deserves particular attention. For an underlying reason, the economic difficulties experienced by our country is the steady increase in the cost of petroleum and its derivatives.

From 1950 to 29 June 1959 the Belgian company "SOBIASCO" was working major deposits of bituminous sands, sandstone and limestone in Mavuma, in the Lukula zone. But since our country's independence, this deposit has remained unexploited. Its assignment to a Zairian during Zairianization has not brought about the resumption of operations. It would therefore be desirable for the Executive Council to draw up practical measures for the resumption of the working of this important deposit.

At this time, when stress is being placed on the improvement of the highway infrastructure in connection with the minimum agricultural program, the contribution of the said deposit can only be beneficial to the nation.

Thus the Presidential Research Service, in the conclusions of its research undertaken on the resumption of operations in the Mavuma bituminous sands, sandstone and limestone deposit, affirms that this will ensure the local production of asphalt in a reserve estimated at 2 billion tons more or less. Because of this, this deposit can replace the importation of asphalt at present amounting to about 20,000 tons per year.

COMMENTARY ON ZAMBIA'S DOMESTIC PROBLEMS

Paris LE MONDE in French 29 Oct 80 p 1

[Article: "The Misfortunes of Zambia"]

[Text] Now that peace, however precarious, has been restored in Zimbabwe, one might have expected a marked relaxation in the atmosphere prevailing in South Africa. This hope was premature. The failure of a recent UN mission in Pretoria has proved, once again, how difficult it is to arrive at a settlement of the Namibian conflict, and it now seems to be Zambia's turn to experience one of its most serious crises since its independenc was was proclaimed exactly 16 years ago.

To explain why a curfew has been imposed every night in the largest towns of the country and the reason for the police round ups which have been going on for the past two weeks, President Kaunda mentioned a "conspiracy" which has been checked in the bud and in which South Africans and "Katangans are said to have been involved. Since the Zambian head of state has hastened to exonerate President Mobutu of Zaire from any responsibility, precising that Kinshasa had not sent Zairians to take part in an armed rebellion in Zambia, South Africa alone had to deny any interference in Zambian affairs. It did so immediately: "I can assure you that we have nothing to do with Mr Kaunda's problems, and he knows it too," the South African minister of Foreign Affairs stated Monday.

Mr Kaunda's argument would have been more convincing had his country, which counts approximately six million inhabitants, not been ruined by several years of poor management and increasingly apparent anarchy. Even in Lusaka, while the people are standing in line to try and obtain staple products, often at prohibitive prices, insecurity has become general and armed robberies are frequent.

Until last year, Zambia could blame its troubles on the impact of the war in Rhodesia and on the sudden fall of copper prices, of which it is a leading world producer, in 1977-1978. However, communications with South Africa were reestablished this year, and copper prices have slightly improved.

On the other hand, the South African Republic, which accuses the United Nations and western powers of "partiality" where Namibia is concerned, would probably have picked the wrong time to stir up a "conspiracy" in Lusaka. In addition, what interest could it have in helping "destabilize" a regime which essentially survives only thanks to subsidies from the West? Finally, if Mr Kaunda has recently sharpened his positions within the pan-African concert, it is primarily to put himself in the clear with respect to his "frontline" allies who suspect him of neglecting his duties of solidarity.

In fact, regardless of the real importance of the "conspiracy" which he is facing, Mr Kaunda wanted to reestablish his authority at a time when it is increasingly disputed. Therefore, he has chosen prevention rather than cure, a proven method on a continent which, in Mr Rene Dumont's words is "strangulated." It remains to be seen whether the Zambian statesman, who has been in power since independence, will take advantage of the situation to restore a measure of efficiency to a demobilized administration and to put an end to the disintegration of a country which occupies a key position in South Africa. Otherwise, the Zambian vacuum could not fail but to give rise to greed and interference, including that from the Soviet Union which has already a strong presence in nearby Angola and which maintains its largest diplomatic representation in the region in Lusaka.

REFLECTIONS ON WEST AFRICAN ISLAM,NEGRITUDE

Paris L'AFRIQUE ET L'ASIE MODERNES in French 3rd Quarter 1980 pp 3-16

[Article by Jean-Paul Charnay--passages between slantlines originally published in boldface]

[Text] Traditionally,African Islam was described as being essentially fraternal and ethnic. And even today the social and human fabric in rural areas is still primarily made up of traditional brotherhoods: Tijaniya, Qadiriya, moderate Hamallists, instilling a soothing popular mysticism in a stabilized peasantry--except for the special case of Mouridism within the Oulof peasantry, which is outside traditional Sunnite orthodoxy--and apparently increasing its financial power, based on [cultivation and commercialization of] ground nuts, through modern-style investments, while supporting proselytizing beyond its original site--even, it is said, among black Americans.

Traditionally, the constant tensions and conflicts between African Muslims resulted from distinctions between ethnic groups (each one wants its own mosque) and between brotherhoods. Various currents are presently unsettling this system of alternating opposition and coexistence between local communities. Two new distinctions, in particular, are appearing together with the growing importance assumed by a certain stratum of medium/large growers, businessmen, and entrepreneurs in the field of truck transport (with fat profits: passage through customs frequently being resolved in a "friendly" private way). Their fundamental doctrines of faith are not easily pinned down, as they have not been rigorously called to account for them, but they assure their social prestige and economic status by financing the construction and maintenance of mosques and medersas either directly, or through religious and cultural unions. Thus we see the Union for Islamic Progress in Senegal, the Muslim Cultural Center of the Ivory Coast, the new Ivorian Islamic Congregation of Abidjan, the Islamic Association of Niger, the Islamic Cultural Association of Cameroon, the Tanzania Muslim Council, the Supreme Council of Muslims (SUPKEM) of Kenya. These voluntary associations (under the old law of 1901 in the Francophone countries), in light of the secular nature of the states, are led by either traditional or entreprenurial businessmen (beyond a certain economic threshold the distinction becomes blurred), religious thinkers who nevertheless are in general open to the West, and European-educated intellectuals: members of the liberal professions or academe. Their structure is sophisticated: executive board, specialized committees (religious affairs, estates, cultural affairs, youth, and education), branches at the local level. They seem to have little rapport, or merely polite relations, with the traditional brotherhoods of popular mysticism:

Tijaniya, or nonextremist Hamalliya (for example Sheikh Ramatullaye in Upper Volta). But by their more modern institutionalization, the composition of their executive bodies, they can be expected to attain a level of intellectual reflection and political activity that should assure them the status of privileged interlocutors with their governments, the Arab countries which are already supporting them, and with the cultural services of other countries.

In any case, here and now, in a still incomplete manner but one which will doubtless tend to become more stabilized, these associations are beginning to benefit from the quasi-banking operations some of their members are practicing, and to provide the financing and the management of their social works, the construction and operation of religious buildings on land which legally belongs to the Association, thus constituting a landed patrimony. But the donation of funds, frequently from member businessmen, or planters, also springs from the traditional Muslim obligation: the /zakat,/ the charitable tithe, in a country where Muslim law is not established, and where the institution of the /habour/ (assignment of a gift, property and revenues, to a religious, charitable, or social venture: holy endowment) may not have previously been operative with respect to the small number of private, stabilized estate fortunes.

Isolated from the other groups, composed of merchants of less economic force, perhaps, but of great tenacity and solidarity, anti-Western, upholders of a puritan or even inflexible Islam, a minority both closed and activist, the Wahhabite faction, which calls itself Sunnite, strongly influenced by certain religious circles in Saudi Arabia, has broken with the other Muslim factions that condemn its intransigence. It tries to preach in locales where it has not been established before, castigating both traditional fraternal actions and the canonical but reformist Islam of the cultural associations. The schism is serious in Ivory Coast. In Upper Volta, at Bobo-Dioulasso, bloody confrontations broke out during the conflict with Mali (1974). Since then the Wahhabites have been creating their own associations and getting them legally recognized by the state in order to have autonomy and protection. The situation is therefore more calm, but psychologically the mutual bitterness remains. One quite symbolic example of comportment that is contrary to the unitarian affirmation of the Muslim community: the Wahhabites refuse to pray in the mosques of the other factions. The quarrel gets more venomous as we move from the field of orthodox conduct to that of orthodox belief.

Finally, there has been observed the appearance, qualitatively significant if not numerically large, of a closed extremism in several villages ruled by a charismatic leader. The phenomenon is certainly not new: one finds it at the origin of a number of warrior empires that evolve from self-absorption to expansionist holy war. The Senegalese film-maker Sembene Ousmane decries this in his film "Ceddo" (1976). It appears in a more limited way, between the two world wars, in the very evolution of the Hamalliya brotherhood, derived from the Tijaniya through Sheikh Hammallah, a pious and enterprising personality whose partisans were sufficiently seditious for the colonial administration to find it appropriate to exile him to France. The conflicts bore externally on several points of ritual: the number of /zikr-s/ (supererogatory invocations to the divinity after the prayer), the number of /raka-s/ (sequences of words and gestures composing the Muslim prayer), the number of beads on the chaplet. On a deeper level, the Hamalliya called for a more puritanical Islam--its Muslim adversaries would call it more intolerant. It seems that presently tensions are decreasing between most Hamallists and the other brotherhoods; without renouncing their respective spiritual and ritual "ways," they nevertheless emphasize the fundamental fact: belonging to Islam. Several extremist Hamallist groups, however, claiming the communal nature of property, could be constituted in closed, inflexible, hierarchical units; their leaders would hold real economic and political power.

However, combined with the Wahhabite faction, the multiplication of such closed circles could entail the tearing apart of the social fabric and confrontations with other factions or with the governmental and administrative authorities. Which in fact happened in autumn 1979 at Dolle (northern Cameroon), while at the same time President Senghor (interview in AFRIQUE-DEFENSE, No 20, November 1979, p 50) was denouncing in Senegal the activity of a "little priest...who wanted to be a Khomeyni."

Thus one could synthesize the stratification of the Muslim factions:

/Literalist Islam:/

--puritanical: Wahhabiya

--intellectual: university-level institutes: Dakar, Zaria, Kano

--reformist: religious and cultural associations

/Popular Mysticism:/

--open: Tijaniya, Qadiriya, moderate Hamallists

--strict [or inflexible]: Mouridism, extremist Hamallists

--closed: villages in the hands of a charismatic leader (with sometimes a renewed emphasis on literalism).

The reinvigoration seems to spring primarily from the diverse strata of the merchant class, moving presently toward a primitive accumulation of capital, intellectually supported by the members of the liberal professions, and by certain portions of the peasantry looking for upward cultural and socioeconomic mobility through urban migration or agricultural improvement.

The most favored sector of this merchant stratum in general supports the activity of the cultural associations which, typically, accept the existing framework of the national state and the nature of the political and economic regime. But a fringe of this stratum, doubtless weaker in commercial terms, adheres to a pure and unrelenting Wahhabism that is, if not hostile, at least quite reserved with respect to the legitimacy of the governments, and which has pan-Islamic potential. These two factions are both active, and modifications in the internal and international position of Sub-Saharan Africa may well partly depend, across years and generations, on the ascendancy of one or the other.

More profoundly, the conversion to Islam poses the problem of the survival of African civilizations. For most of the newly converted, adherence to Islam brings with it rejection of traditional sacrifices, dances, masks, sculptures along with the upholding of the former ethical and esthetic values. One would like to become a Muslim without ceasing to be a Dogon. But what will become of African values when the dances will have become "folkloric" and sculpture given over to individual subjective predilection? A proliferating, anarchic, and poorly assimilated western-style modernization is more depersonalizing and more destructive than Islamization. But the intellectual construct of Mamadou Dia based on holism and the correspondences between the great African belief systems, Islamic and animist, does not answer the question. One of the first great black thinkers of the contemporary era, the Antillan Edward Blyden, underlined early on, at a time when the Arabs were still practicing slavery while the Europeans were replacing it with colonial penetration, that Western values and Christianity are not as close as Islam to African mind-sets and structures ("Christianity, Islam, and the Negro Race," 1887). Brought up in Christianity, Blyden reproaches it for having become "Aryan," studies Arabic, and without becoming a Muslim, asserts that Africa's conversion to Islam would [enable it to] maintain its purity and preserve it against racial prejudice, and against all white adulteration. Standing midway between the black liberators (Toussaint Louverture, Christophe) and the first restorationist intellectuals (Du Bois, Price-Mars), he preaches the improvement of Africa black civilization: pan-Africanism, negritude, and preservation of familial structures. Even today, in the majority of cases, at the micro-sociological level, a mutual tolerance is observed between members of a family belonging to different religions--not always, however, without certain emotional and psychological repercussions.

But if these themes were powerful instruments in gaining independence and in the decade that followed, are they not [presently] undergoing a certain ideological devaluation? The spell-binding arabesques described by Senghor: the return to negritude, the birth of an Afro-Latin culture, consciousness of a "Sudano-Guinean" civilization (from Mauritania all the way to Cameroon: which precisely encompasses the 17 member states of ECOWAS [Economic Community of West African States]), the complementarity of the Arab-Berber relationship to the blacks, marvelous [to hear] at international conferences, are less and less enticing to intellectuals in comparison with either a more or less Marxist-trending progressivism, or progressive Islam. As for the masses...As to a return to authenticity split between [various] "imported" religions, Islam and Christianity, Tombalbaye paid for it with his life without being able to forestall Chad's explosion.

Moreover, neither puritan nor reformist Islam can any longer accept the preceding proposals for a relationship, on an equal footing, between animism, Islam, and Christianity, as preached, for example, from a pan-Africanist viewpoint by Nkrumah in his "Conscientisme" or by Sheikh Anta Diop who describes Islam as "ideological super-structure" and ticks off in a critical way both its positive and negative aspects: accusing it, in particular, of turning back history and suppressing African traditions, and of inciting Afro-Muslims, but its own inner logic, to dream of an Arabic demographic and cultural ascendancy: a phenomenon well-known in Islam from the time of the rejection of the /jahiliya:/ the pagan pre-Hegira epoch.

The African civilizations have elaborated a spiritual magnification of the physical body not simply as the ground of the self, but also as an object in itself, mediating between the group and the cosmos. Coupled with beauty of motion, the language of bodily gesture fulfills both the need for play and artistic aspirations, as well as calming metaphysical anxieties. Nudity, its concealment by esthetic or sacred ornamentation (masks) that entail the symbolic depersonalization of the individual and the incarnation within him of other beings or forces, its variations through musical rhythms are displayed as a complete "language of gesture" in a brief interval of time.

But this mediation required spectacular psychological and psycho-motor mechanisms: violent dances, trance states, invocations and possessions. Now generational conflict, and the impact of the outside world, are such that the elders dare less and less to involve themselves in such outer and inner activities contrary to Muslim decency. So there appears a transitional social system in which the Other is not only the outsider, but one's brother, one's own image before which one no longer dares to "give in." And the sense of corporal and metaphysical dignity changes. Through the old dances, the language of the liberated body expressed the cohesion of the group and integrated the individual and the community with nature. Whereas in the big cities the oft-fascinating appearance of new styles of music utilizing and destroying, through jazz and pop idioms, the ancient rhythms (assiko music, makossa rhythm in the "jukeboxes" of Yaounde and Douala, "juju music" in Lagos) offers for urban people the personal freedom of modern dances. By contrast, the collective and disciplined performance of the prayers expresses a warm social solidarity naturally, but also the unequal relationship existing between the worshipper and the unique divinity, external and higher.

The language of gesture embraces not only the dance, but also sculpture, a fundamental element of African identity. Recent expert studies show this: neither philosophically, nor sociologically, nor artistically are they dissociable. Sculpture is a gestural language of longer duration but of similar aims: intergroup social communication with the living and the dead, evocation and utilization of the natural forces scattered in beings and things. Will masks and statues fall victim to the traditional condemnation of representation of a living being? Prostrating themselves in worship before inventories laden with sculptures, which slip from fervent conviction to decorative intentions and mercantile motives thanks to the local bourgeois and the transient foreigner, are the Dakar retailers on the sidewalk of the very commercial Georges-Pompidou Avenue, and the sculptors of Foumban, in Bamoun country. At Foumban, a little room has even been fixed up so that this manifestation [the Muslim prayer] does not annoy the tourist customer.

Without here going into the contradictory theological arguments, it is remarkable to note that westernized Muslim intellectuals insist on the preservation of traditional art, on condition that for the faithful a sculpture be [considered] nothing but a work of art, not a numinous object. An insistence that evades two contradictory questions: won't the masses, by atavism, by superstition, and by fear of magic, attribute supernatural meanings to such objects or actions, in accordance with the locale and the ethnic group, by virtue of the well-known sycretism of African Islam? But conversely, what will remain of a sacred art, and thus of the culture that produced it, when the collective and individual faith that justified it and nourished it has disappeared? What becomes of a fetish when no one believes in it any more? A source of profit, a museum piece. One does not pass with impunity from a cosmogony to an esthetic, to an amusement--to an article of commerce.

Mosques and Koranic teachers are still, even in the age of mass-media, the special vectors of the diffusion of Islam. Traditional particularisms (distinctions between ethnic groups, particular languages, rivalries between villages, neighborhoods, trades) are already resulting in the increasing construction of mosques by separate groups, an ambivalent expression of Islam's expansion and of the rivalries characteristic of a traditional society. Economic weakness is not slowing down the scattering of effort. How many concrete and bondstone shells remain unbuilt because of the reconstruction of the great mosque of Ouagadougou financed by the president of the Muslim Community of Upper Volta, a transport entrepreneur with one of the country's rare truly large fortunes? Built of modern materials in a desire to prove the efficiency of their spiritual and financial promoters, they seem quite cold and uninspired compared to the marvelous "banko" mosques of Sudanese architecture. The soaring of faith, struggles of prestige and neighborhood particularisms are exhausting the meager reserves of a small collectivity and standing in the way of individual savings, but do contribute to the primitive accumulation of some capital to the profit of a stratum of entrepreneurs and tradesmen--who, though widely practicing alms-giving in the framework of cultural associations, and thus redistributing what they have made, still stand to profit from the extension of Islamization. On the other hand, the building of mosques and the opening of schools are expanding the need for officiating clergy and teachers. From which results the collections, the /fund raising meetings/ (Kenya...) and especially the natural reflex: turning to the Arab countries that have funds and Koranic universities.

Now any Islamization presumes Arabization: what will be the political consequences? In the medium term, three institutions could have powerful effects: cultural centers, Islamic scholarships, and Franco-Arab schools. The establishment of Arab cultural centers continues: Libyan cultural centers in Mauritania, Mali, Niger, Upper Volta (in addition to those of Algeria, Turkey, and Malta); an Egyptian cultural center in Nouakchott; the African Islamic Center in Khartoum, in affiliation with several cultural associations--beyond the efforts of the Supreme Council of Islamic Affairs of Cairo, and the Pakistani Ahmadiyya mission, especially in the English-speaking countries (Sierra Leone, Nigeria, Ghana), but which are also trying to install themselves in Francophone countries (Adjameh, near Abidjan). The Libyan centers are apparently going to redouble their efforts at Arabization through practical courses (secretarial work, typing, home economics) which would call for wider affluence.

By contrast, West Africa lacks (at least in Francophone Africa, except for the Nigerian universities, notably Ahmadou Bello University in Zaria, and Abdullahi Bayero University at Kano) a great center of higher Islamic studies. Certainly there is an Islamic Institute in Dakar whose mosque and architecture point to Moroccan financing. It has launched a bulletin, but it is presently providing more a basic Muslim education than performing true research. And sociologically, with respect to prayer, the residents of Dakar prefer the habitual places of worship situated in their neighborhoods.

Financed by the oil countries, the plans for a vast university of Islamic studies to be located at Say (a small historic village situated 50 km south of Niamey) are currently under study but, in February 1979 work had not entered an active phase. Libya is also supposed to be installing an Institute of Islamic Studies in Timbuktoo. Moved, on the other hand, by its great economic force and its spiritual discipline, the Mouridist Brotherhood is finishing at Touba a Center of Religious Studies and has already set up a huge library with Arabic Koranic commentaries of traditional mold. But Koranic higher education is presently being diffused through the system of "Islamic scholarships."

These scholarships are given to students going to pursue studies in theology and Muslim law in the universities of Mecca and Medina--the holy cities whose prestige seems to be growing along with that of the most illustrious and ancient of Muslim universities, El Azhar, in Cairo, which is suffering perhaps from Egypt's Israeli policy; and also in Libya, in Kuwait, in Algeria, and in the Sudan. Problems in adaptation have arisen. The Arabized graduates in religious and juridical sciences, disadvantaged in the job market by comparison with Francophone and English-speaking students, are thrown back into teaching in the medersas which, free, are financed by the community itself or receive subsidies from the Arab countries. Sometimes their salaries are directly assumed by these countries.

But these young men, imbued with literalist Islamic purity acquired at Mecca and Medina...are often shocked by the traditional thought and lifestyle of the old imams officiating at the mosques. From which comes their desire to replace them. The diversity of training, the heterogeneity of outlooks leads to sharp conflicts of interest and generations. In Freetown, in a popular quarter, a veritable war of the imams exploded, with the old and the new contending for the mosque, which was devastated in the course of a riot by the two camps of the faithful, the first holding its ground thanks to the old networks of influence; the second taking most of the young men, creating an association, and buying land to build another mosque. But when will this end? Even putting aside such an explosion, the cultural associations are aware that such conflicts lie dormant, and fearing religious activism, argue from the youthfulness of these puritan and literalist graduates in Islam that they should not be given the responsibilities of imams, which should be reserved to serious persons, studying or telling their beads at home, going out only to give the /khutba/ (sermon) and lead the great Friday prayer.

The World Association of Young Muslims, in its congress at Lagos (December 1978) concerned itself with the problem of placement for students in religious sciences and asked UNESCO to approach the various governments to obtain equivalence for their diplomas with national or western diplomas. But political and university circles, even Muslim, are hesitant, out of both practical considerations and out of apprehension of a religious zeal whose strength is presently shown by Wahhabism--or Iran. The problem is serious in a number of countries, at the various levels of teaching. At the university level, it seems that there is not much inclination to expand Islamic studies. In Dakar, Arabizing orientalism is returning to its traditional erudition. At the University of Abidjan, the plan to establish Arabic language instruction should assure it neutrality with respect to any religious influence. At the University of Dar Es Salaam, the opening of a department of religious studies as promoted by the Tanzania Muslim Council, is delayed--for lack of sites? And in Nigeria, the Christians in the south denounce the flourishing of the illustrious Muslim university in Zaria, Ahmadu Bello University. But the malaise is also obvious in the secondary and primary levels. Still in Nigeria, the UPN [United Party of Nigeria], whose principal leaders, originating from the western part of the country, are not Muslims, declares that it wants to harmonize, without mingling together, in a system of "free education," Koranic instruction for which several hours would be reserved, and modern instruction, in the western-style schools. In Senegal, the National Movement of Socialist Party Women is concerned about the fate of education for the /talibes,/ pupils, often of small means, in the Koranic schools. In Mauritania, the "African-Negro" pupils, French-speaking, fear an extension of Koranic instruction, in Arabic, at the secondary level.

In reality, the dialectic began as early as the colonial era. Proud of their Koranic schools, the Muslim communities had generally been more hostile than the non-Muslim communities to the modern schools opened by the colonizers. Practicing a sort of general education, in osmosis with the collectivity, these non-Muslims were less resistant to a system of specialized education. Which often gained them more rapid social and administrative promotion in the colonial structures, but also after independence. This under-education led to an awakening and to conflicts, not only among African Muslims but also among Indian Muslims. And the reaction involves the acceptance and establishment of a certain bilingualism, at least by the associations that are both militant and reformist--either Franco-Arab or Anglo-Arab bilingualism. Also, to overcome cultural opposition, and to give their children better professional opportunities, the Muslim associations themselves are establishing bilingualism. They are to some degree "westernizing" the students trained in the Muslim-Arab mode: either by the study of English or French in bilingual bodies in Arabia itself; or by a stay, following one's studies, in a western university with a view not to equivalence but to reconversion of the diploma; or by students in various disciplines going to the still largely French-speaking universities of Algeria; or by calling for bilingual teachers (Tunisians in Djibouti...). Several of them have for several years had "French-Arabic" schools, at both primary and secondary level, that are Muslim, private, and teach in Arabic but with some subjects in French.

Thus we see the strange and overlapping cultural and financial triangles.... Coming from the West, the petro-dollars provide the producing countries such bulging coffers that their socio-political and economic structures cannot immediately absorb all the wealth, which they turn to profit through investments and short-term loans in the West, which they transfer in part through aid to Africa (but a large proportion of this aid goes back to the West through purchase of technology, consumer goods, and arms), and another part of which, finally, they devote to give impetus to Islamic religious zeal, and thus to Arabization. But by virtue of the weight of history, of politics, and of professional needs, Arabization is backed up by study, or even reconversion, in a Western language: French or English.

From which comes the paradox: the West is financing Islamization through the intermediation of the producer countries, and is therefore working toward its own eclipse; but at the same time, Arabization doubles back and becomes a re-Westernization...which complicates the basic controversies over adhesion to an African root-language as the major, if not official, language of communication in a given country: Oulof for Senegal, Djouba (Malinke) for Ivory Coast, Bambra for Mali...and all the ethnic, cultural, and political destabilizations--both internal and international--which could be inferred from it.... For the moment, the situation well mirrors the objective alliances formed, from the political point of view, between the liberal Western regimes and the monarchical oil regimes, against revolution and destabilization of the world economic system; and between the Christian and Muslim religions against materialism.

Most African Muslim leaders, often products of rather westernized reformist environments (intellectuals integrated into the administration, military types, some members of the liberal profession), supported by the businessmen of the cultural associations and the mass of the peasantry that is still bound up in traditional-style brotherhoods that have never attempted a systematic Arabization, have a need for the "rocket-technology" of the West in order to avoid their own destabilization.

For their armed forces, because of suspiciousness, want of appetite, or insufficient technical training, have no desire or ability to assimilate modern weapons systems and the broad strategies entailed by them. Now the West--France--represents a defensive power from a military standpoint, still (but for how long) strategically credible, culturally and economically acceptable to some social classes. And for the moment these African leaders in the northern part of West Africa feel a certain reticence with respect to any Arab "expansionism." Col. Qadhdhafi's policy (he is perceived as a political, not a religious, leader, despite his financial assistance to education, mosque-building, cultural centers...) is engendering the rejection of too great an Arab political ascendancy, even if it were to express itself [only] by religious means. Depending on the circumstances, it has alternately been leaders of Muslim or Christian origin who have in Chad demanded the continuation (always temporarily, and of course condemned by all in principle) or the immediate departure (resolved by the Kano conference) of the French forces. And Mauritania, which is entirely Muslim, shows the same alternation in trying to withdraw from the Saharan conflict. Logically, when all is said and done, in order to resist any unwarranted progressive pressure, the Muslim leaders rely on the Arab countries where Islam is resistant, stabilized, and where policy and economics are turned toward the West.

From which comes this idea of the Euro-Afro-Arab trialog, in the political, economic and cultural spheres, which, according to one's ideological option, appears as observers' rights for the developed countries and compensation for the flight of their capital as determined by oil price increases; or subjection of raw materials and peoples on the periphery to the technology and peoples at the center who fear nothing so much as a lowering of their standard of living; or the creation of a vast geo-political and geo-economic totality based on an accord between the masters of technology and the masters of oil, in order to assure them jointly of this potential market and this vast arc oppressed with such poverty but laden with such wealth: central Africa; or an alliance of reformist or conservative governments against destabliziation; or as the reciprocal protection of liberal pluralistic democracy of human and entrepreneurial rights, and of the new Arab capitalism and the Islamic ethos. In recent months Senghor has often cited Lenin: "whoever holds Africa holds Europe." And whoever holds Europe and Africa would dominate the Middle East....

U.S. 'HEGEMONIC TENDENCIES' SAID TO ENDANGER AFRICAN SOVEREIGNTY

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 20 Oct 80 p 4

[Editorial reprinted from JORNAL DE ANGOLA, date not given]

[Text] When Jimmy Carter began his presidential campaign in Atlanta, the main newspaper of this American city, THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION, stated: "Since Vietnam, the United States has been paralyzed when it needed to take direct action outside its territory."

This opinion, shared specially by the "hawks" in the White House, undoubtedly reflects the current intentions of American leaders whose hegemonic tendencies increasingly threaten the sovereignty of all peoples of the world, especially Africa, the current fertile field for its maneuvers.

In a way, it is important to link the recent statements by the American government on Africa with the polarization of political forces in the United States. The worsening American capitalist crisis is seeking solutions, aided by all the newspapers and the television which are completely controlled by multinational firms and largely run by Jews living in the United States. It is no accident the U.S. newspapers, television and radio openly criticize Carter and his administration for apparent apathy. Such strategy is part of the plan which American "hawks" have been carrying out for a long time.

In getting access to Somali bases, the United States moved a step closer to the militarization of the Indian Ocean, which, according to a UN resolution, should be transformed into a zone of peace.

The Somali bases of Barbera and Mogadiscio will primarily serve, as we all know, as a supply station for American rapid intervention forces, to facilitate U.S. interference in African and Middle East affairs, mainly against national liberation movements and Iran. In addition, the U.S.-Somali military agreement to rearm the Somali army also is a threat to peace in East Africa and the Horn of Africa, since the expansionist ambitions of Mogadiscio are well known; the latter is ignoring the principle of the OAU Charter on the retention of colonial borders at present Washington's aggressive policy, carried out in Africa again through this agreement with Somalia, is basically contrary to the wish of independent Africa to regulate differences on the continent peacefully, stressed Ethiopian Head of State Mengistu Haile Marian on the sixth anniversary of the fall of the feudal government in Ethiopie.

The signing of the U.S.-Somali agreement during the OAU summit in Freetown is an unpardonable provocation to the African peoples who, in that high-level continental forum, stressed unequivocally that the Ogaden region is an integral part of Ethiopia and urged Somalia to withdraw its current territorial claims which not only harm the interests of neighboring countries but are not in keeping with OAU principles. By this new attitude, Washington again displayed its arrogance toward the OAU and all Africa.

World progressive opinion must condemn the U.S.-Somali agreement which truly endangers security in the Red Sea and Persian Gulf region and should support Ethiopia's position for a peaceful solution through normalization of its relations with Somalia.

By taking this position, world progressive opinion will not only help Africa defend its sovereignty which is now threatened, but also moderate international tension heightened by the imperialists.

SITUATION OF CHADIAN REFUGEES IN CAMEROON EXPLORED

Yaounde CAMEROON TRIBUNE in French 3,4,5 Sep 80

[Article and interview by Ebwele Ebongue]

[3 Sep 80, p 3]

[Text] Tuesday, 26 August 1980. It is 900 hours. The sun's rays beat down on Kousseri. Aboard a Red Cross Land Cruiser, we have just reached the Chadian refugee camp, on the bank of the Logone River. Camp? It is rather a large "village" whose principal characteristic strikes one at once: here there are no houses, only big tents. These serve as dwelling places, dispensaries an even hospital wards for the babies. It is in this camp that LSCR (League of Red Cross Societies) personnel are at work.

It is over 30°C. The flies buzz and alight everywhere. Men, women and children mill around inside and outside the tents. Endlessly. For how long? We do not know. One would say that the conception of time does not exist here.

Distressed eyes are fixed on N'Djamena on the other side of the river. On that side rifle shots still ring out. What do the men and women seated on the sand say to one another? We do not know. When they deign to answer a visitor the refugees utter only this sentence, this leitmotiv: "Let peace return!"

Peace! What a profound meaning this word seems to have here! While some of them walk with one another, others wait in line to be examined by doctors. Very often, the crying of babies escapes from the tents, inside of which mothers, veritable human wrecks, and their scrawny babies are stretched out on mats or rope beds [lits-picots]. In these places, it is not the seed of love but the seed of hatred, hatred of war which exists.

Accessory Sicknesses

How many undernourished babies are being treated by the renutrition service? A great many. But in addition to their malnutrition, these babies have other sicknesses," "accessory sickness ," as it was put to us by Dr Gosselin. The names of these accessory sicknesses are diarrhea, vomiting, bronchitis, kwashiorkor, etc.

In the refugee camp, no one talks about the future. That is practically a taboo subject. Only the past and the present count. But that past and this present seem so close to one another! What else is there for these refugees but the past, if it is not the reality of the last 5 months? This reality which is made up only of suffering endured and atrocities experienced during the flight toward Kousseri.

Indelible Scars

One tearful mother tells how, while fording the Chari with her baby strapped to her back, the latter died without her knowing it! Another mother relates her tale of woe: "When the war broke out, I crossed the river in a panic with my three children. But when I reached Kousseri, I observed with stupefaction that one of the children was not mine and that I had, therefore, abandoned one of my children to be the victim of the bullets." A third woman, amidst her sobs, brings up the death of her daughter in the middle of the Chari crossing; she was hit and killed instantly with a bullet in the heart.

And the students? They are flooded with questions. Is their university life finished? What will they do now? Where will they go? And those who had money in the bank? They are as impoverished as the poor.

While in the tents, Swiss, Canadians, Cameroonians, Dutch, British, French, etc. help one another to achieve their common goal: "to save human lives, to alleviate physical suffering," one question persists: who will assume the responsibility for effacing from the minds of the refugees the ghastly memories which are so many indelible marks?

And who can say with certainty, even here, that no more suffering and atrocities are still to come? For when young combatants, who have suddenly become persons with one arm or one leg, declare with a livid look on their faces that they do not know why they are fighting, there is cause for concern. At present and in the future.

[4 Sep 80, p 4]

[Text] Kousseri. Barely 6 months ago this name brought nothing in particular to the minds of Cameroonians, and even less to the minds of foreigners. It took one spark for the former Fort-Foureau to emerge from obscurity. A caprice of men? Convulsiveness of the times? All of these at one and the same time. Since 20 March 1980, the administrative center of the department of Logone-et-Chari entered the history books because of (or thanks to?) one of the greatest scandals that the imagination of man has invented: war!

Located 150 meters from N'Djamena, the Chadian capital, from which it is only separated by the Logone, Kousseri is in fact the principal witness of the bloody events which having been tearing this city apart for long months.

Not a passive witness, as Kousseri has become the land of welcome, the refuge of Chadians fleeing from death.

The Stampede

To flee from death, horror and atrocities! How many persons from N'Djamena have done so since 20 March? Two thousand? Two hundred thirty thousand? We cannot give an exact figure as the crossing of the Logone continues. And all of a sudden the tiny village of Kousseri (10,000 inhabitants) is filled to overflowing.

The problems inherent in this kind of situation obviously require no comment. The explosion in food prices, banditry and, sicknesses were the first consequences of this exodus. What to do? Act. But how? Here, the notions of hospitality and the sense of humanity have been subjected to a rough test. How is this human tide, which has only one objective: to flee from death, to be contained?

Even had there been no bonds of friendship, solidarity and fraternity uniting Chad and Cameroon, respect for human life and quite simply pity would have commanded the Cameroonians to open their doors to the fugitives. This they did, I might add, spontaneously. But we must recognize the fact that in this sector as in many others, goodwill alone is ineffective.

Simultaneously aware of the seriousness of the situation in Chad and its modest means, the Cameroonian Government, therefore, established on national territory a national committee to help the Chadian refugees and provincial and departmental committees of the same kind. It then issued a stirring appeal to the international community for aid for these refugees.

Some countries are responding positively to this appeal. Some international organizations also. These are the HCR (the High Commissariat for Refugees), the OXFAM (British Humanitarian Organization), the LSCR (League of Red Cross Societies). Aid from these countries and organizations is both material and medical. On the material side, the aid takes the form of shipments to Kousseri of sorghum, wheat, cornmeal, milk, cooking oil, canned goods, meat, etc. Medical aid is characterized by the dispatch of medicines, nurses and drugs.

Particularity

Of course, all of the humanitarian organizations in Kousseri have responded to Cameroon's appeal. However, the presence of the League of Red Cross Societies' team in the Logone-et-Chari has this particularity: it is responding to a double imperative: to support the action of the Cameroonian Red Cross, which has 200 volunteer first-aid workers here, and to also support the totality of the humanitarian effort undertaken to help the Chadian refugees. In other words, the LCSR has answered a double appeal: that of the Cameroonian Government and that of the Cameroonian National Red Cross.

In the field, the LSCR has a contingent made up of one administrator and two mobile medical teams. If we are to believe Klaus Buttikoffer, administrator of the league's contingent, the two mobile medical teams are made up of personnel furnished by the Canadian and Swiss Red Cross organizations.

These teams, which work in tents, handle general consultations, general treatment and renutrition. For Canadian Dr Andre Gosselin, a pediatrician, as for his Swiss counterpart, Dr Jeanmaire, the principal difficulty relates to the work cadre: "It is very difficult to work in the tents," they say, "for it is very warm in them, as the tents are not adapted to Sahelian climatic conditions."

In 28 days of consultations, Dr Jeanmaire has logged in 3,289 patients; i.e., an average of nearly 150 patients per day, while Dr Gosselin sees 160 children (6 months to 5 years of age) daily.

Sustained Effort Action

Although they perform their duties in tents where the temperature is 50° C, the medical teams are working without letup. Here, they consult and prescribe drugs; over there, nurses are feeding baby cereal to the infants. Further along, Chadian volunteers are taking care of wounds or serving as interpreters.

Neither the flies which buzz, nor the hot sand, nor the heat seems to affect the enthusiasm of the league contingent. Here, everyone is "on a first name basis." But in the tents which serve as dispensaries, living quarters and hospital room, a visitor can barely refrain from showing his discomfort, revulsion and horror.

Of course, many things have changed since 20 March... Today the refugees no longer sleep in the trees. They are scattered throughout the city, in 13 sectors. However, none of them sleeps in the street any longer, beside public buildings or on the branches of trees. That is to say, borrowing the expression of the fugitives themselves, the housing conditions have favorably improved. Did not Dr Gosserin [name as published] who spent some time in Thailand recently confide to us that the conditions of the Chadian refugees were clearly better than that of the Cambodian refugees?

That notwithstanding, a refugee is still a refugee, with all that involves in suffering, privations, worries. That is the reason why the sacrifice of each of us, of each of the countries of the world, of each of the international organizations will not be in vain, nor too much.

Much has been done in Kousseri. That is undeniable. However, much also remains to be done: electrification of the camp, the drilling of wells, the acquisition of more acceptable dwellings, blankets, medicines, food, etc. So that the Chadian refugee may feel more at ease, it is an urgent matter for all of mankind today to make a sustained effort.

[Interview with the perfectural first deputy, Mohmoudon Mouusa by Ebwele Ebongue]

[Text] A traveler returning from Kousseri is most often sought out by a crowd of curious persons. The questions come from all sides: How are the refugees? Where do they sleep? What do they eat? etc. When we arrived in Logone-et-Chari, these questions went right to our hearts. And to satisfy our curiosity, we had a meeting with the prefect. Unfortunately, he was detained and was unable to keep our appointment. It was finally the prefectural first deputy, Mahmoudou Mouusa, who received us. And it was in his office that we learned of his recent appointment to the position of coordinator of aid to Chadian refugees in Kousseri concurrently with his duties as prefectural first deputy of Logone-et-Chari.

CT [CAMEROON TRIBUNE]: Mr Prefect, describe for us a bit of the genesis of the arrival of Chadian refugees in Kousseri?

MM [Mahmoudou Moussa]: When things broke loose in N'Djamena, thousands of Chadians forded the river. We decided to allow those fleeing from death to enter our country. Therefore, the response was spontaneous.

The first wave of refugees was welcomed by the people of Kousseri. As for the second wave, there was no room for them in the houses; therefore, the refugees had to install themselves in the trees.

A series of problems was then posed: the problem of food for the refugees and the people who had welcomed them; the problem of resupply: the Cameroonian Government had to send assistance (rice, sugar, millet, corn, cooking oil, fish, meat, etc.). Some organizations also turned up; however, it was the Cameroonian Government which first had to meet the needs of 230,000 refugees.

The problem of sanitation was posed immediately: an epidemic of measles decimated the children; consequently, we had to prevent other epidemics such as cholera, by digging latrines and vaccinating the populations. The vaccines, moreover, reached us a few months afterward.

After food and sanitary aid, we had to think about housing. We then set up refugee camps, while still leaving most of the refugees in the city. The problem of the camps is still with us. Other organizations have helped us along these lines, as well as have foreign nationals and countries.

The LSCR participated in the form of medical treatment. Its medical team was the second to be installed, after that of the OXFAM which came here within the framework of the HCR program.

CT: The problem of security is surely posed by the influx of these refugees...

MM: The city of Kousseri became bloated in a few days, increasing from 10,000 to 240,000 inhabitants. All the refugees located here apparently without bad intentions. Their concern was sleeping, resting, eating, and taking care of themselves. But the administration had to take certain measures to prevent possible criminal acts. We called upon two sections of the police and one company of the army; the forces of the commissariat for public security was strengthened.

CT: Were the refugees disarmed?

MM: It is true that some refugees may enter our country with weapons. That caused us to install control posts at the border. We are also planning to organize a shakedown inside the city.

CT: How is the distribution of aid organized?

MM: We have divided the refugees into 13 sectors. At the head of each sector there is an official who works with three persons. All aid is centralized in the hands of the departmental committee for aid to refugees. The committee then divides the aid among the different sectors.

Distribution is made every 10 days, theoretically; this principally involves the distribution of cereals. In between times, we distribute cooking oil, canned goods, sugar, blankets, tents, etc.

CT: Mr Prefect, some refugees say that they are not receiving this aid.

MM: That is the usual complaint. Some try to be clever. We wanted all refugees without exception to move into the camp, no matter what social category they belong to. But there are some who are reticent about doing so. We have suspended distributions to those who refuse to move into the camp. All those in the camp have cards and mandatorily receive something.

CT: Why do some refugees refuse to remain in camp?

MM: Some former dignitaries prefer to remain in the city rather than go to the camp. It is a psychological phenomenon which exists everywhere...

CT: Recently, a humanitarian organization named "Terre des Hommes" [Land of Men]. What were the reasons for it?

MM: When the "Terre des Hommes" team arrived here, we helped it to get settled just as we did the LSCR and OXFAM. This team wanted to concern itself principally with children. We placed resources at their disposal.

One evening, the police brought us one of the members of this team who was surprised at the river bank with a package of medicines. The man himself admitted that he was going to deliver that package to one of the factions in the Chadian conflict. That was not his first attempt, I might add. He had already traveled to N'Djamena twice where he had come under fire, while in Switzerland his superiors said that he was in Kousseri under the protection of the Cameroonian authorities.

Feeling that none of the organizations stationed here should serve as a conduit but should work exclusively in Kousseri, we expelled the "Terre des Hommes" team.

CT: It will soon be time for the return to classes. Has there been any thought about school-age refugees?

MM: When they arrived here, the refugees themselves thought that they would remain here only a few days. Now, we have to admit that the situation is long-lasting; the problem of schooling has, therefore, surfaced. A census has just been taken, and we will soon know the number of school-age children, in the primary, secondary and higher levels.

CT: One word on the behavior of the refugees.

MM: Their dispersement and living conditions make them aggressive, difficult. During distribution of food, it often happens that the chief of sector is attacked by one of them. Some elements of our forces of order are attacked from time to time.

CT: What is the situation of the refugees today compared to what it was 5 months ago?

MM: It is decidedly better in all sectors. In the housing sector, the refugees have tents. As for nutrition, the distribution of food is regular. As regards health, the LSCR and OXFAM teams and the French medical cooperation mission are working without letup.

There is really no comparison to make compared to the beginning. Those of the refugees who left for Nigeria have returned. We are awaiting the team of "doctors without borders" (France) and that of the "Catholic Relief Service."

CT: What are the on-site needs?

MM: Our needs remain immense, even if many aides have been signed up. We are beginning to fear a breakdown in our supplies. We must have other donors, as we have food and medicine needs. Since the situation threatens to endure, we should provide much more solid shelter than tents which are not adapted to the climate in the Sahelian region.

CT: Have you a wish to make?

MM: That everything be finished as soon as possible so that the refugees can go back to their native land.

COMMENTS ON REAGAN'S 'REALISTIC' AFRICAN POLICY

Accra DAILY GRAPHIC in English 11 Nov 80 p 3

[Article by Kojo Yankah]

[Excerpts]

IF pre-campaign rhetoric and declarations are anything to go by, President-elect Ronald Reagan may drop a bomb in Africa faster than anybody thinks. Here is an avowed anti-Communist, a liberal-democrat turned Republican, and a fantastic communicator who describes Carter's foreign policy as one of "vacillation, appeasement and aimlessness", Carter's veiled support for South Africa is now to give way to a "realistic" approach to issues.

To say that Reagan is an enemy of Africa is an overstatement. He will certainly find ready allies in Africa, for most parts of the continent have been improverished, divided and humiliated as a result of western manoeuvres and hidden support for dictators and unpopular leaders. Hands are open to receive aid (and MASSIVE AID) and some countries are all too willing to creat STABILITY by all means, even if it means using terrorist and other underhand means to aliminate "problem Children."

But it cannot be rosy all the way. Reagan is going to push the pendulum too far on the scales he wants — either East or West. Angola, Mozambique and Zimbabwe cannot trade their newly-won liberation; yet here goes the President-elect on Angola in the Wall Street Journal: "I would provide UNITA with weapon. It doesn't take American manpower. Savimbi, the leader, controls more than half of Angola — I don't see anything wrong with someone who wants to free themselves from the rule of an outside power which is Cubans and East Germans. I don't see why we shouldn't provide them with weapons to do it".

This is our new friend in Africa. His foreign policy points at a conflagration on the continent, yet when he was asked to comment on Somalia, on the Horn of Africa, he could only recoil:

"Well, you are running the risk of a possible escalation into a conflict that can grow into World War III. I want it understood that our prime objective must be peace and we're the only country that can do it."

Reagan believes there can only be war when the forces of FREEDOM are weak; and that is why he is going to escalate U.S. arms build-up to match the Soviet Union.

One can see a "real" definition of "freedom", "peace" and "Security" during the reign of the Republican president. For even when the United Nations and the Organisation of African Unity have endorsed the fight for self-determination by the Polisario Front in Western Sahara, a voice in Reagan's hat is adamant: "The issue in the Western Sahara conflict is not self-determination, but the rivalry between two states, Morocco and Algiers ... It would be obvious to me that the national interest of the United States is best served not only in North Africa, but globally, by helping our proven friend Morocco, not our constant adversary Algeria."

The problem with most "REALISTS" in international politics is that they end up conceding: "We did not know enough of the people". The unity of Africa stands threatened; the non-aligned movement is facing a test, and the world is watching who drops the bomb first. Maybe Ronald Reagan, the realist came too soon. Maybe, the other side of Africa is wide awake.

U.S., USSR URGED TO AVOID SKIRMISHES LEADING TO GLOBAL CONFLICT

Accra DAILY GRAPHIC in English 11 Nov 80 p 2

[Text]

WHEN the elephants fight, it is the grass which suffers most.

We, therefore, view the American threat to the Soviet Union that her intervention in the Polish affairs would invite America and its allies as a threat to the Third World.

When a blind man says he will throw a stone, it means he has already stepped on a piece of stone.

Whatever preparations the Americans might have made which prompted Mr Edwin Meese, Head of the President-elect, Ronald Reagan's transition team to issue the warning, we hope the Reagan Administration will learn to dialogue with the Soviet Union to avoid testing their superiority on the battlefield.

Such interferences in the internal affairs of other countries by the World's super-powers have produced many trouble spots in the world.

The world needs peace, therefore, America and the Soviet Union must avoid skirmishes which may lead to a possible global conflict.

USSHER FORT JAILBREAK ISSUE RESURFACES

Rawling's Participation

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 14 Nov 80 p 1

[Excerpt] Government yesterday stated that Flt-Lt Jerry John Rawlings, Chairman of the erstwhile Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC) cannot be exonerated from his share of blame because of the encouragement he offered and his direct personal involvement in the escape of five AFRC convicts from the Ussher Fort Prisons.

A Government White Paper on the report of the Commission of Inquiry appointed to investigate the escape of the five prisoners said the Government could not accept the findings of the commission that there was no link between the alleged destruction of the warrants covering the prisoners by Flt-Lt Rawlings on November 8 and their escape from prison on November 12.

It said Flt Lt Rawlings did not accept the validity of the convictions of the prisoners and actively encouraged the convicts to believe in their early release.

The White Paper said Rawlings personally approved exceptional, preferential and extra comforts for the convicts which were not available to other convicts.

It said he took active and personal steps to have the warrants on the convicts destroyed.

SDF LEADER ATTACKED AT OWN RESIDENCE

Incident Described

Accra DAILY GRAPHIC in English 8 Nov 80 p 1

[Article by Kwamena Apponsah]

[Excerpts] Unknown assailants on Wednesday night attacked and injured Alhaji Ibrahim Mahama, Leader of the Social Democratic Front (SDF) at his residence at Kaltohini Estate in Tamale.

Alhaji Mahama, who is on admission at the Tamale Central Hospital, could not be interviewed by reporters but according to Dr Daniel Delle, surgical specialist, he was responding to treatment.

When members of the press visited the residence, they found out that the furniture had been smashed, glasses and a radio casset broken, a brief-case forcibly opened and the contents scattered in the study.

Two walkie talkies were also found lying among the articles in the hall.

There was a pool of blood on the foreside of the bed in the bedroom with three bullet perforations in the window.

Officials Accused

Accra DAILY GRAPHIC in English 10 Nov 80 p 1

[Article by Nelson Duah]

[Excerpt] Alhaji Ibrahim Mahama, leader of the Social Democratic Front (SDF), has accused the Northern Regional Minister and the Assistant Commissioner of Police in charge of the Region of being responsible for the attack on him at Tamale last Wednesday night.

Speaking to me at his bedside at the Police Hospital in Accra where he is on admission after having been flown in from Tamale at the week-end, Alhaji Mahama said the recent curfew in Tamale was used to perpetrate the "evil deeds of the Regional Minister and the Assistant Commissioner of Police".

Alhaji Mahama explained that the attack was aimed at killing him, pointing out that had it not been the curfew, nobody could have attacked him and "go scot free".

He pointed out that the curfew was aimed at him because he did not see why the curfew was lifted soon after the attack on him.

The SDF leader said he suspected the Regional Minister as one of the men responsible for the attack on him because on the day of the incident, a van of the Information Services Department followed by a platoon of policemen and soldiers came to his office.

Allegations Denied

Accra DAILY GRAPHIC in English 12 Nov 80 pp 1, 4

[Article by Kwamena Apponsah]

[Excerpts] Alhaji Ibrahim Haruna, Northern Regional Minister, has categorically denied allegations that he and the Assistant Commissioner of Police in charge of the Northern Region, Mr P. E. Cobbina, master-minded the attack on the life of Alhaji Ibrahim Mahama, Leader of the Social Democratic Front (SDF) last Wednesday.

In a statement, Alhaji Haruna said even to the ordinary mind it would certainly be "unreasonable and treasonable for me as the Regional Minister to either encourage or get involved in some of the very acts for which the government I represent imposed the curfew and soon afterwards recommend its lifting".

He recalled that when the news on the attack on Alhaji Ibrahim Mahama reached him, he issued a statement condemning it and requested the police to conduct a thorough investigation into it.

"I have nothing against Alhaji Mahama and I wish to reiterate that if he has the facts that would assist the police in their investigations he sould bring them out instead of conjecturing. For, this would only succeed in confusing and detracting the attention of the police from tracing his assailants and the true brain behind the attack," he pointed out.

He described as rediculous and malicious Alhaji Ibrahim Mahama's allegations that the curfew was aimed at him and was only lifted after the attack on him, adding that the coincidence was unfortunate.

Mr Cobbina, when contacted, declined to comment until he has read the papers containing Alhaji Mahama's allegations.

Meanwhile, the Popular Front Party (PFP) has expressed its dismay at the violent attack made on Al haji Mahama, by some unknown assailants, reports Raymond Harry Reynolds.

This was contained in a statement signed by the leader of the Party, Mr Victor Owusu, in Accra yesterday.

LEGON UNIVERSITY CALLED LABORATORY FOR TRIBALISM

Accra DAILY GRAPHIC in English 10 Nov 80 p 2

[Editorial]

[Excerpts] Tribalism is the major social disease plaguing Ghana's development.

The fact that the University of Ghana, Legon, the premier highest institution of learning has become the laboratory for tribalism poses a serious national problem.

No time should be wasted to ban all regional and tribal associations on the campus.

We share the grave concern expressed by Professor D. Adzel-Bekoe at the week-end, that the impact of these associations upon student politics was alarming and constituted a threat to the general welfare of students.

Nobody can de-emphasise the fact that tribalism leads to divisiveness and sectionalism which can ultimately destroy the nation and its institutions.

For, there are cases in point when some tribal associations have gone to the extent of warning their members not to accept posting to regions other than their own to do their national service.

To cap it all, some associations normally make deliberate attempts to rig students' Representative Council (SRC) and Hall elections in order to put their corrupt tribesmen at the helm of students' affairs to the detriment of the whole University administration.

All kinds of corrupt practices, including buying votes, rigging elections, impersonation, tribalism, etc. etc. which are all condoned and connived at by these tribal associations are then carried on to the national level by the students after the completion of their courses.

The tribal associations claim they seek the welfare of their members. If this is true, then which association is expected to cater for the welfare of non-members and foreign students who also form part of the University community?

So far, what major contributions have these tribal associations made to improve the deteriorating conditions on the campus?

NATIONAL AFFAIRS MOVEMENT QUESTIONS AFRC MONIES ISSUE

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 8 Nov 80 p 4

[Excerpts] Since September 24, 1979, the AFRC and its three-month rule have become a centre of political controversy among sections of the Ghanaian populace. While some sing its praises, others shower abuses and try to portray it as probably the worst government that Ghana ever had. AFRC members, they argue, are equally corrupt and "chopped our money" just like the late Kutu Acheampong and his henchmen.

A few weeks after the PNP administration took over, the President, Dr Hilla Limann, made a statement to the effect that his Government had not received the huge sums of money the AFRC collected. This raised eye brows and brought a cou counter-statement from the Special Tribunal to the effect that all the monies were intact and that efforts had been made to hand it over the Government.

One would have thought that with the Special Tribunal's statement, doubts over AFRC moneys would have cleared.

On the contrary, subsequent statements from the Government continued to suggest that not all the moneys collected have been handed over. The Government claimed to have received only ¢23 million out of ¢300m? ¢600m? ¢900m? purported to have been collected by the AFRC.

With the recent publications in the weekly newspaper, "The Punch" about a secret "AFRC Student Account" at the Milner House branch of the Standard Bank from which huge withdrawals were allegedly made by some individuals in January (when all such accounts were supposed to have been handed over to the Government), further doubts have been planted in the minds of the public over the whereabouts of the moneys and the integrity of the AFRC.

Having made ACCOUNTABILITY an important, principle and one of the foundations on which a new Ghana rid of cheats and the corrupt should be built, one would have expected AFRC members to set an inspiring example by giving the public FACTS about the moneys collected.

Probe

Majors Boakye-Djan and Mensha-Poku were certainly in the right direction when they called for a probe into the issue of corruption of AFRC members, and a commission to establish FACTS about AFRC rule.

If that advice had been heeded, we will today have known or at least have a clearer notion of the various categories and sums of moneys collected.

Unfortunately, these demands were condemned by sections of the society, including "Progresive organizations" such as the NUGS June 4 Movement, and the People's Revolutionary League of Ghana, who described the calls as "reactionary," "imperialist intrigues and attempts to reverse the gains of June 4". To them ACCOUNTABILITY is not a principle but a trump-card to be used against reactionaries.

By implication their positions amount to this: If reactionaries are made accountable, then revolutionary gains are made. If revolutionaries are made accountable to the very people whose cause they expouse, then reversals of revolutionary gains come in.

Besides, other AFRC members have been silent. None is known to have openly supported the calls. Some felt they were too much of honest-superstars to be accountable to ordinary men, hence they preferred supernatural fetishes.

Even when the silence is broken, it is not to EDUCATE and INFORM the public on the basis of FACTS and figures. The issue of the whereabouts of the millions is dismissed as an attempt by enemies to reverse the gains of June 4 as Rawlings is reported to have said in reply to questions from his admirers.

Such answeres are however not too helpful since they are fallacious and misleading. It does not deal with the issue at stake; it does not prove the falsity of the allegations but rather attacks the motives and integrity of those who make them.

Silence

The net result of this odd silence in the face of continuing accusations over the whereabouts of the AFRC moneys has been the development of the Silence-means-guilt syndrome, and a feeling on the part of the masses of having been let down. This leads to embarrassment and despair and compromises their determination to fight against corruption and their hopes for a better Ghana. What happens next is to keep quiet in the face of corruption, exploitation and injustice and give everything to God! "Nyame Bekyeras!"

Certainly, it is this kind of neutrality and passiveness that all exploiting groups in history look for and expect from the masses. Hence the urgent need to EDUCATE and INFORM, raise the awareness of the people with facts about AFRC moneys.

If we are to defend and carry forward the objectives of June 4 then we must clarify and enhance the consciousness of the people on the basis of truth and be ready to be accountable to the people at all times.

THIRD FORCE PARTY WARNED TO BE REALISTIC

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 10 Nov 8 p 2

[Editorial]

[Text] Despite its dismal performance in the last general elections, the Third Force Party, as one of the recognized political groups, still enjoys a measure of respect for its fighting spirit and the way it keeps on reminding the public of its existence.

In exercise of its full democratic rights, the party has made known its stand on many issues not through Parliament--where it has no seat--but the press.

The party has even, in an advertiser's announcement, once gone to the extent of declaring almost all actions taken by the government as unconstitutional and calling on President Hilla Limann to resign from office.

This is all allowed by our Good Constitution.

However, despite the new lease of freedom of expression, the party needs to be realistic in some of its outbursts, if it ever hopes to mount the seat of government.

For, we consider it rather disadvantageous to the party, if it should tend to reduce important national issues to the level of school debates in which participants would be interested only in scoring points and not relating their arguments to realities of life.

As a party, the Third Force should have a good team of economic advisers.

For the "Times" considers it very strange for the party to suggest the raising of the minimum wage from ₵12 (which is already causing headaches in certain quarters) to ₵ a day. And that is not all. It is also calling for a price of ₵600 for a load of cocoa.

Are we being serious?

INTER-PARTY CONSULTATIVE FORUM--A consultative forum, made of representatives of registered political parties and the Electoral Commissioner has been formed to discuss and find solution to Common national problems. This was disclosed by the Electoral Commissioner, Mr J. Kinsley-Nyinah Jnr. at a meeting with editors of the mass media in Accra yesterday. He explained that the forum "is to enable this Commission to meet regularly with the political parties, have meaningful discussions with them on matters of common national political interest, unfold to one another our problems and put our heads together in finding solutions to our common national problems". He recalled that a similar forum was set up during the 1979 Parliamentary and Presidential Electioneering campaign. His main objective, he said, was to fashion for present and future generations a more healthful and effective brand of party politics far removed from the dishonesties, the deceits and the falsehoods and indecencies of the not very distant past. He stressed the need for party politics with a marked and distinctive difference from the past and "which places the interests of the nation above party, parochialism, and partisan ship". FOREIGN AID FOR DEVELOPMENT REVIEWED

[Text] On the threshold of the development decade (1981-90) we consider it useful to review development aid to the Democratic Republic of Madagascar in 1979, distinguishing between technical assistance projects and activities committed and underway in 1979, and foreign financing of investments committed during that year.

Commitments

In the technical assistance activities and projects committed by foreign aid sources for 1979, and the following years, one notes on the one hand that new operations were begun by the "traditional" sources of financing (France, USSR, EDF, United Nations System), on the other hand several donors have intensified technical assistance in relation to preceeding years (Canada, Japan, Algeria).

New commitments made in 1979 reach the total of $74.2 million, the most important sources including France with $26.6 million, the United Nations System with $19.9 million, and the USSR with $12.3 million.

The principal sectors in which commitments were made in 1979 remain science and technology (23 percent), agriculture, forests and fisheries (20 percent), and education (19 percent).

Payments

Total payments in 1979, for technical assistance activities and projects under way, committed in 1979 or during the preceeding years, is calculated at $52.7 million (compared with $33.8 million in 1978) to which should be added 45 noncalculated projects (7 with Cuba, 6 with China, and 6 with Yugoslavia).

The principal sectors for intervention remain agriculture, forests and fisheries (28 percent) and science and technology--particularly university scholarships for study and teaching (20 percent). It is worth noting that the sectors of intervention differ

Experts

A considerable increase in the number of experts (technical assistants, cooperators, volunteers, etc.) is noted in 1979: 944 experts, compared to 716 in 1978, and 744 in 1977. The number of experts does not include consultants who came to Madasgascar for less than 6 months, nor subcontractor personnel, nor technical assistants of private organizations. This figure does not include Mauritanian nationals serving as consultants largely within the United Nations System within the framework of the application of new dimensions of the UNDP.

As in previous years the French technical assistance corps remains the largest: almost three-quarters of all experts come from France (689), following by the USSR (69), the united Nations System (44), Switzerland (38) and the EDF (33); 71 experts are financed by other countries. The principal sectors of intervention (grouping around 90 percent of the total) remain: education, with a total of 462 experts, science and technology, with a total of 171, agriculture, forests and fisheries, with a total of 106, and health, with a total of 105 experts.

A total of around 1300 long-term study scholarships were granted Madagascar in 1979, representing approximately the same number of scholarships as in 1978. The EDC participates in the financing of a total of 350 study scholarships, while France follows with 346 study scholarships, and the USSR 310.

Capital Assistance

Foreign financing of investments in Madagascar in 1979 amounted to $222 million, compared to $175 million and $59 million in 1978 and 1977, respectively. This continuing increase in foreign investments in Madagascar confirms the pursuit and intensification of the REM's all-out investment policy. Globally, nearly all capital assistance (97 percent was granted to only 4 sectors, namely natural resources, agriculture, transports and communications, and international trade.

Loans and Subsidies

Of the total amount of foreign financing $18 million, or 8 percent (16 percent in 1978) were committed as subsidies and $204 million or 92 percent (84 percent in 1978) as loans. While subsidies have diminished by $10 million compared to 1978, loans granted in 1979 increased by $57 million compared to 1978.

Subsidies are apportioned in the first place to the sectors of transport and communications (52 percent) and agriculture, forests and fisheries (27 percent). The principal sources of capital subsidies for Madagascar remain Japan ($4.7 million), France ($4.4 million) through FAC [French Aid and Cooperation Fund] and CCCE [Central Fund for Economic Cooperation,] as well as the European Development Fund ($4.2 million).

Concerning loans, a heavy preponderance is to be noted of commitments for the transport and communications sectors (highway projects of IDA, the Federal Republic of Germany and of the EDF; railroad project of IDA and of the CCE) [as written in text: CCCE?]; and for the sector of international trade and financing (economic cooperation agreement with the Democratic and Popular Algerian Republic).

In the sector of natural resources supplementary committments were made for the "Andekaleka Hydroelectric Development" project. Finally, considerable amounts were allocated to the agriculture sector to develop rice and cotton production.

The principal sources of new loans granted remain Algeria (commercial agreement) amounting to $60 million, the International Development Association (IDA--World Bank group) with $55 million for four new projects, the Central Fund for Economic Cooperation (CCCE--France) which granted $28.7 million and the Federal Republic of Germany, with a total of $25.6 million. Concerning conditions under which the loans granted, the interest rates vary between 0.75 percent and 6 percent. The duration of loans can be divided into two groups: one group falling due within 10 to 20 years; the other between 30 and 50 years, with grace periods varying between 3 to 6 years.

Since government authorities consider Madagascar's global foreign indebtedness as still quite small compared to other developing countries, and because of the national economy's favorable prospects for the next 5 or 6 years, a continued increase in capital assistance for the years to come is to be expected, as well as a diversification of sources of foreign financing of investments, pursuant to the RDM's "all directions" policy.

TAMATAVE PORT CONGESTION--Toamasina. For some time there has been much discussion of the congestion at the autonomous port of Toamasina. Urgently needed produce such as rice, table oil and cement have accumulated. The director general of the port met with journalists after having invited them to visit the site. He explained to them the different reasons that might be the cause of the temporary congestion: owners of merchandise who have not completed administrative formalities; inadequate transport facilities. He indicated that sometimes around 28,000 tons of merchandise accumulate in the port. However, the putting into serve of 128 trucks, including two semi-trailers and two vans (gifts from the GDR) unloaded last Thursday could in part resolve this problem. Double axle IFAW-50 trucks have a 5 to 8 ton capacity and are well adapted to our highways. It is believed that these trucks will soon be handed over to the transport cooperatives. It is to be noted that Thursday, during the truck reception ceremonies, presided over by the PCE of faritany (expansion unknown), M Lahady Samuel, two boats were unloaded, the first, a Burmese, with 6000 tons of white rice from the Socialist Republic of Burma, and the second 5000 barrels of table oil. FISH FARM PLAN--Nkhata Bay, Sunday--The United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) Representative in Malawi, Mr. R.A. Borthwick has said that his organisation, in conjunction with the Food and Agricultural Organisation (FAO) and the Fisheries Department, is trying to bring fish to the people in the Northern Region at a cheaper price. Mr. Borthwick said that since the lake in the North was far deeper than in the South, the fish stock were therefore in lesser quantities. "But to supplement the shortage the UNDP, in co-operation with the Government is looking into possibilities of establishing fish farming as an integral part of other farming activities in the rural areas in order to increase fish production," he said. The UNDP Representative said that this method of increasing fish production has been successful elsewhere and he saw no reason why it should not succeed here. Speaking about the fisheries expansion project which is being financed by his organisation, Mr. Borthwick said that it was intended to expand the activities of the project which, apart from aiming at ensuring increased fish production would also provide the people with employment opportunities in the fishing industry.--MANA [Text] [Blantyre DAILY TIMES in English 10 Nov 80 p 1]

PHARMACEUTICAL POLICY WILL NEUTRALIZE TRANSNATIONALS' ACTIVITIES

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 18 Oct 80 pp 2, 7

[Excerpts] The minister of health, Pascoal Mocumbi, in a roundtable discussion held several days ago in the capital, stressed that the struggle against multinational firms had to be carried out through our country's pharmaceutical policy; Swiss specialist Prof Georges Peters, who is ending his visit to Mozambique today, participated.

In the meeting on "Pharmaceutical Policy in the RPM [People's Republic of Mozambique], a basic issue in providing health services to the people, Minister Mocumbi reviewed the steps taken in our country to define a national pharmaceutical policy.

Importance of the Subject

In his speech, Mocumbi began by explaining that the pharmaceutical policy is an integral part of the country's health policy, as defined by FRELIMO Party and implemented by the Ministry of Health.

"It is important to speak of the pharmaceutical policy," said the minister of health. "It is important because of the social and economic consequences arising from its definition. It is important, too, because in most countries, it has not yet been spelled out.

"We should wonder why many countries still do not have a coherent plan for a national pharmaceutical policy. If we reflect seriously on this matter, we find the explanation in the work done by multinational companies, in the pharmaceutical lobby and their domination of the international market.

"Today, the problem cannot be considered outside the political concept of each nation. It is no accident that the socialist countries have national pharmaceutical policies while only a small percentage of capitalist countries do.

Armed Struggle--Point of Departure

"We know Mozambique's situation prior to independence: thousands of medicines available; an advertising agent from the international laboratories for every five doctors (more than in France); no regulation of prescriptions and no mechanisms to control the quality of products available.

"In this anarchy, gifts and bribes went hand in hand with the illegal export of currency.

"This situation had to be ended when the people's power was installed. The RPM tried to create solid foundations in all areas. The health field, and consequently pharmaceutical activity, is a well-known example of everything reorganized.

"Thus, the RPM established bases for a national policy, before WHO took any specific action, even before WHO could discuss the problem openly.

National List of Medicines

"In January 1977 (many months before WHO drew up a list of 200 essential medicines), our first national list of medicines was published in Mozambique, limiting the number of pharmaceutical products to 390 (including galenic preparations) for use by the National Health Service.

"From that time, medicines had to be prescribed from the list by their generic names. This prohibition on the use of pharmaceutical brand names made the entire propaganda support structure for multinational pharmaceutical firms unnecessary.

"We can say today that the negative propaganda of the large international laboratories died a natural death in our country, judging from the reduction in the number of firms, pamphlets and advertising agents, even though no special regulatory legislation has been published.

National Pharmaceutical Industry

"A national pharmaceutical industry is being drafted and the study phase is almost concluded. It will not only reduce our dependence on multinational pharmaceutical firms, but also current costs for products used.

"Local production of medicines will be directed toward maximum use of local resources, using packing materials already produced in our country; an investigation of our rich plant resources will be expanded so that, sooner or later, we can obtain local raw materials.

Regulation of Distribution

"Regulating medicine distribution continues to be a problem, despite the improvement in recent years. However, it still concerns us.

"Therefore, a study on this matter was ordered; it will be a basis for deciding how to overcome our problems in transporting and distributing medicine.

"In WHO, this matter is now openly discussed because of the action of socialist and nonaligned countries. The struggle with multinational firms will not be easy, however.

"It must be done, and the subject must be brought up whenever possible, since the results obtained which are now visible, represent an inestimable benefit to the health of people throughout the world, specially in the least protected countries: the developing countries."

NEW UPC CONSTITUTION CALLED DICTATORIAL

Kampala THE CITIZEN in English 3 Nov 80 pp 1, 6

[Text] The Uganda Peoples Congress (U.P.C.) has published its party Constitution which is a direct reflection of the "pigeon-hole" 1967 Uganda Constitution that placed all powers in the President.

Article 7 of the U.P.C. Constitution on "Duties of the Annual Delegates Conference" section 4 (see UGANDA TIMES of 30.10.80) says:

"The President shall, immediately after his election, appoint a vice-president, treasurer and assistant treasurer, secretary-general, assistant secretary general and the national chairman and national vice-chairman, all of whom shall be members of the Central Executive Committee. The President shall have powers to dismiss or replace any of the members so appointed by him."

Such arrangement presupposes that any U.P.C. intending to occupy any of those posts has to be in the pockets of the President of the party and has to do what his master wants or else he/she faces an axe. It gives the President of the U.P.C. dictatorial powers against his executive.

The investing of all powers in the U.P.C. party President by its Constitution also forecasts that once U.P.C. comes to power, a new National Constitution similar to the 1967 Constitution may be made and this may give powers to the President of Uganda the right to nominate members of Parliament of his own choice in a similar manner Bidandi Ssali nominated N.C.C. members and District Councilors.

The U.P.C. in all its campaigns has been vowing to adhere and follow democratic principles telling the electorate that all its party posts will be elective until last week when its Constitution showed the opposite.

BACKGROUND FOR ALLEGED DICTATORSHIP PROVIDED

Kampala THE CITIZEN in English 3 Nov 80 p 2

[Text]

In order to make meaningful speculation on what would follow if U.P.C. "won" the December elections and Obote became President, one has to go way back to the pre-Amin period and examine U.P.C. policies and activities at that time.

By the time Obote was overthrown he had over one hundred political prisoners who had never been taken to a court of law. These included Grace Ibingira, Mathias Ngobi, Barak Kirya, George Magezi, Shaban Opolot, Ben Kiwanuka and Paul Seenogerere. The first five had been in prison for five years and had no hope of ever being released until the Amin coup came to their rescue.

All other political parties, save U.P.C., had been barred and with Akena Adoko's General Service Unit (GSU), all political and other dissidents were hunted, terrorised and tortured. The economy had gone into stagnation following Obote's ill-planned nationalisation of various private companies. There was as much insecurity as there is today with armed GSUs policing and terrorising and looting as they went.

So when Obote says he is going "to continue from where he left off, he means just that. It is no joke.

POLITICAL AREA:

Immediately UPC assumes power it would outlaw all activities of other parties and consequently ban them. The present apparent support for multipartyism is only window-dressing. The leaders and the key supporters of D.P., U.P.M. and C.P. would be thrown in jail. Their fate would then be just as that of the hundreds of Obote's political prisoners.

The current revival of democracy would be forgotten. U.P.C. will proceed to appoint councilors local and municipal as they did in the 60s. Political and other appointments would be given to U.PC. only regardless of competence.

THE ECONOMY:

The frustration resulting from the above political policies would affect the economy adversely. There will be no incentive to work—especially for the good of the nation. The "go slow" and "don't care" mood in which most people are both in the public and private services would assume even higher proportions.

Foreign capital investment will be scared away by the "anti-West" stance of U.P.C. This will mean that little progress, if any, will be made in rehabilitation let alone actual development.

The vengeful attitude of U.P.C. and Obote may result in coffee and food production dropping. The possible re-allocation of businesses which the U.P.C. is going to mount may cause so much confusion that for quite sometime goods will be bought on black market.

SECURITY:

Akena Adoko will once again head his GSU. With his past experience together with the trainees just returned from Cuba, Kampala and Uganda as a whole will be hit by gestapo-like spying and torture that is bound to be worse than the State Research Bureau of Amin. Akena Adoko had armed all his General Service Unit spies to the teeth. In order to survive they robbed and terrorised. "Kondo" activities hit the climax in Obote's era. Many people will be accused of collaborating with subversive elements and will be arrested.

Many liberation movements will inevitably mushroom in and outside Uganda. These movements enjoying popular support will be difficult to fight.

THE EXODUS:

The Ugandan refugees now outside Uganda will not return home. Nobody who has had contacts with U.P.C.s can be foolish enough to trust their amnesties. More professionals will leave Uganda in search of security and reasonable working conditions. The number will be the highest this time because all hope will have been lost.

FOREIGN RELATIONS:

The extreme socialist line that U.P.C. would like to follow, will alienate many countries especially in the West. This alienation will discourge foreign investments from our traditional sources.

This will be a death-blow because at the moment Uganda needs a lot of aid in order to start on rehabilitation which has not yet been tackled. Sudan/Ugandan exiles in the Sudan would not return. It would be suicide to return. These refugees could then be tempted into attacking Uganda from time to time. Zaire would be in very much the same position.

The security position obtaining compounded by external incursions discussed above would necessitate more troops and ammunitions. The T.P.D.F. would need reinforcements. The Average Ugandan will then associate Tanzania with U P.C.s oppression which will result into resentment and hatred of Tanzania.

FREEDOMS:

The first casualty will be the freedom of the press. U.P.C.'s idea of the freedom of the press is what Ben Bella's UGANDA TIMES does: — You must praise U.P.C. and Obote, full stop. Any publication that criticizes them will be banned.

Radio Uganda and T.V. will broadcast programmes daily praising U.P.C. and Obote just as they did before 1971.

The freedom of movement will continue to be restricted by road-blocks and searches that never yield any meaningful results.

Freedom of speech will be forgotten. You will have to look behind your shoulder before saying anything. The GSU will be in active work.

By June 1981 the national service camps will be ready. And as the "Move TO THE LEFT" documents spelt out all able-bodied persons will be required to go to various camps for National Service (Akasanvu).

By December 1981, the destruction of Uganda will have been completed. UPC will be the only party; UGANDA TIMES will be the only newspaper; the economy will have stagnated: the hospitals and schools will be worse than they are today and those who will be lucky to keep alive will have perfected the art of living in the bush.

CAR THEFTS, GASOLINE SHORTAGE BELIEVED POLITICAL PLOT

Kampala THE CITIZEN in English 20 Oct 80 pp 1, 8

[Text] As the registration of voters comes to an end and the four political parties preparing for hectic second and final phase of public rallies, there has emerged a rampant stealing of motor vehicles at gunpoint, the creation of numerous road blocks and the torture of innocent civilians by uniformed men.

Armed men in army uniforms have been accused of being involved in this evil act as nearly on all occasions were seen taking vehicles especially lorries, pickups and minibuses at gunpoint. These men have been and are still stealing vehicles on the "pretext" of the current fighting in West Nile on the Uganda borders with Zaire and Sudan.

However, according to "The Citizen" investigation the reason advanced by these men was found to be invalid as the fighting in West Nile was not so serious as to warrant the hijacking of civilian vehicles. Further still it was established that the government provided vehicles to transport soldiers to Arua or Koboko the scene of the fighting.

Reports unearthened by "The Citizen" allege that the car theft now going on is being instigated by a certain political party--so that it can have enough vehicles at its disposal when the campaigning resumes and during the election period for their members. Reports further reveal that the same party, through its top officers within the government, plan to freeze petrol supplies to all the civilian population except to their members who will have to get chits for fuel supply. With most vehicles and fuel at their exclusive disposal, that party believes, will be able to carry out smooth campaigning and thus win the forthcoming elections while on the other hand incapacitating the endevours of other rival parties.

A number of roadblocks have been erected within the city manned by members of the Uganda Police, Tanzanian Police and UNLA. The government has up to now not given any explanation to this effect. A number of innocent citizens have been forced to "cough" some money before they are allowed to pass, lucky ones have managed to pass through without "coughing" while the unlucky ones have been made to squat and been manhandled. One of the victims was a driver of the DP President General who was seriously beaten up and sustained facial injuries, just because his house happened to be at the site of the road block.

Gun-shots and house break-ins both during the day and at night have become a National Anthem. A woman was shot at in the legs at the Bank of Uganda building in mid-morning last week after aimless sporadic shooting by UNLA men guarding the place. In the same week two men were shot in the legs at the new Commercial Bank by men in a moving Dutsun car 1204 white in colour while three men were injured in the legs and at the back when UNLA soldiers in a Land Rover vehicle opened fire at them at "Hussein" taxi park on Entebbe road, only to mention but a few incidents.

Meanwhile, reports from Entebbe have revealed that a big consignment of scooters in the names of the Ministry of Defence have arrived in the country. But a struggle for the fittest has also allegedly been started by one party to acquire these scooters. By the time we went to Press allocation had not been made but it is all being done behind curtains.

IRREGULARITIES IN VOTER REGISTRATION DECRIED

Kampala THE CITIZEN in English 20 Oct 80 pp 3, 6

[Text] Reports reaching the Citizen office from various parts of the country reveal gross irregularities and malpractices in the current election exercise. Some of these are purely administrative while others are deliberate criminal activities.

1. Kidnapping Registration Officers

Two officers, Herbert Kasozi and Mateeka of Bweya and Bwebajja (9 miles Entebbe Rd) centres together with two chiefs were arrested in the night of 10th October and taken to Entebbe. The reason has not been given for the kidnapping or arrest. And by the 16th of October the centres had not resumed registration.

2. Change of Registration Centre

On the 11/10/80 the centre was moved from Kiswa R/C to Bugolobi II without prior warning.

3. Too Few Centres

Jinja

Some areas like Jinja have had too few centres. Jinja has three only. It has proved difficult for people to register quickly in such a place. Two pregnant ladies waited long enough to deliver baby boys in the registration queue.

4. Deliberate Refusal To Register Some Ugandans

In Gomba (Mpigi District) and Bushenyi Districts, officers refused to register some Ugandans on the pretext that they were not citizens. Those refused are generally of the Banyarwanda tribe found near the Rwanda/Uganda border. In Bushenyi this means rejection of about 80 percent would-be voters. It is a pity that the Government has not come up with a clear statement on this issue but instead left the power to disenfranchise Ugandans in the hands of unscrupulous chiefs and some registration officers.

5. Intimidation of People Going To Register

In some parts of Uganda government Ministers and officials have interfered with registration in a number of ways.

A full Minister from Mubende threatened DP supporters openly. In Bushenyi Ministers Yona Kanyomozi and Rurangaranga both dressed in UPC party colours went around addressing registration centres encouraging the rejection of some people from registering. In the same area of Mbale at Buruguru, Michael Mutiru of Bukiende sub-county proceeding to register together with 3 people was detained for two hours by John Khankla (ex-Amin soldier) hired by UPCs. In Iganga District it was invariably reported that a number of DP leaders were arrested by armed personnel and taken to unknown destinations--as we went to press their whereabouts as well as their personal security were in doubt. A DP supporter at Katebo-Ssango in Mawokota (Mpigi) was likewise seized and taken away to unknown place.

6. Appointment of Exclusive UPC Registration Officers

In Bushenyi District, Rubare county, the original list of Registration Officers was dropped and replaced by an exclusive UPC list. Officers so appointed went ahead to implement their party strategy to bar Ugandans from registration.

DP supporters on the pretext that they were non-Ugandans were easily refused to register. One victim is a prospective DP candidate, Mr. Rwivanga. The same thing happened in Mbale District at Bukweta, Busamaga, and Nampanga centres. Haji Sowedi Fagaba and Twaha Makunja were some of those refused to register. DP agents were also refused places at the registration at Bulugaya and many other centres in Mbale District.

Shortage of Registration Materials

In many centres there has been shortage of registration stationery. Centres remained closed for hours and in many places for days. Kisumula centre, Mpigi District, remained closed for about four days for this reason. Gulu District suffered from the same problem and many centres didn't open for days.

In Kasese District no registration took place for the 1st whole week and as we went to press there were no clear indications that it had started.

Undisciplined Officers

Some officers have been [one word illegible] irresponsible and have in some cases, people allege, made clerical mistakes deliberately. Others don't open centres until very late and close them before time with the express purpose of registering as few people as possible.

In Tororo district many centres did not open on the 6th. People had to travel long distances to the few centres. They were not properly directed to the registration centres in other areas and there were no officials to help them.

UPC youths and chiefs have taken over control of the exercise and running the exercise as if it was a UPC monopoly. At Manyulo in Bunyole, West Budama, Hon. Okwenje Minister of Public Service and Cabinet Affairs drives around in UPC colours, ordering officers to do whatever he directs.

There are allegations that some registration officers have sold voters' cards privately. Some unscrupulous people are now trafficking in this illegal trade.

Here in Kampala rumours are circulating of voter's cards being bought at 2,000/- each. And some arrests have already been made of people registering more than once.

PLOT OF SECRET UNU SABOTEURS REPORTED REVEALED

Kampala UGANDA TIMES in English 3 Nov 80 pp 1, 8

[Article by Sam Serwanga]

[Text] One Ugandan now in self-imposed exile, Lameck B. Ntambi, has vowed to create chaos to perpetuate a state of war in this country.

Ntambi, leader of an underground movement, the Uganda National Union (UNU), formed in Kampala during ex-president Godfrey Binaisa's regime, vowed that he would never have to see Uganda at peace.

The chairman of the Military Commission, Mr Paulo Muwanga, revealed this at Mukono when addressing the district team and planning committee.

Muwanga, angered by the general wave of insecurity in which many people had been murdered said: "Ntambi is understood to be having some connections with some people based here. He said in Nairobi recently that he will never rest until he sees Uganda is in troubles.

"Such threats are real. There are reports that some Ugandans are training in secret places from within to cause chaos and insecurity."

Muwanga referred to certain islands within Lake Victoria where some of the people bent on creating chaos are reportedly training.

Recently, the Uganda National Liberation Army (UNLA) crushed a bitter invasion of northwestern Uganda by ousted dictator Idi Amin's gangsters.

"Many more soldiers than we ever lost in the eight month liberation war between Mutukula and Kampala were killed in the invasion which took a week to repulse.

"But it is disheartening to hear from many people, plus some local newspapers, that the invasion was 'imaginery.'

"Many of these people jubilated when they heard of the invasion; others, especially traders, pushed up prices of foodstuffs. All these were latent signs of welcome to fascist Amin.

"But these people are kidding. You will realise late that you were riding a tiger by welcoming a fascist."

Muwanga, a politician for 30 years now, recounted the sad incidents in which people were murdered by trigger happy men.

Two people were killed when gunmen opened fire at a crowd which was attending a political rally and in another incident seven people were killed in a bar.

"Uganda has seen enough bloodshed. We have thousands of widows and orphans to care for. Enough is enough," the chairman who effectively participated in the liberation war resignedly said.

"Be vigilant and have a critical mind so that you spot out suspicious characters. They should be arrested. If the police is corrupt, unveil them. They will not have it both ways."

He warned chiefs who intimidated people into joining parties of their own affiliations, "None of you has the right to force people to follow a given political party. Watch out. You may face the sack if you intimidate people and condone illegal acts like smuggling and killings."

He was later informed that eight out of the 45 persons suspected of burning a Uganda People's Congress (UPC) supporter alive had been taken to court. They were now on remand.

On a critical appraisal, Muwanga admitted that the Military Commission had not succeeded in stamping out insecurity. "We have had problems because we basically lack some logistics."

The police force was before the war 20,000-man strong. Today they are very few. There are other problems of habitual criminals now loose and those who wanted to settle old scores.

He added that it had been very difficult to supply essential goods. "Many of you have developed selfish tendencies of thinking in terms of "for God and myself."

Many traders had been given foreign exchange to import some of the basic goods. But they had spent it on their own selfish projects.

"I hope the elected government will be able to face all these daunting challenges and we return to the good old days when the issue of the basic goods was not a question to be brought before a husband, wife and children."

Later Muwanga, wife, sister, son and other relatives, drove about 10 miles, a dusty course, to attend the 25 years of the recognition of the Nyonyi clan by the then ssabataka (chief elder) in the home of the head of the clan, Mr Samwiri Bugingo, on Mirembe hill, Kyaggwe.

Muwanga, a prominent grandson of the clan, together with the members of the Military Commission gave 120,000/- to the clan. By the end of the ceremony, more than 247,951/- had been collected for the clan.

Muwanga asked the clan members to think outwardly and "interact with peoples from other areas."

The clan has an ambitious plan of constructing offices, at a cost of 2.5m/- at Mengo, near Kampala.

Members of the clan presented to Muwanga and his wife gifts.

GANGSTERS REPORTED POISED TO ATTACK SEBEI DISTRICT

Kampala UGANDA TIMES in English 24 Oct 80 pp 1, 8

[Article by Sam Wakholi]

[Text] Hundreds of ex-soldiers of dictator Idi Amin's defeated army who fled into the forests of Sebei District along Mount Elgon, have regrouped and are poised to attack Kapchorwa town, a highly-placed government source has disclosed in Mbale.

The bandits, the source said, are in close contact with a group of disgruntled politicians who have been training rebels in a neighbouring country.

"The intention of the rebels is to destroy the lives and property in Kapchorwa, the source alleged. The rebels are concentrated in the forested hills of Benet and Kapenguria in the Mount Elgon area.

A big number of ex-soldiers and officers in the dictator's army escaped with arms to Kenya through Sebei during the liberation war. The authorities it is alleged fully aware of the activities of the National Consultative Council (NCC) member for Kapchorwa District, Mr Charles Ndiwa Chemaswet.
